IS THE LAW OF CONTEMPT A REASONABLE RESTRICTION?

THE question may be posited whether the words "in so far as such law imposes reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the right conferred by the said sub-clause" in art. 19(2) of the Constitution of India do not relate to any existing law or do not prevent the State from making any law in relation to contempt of Court? The actual wording in art. 19(2) is somewhat clumsy, and if the words "security of the State...decency or morality" are left out in the clause, then what remains relates to contempt in rather bad English.¹ One way of reading the clause is stated to be¹ that the words "in so far as such law imposes reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the right conferred by the said sub-clause" do not relate to any existing law, or do not prevent the State from making any law in relation to contempt of Court, defamation or incitement to an offence. In the instant case¹ the Court said:

"...It is, however, unnecessary for the purpose of the present case to decide the point; for even assuming that the Constitution makes the existing law relating to contempt of Court, subject to reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the right of freedom of speech we are inclined to think that the whole law of contempt of Court, as it stood on the date of the coming into force of the Constitution, answers the test of reasonableness."

In *Bijoyananda v. Balakrushna*² it was clearly posited that 'the power to punish for contempt is inherent in a Court of record', and this has been recognised from the earliest times in England. The High Courts in India were created Courts of record by Letters Patents. By the Government of India Act, 1935, as well as by art. 215 of the Constitution the Supreme Court of India and the High Courts are the Courts of record and it is essential for the administration of justice and protection of individuals that the Courts should be able to punish summarily acts of contempt because in the words of Blackstone, "this power is an inseparable attendant upon every Superior Tribunal."

So art. 19(2) in no way does curtail the inherent right of the High Court to deal with contempt of Court. On the other hand, it recognises the already existing power of the High Court.³ On the question of reasonableness if we have the interest of fair administration of justice in view, such a limitation on the right of freedom of speech or freedom of press cannot but be held as reasonable.³ For instance, when police are investigating soon after an offence and before they file the charge sheet if publications are made in the press as to the truth or falsity of one version or the other, such publication is bound to react on the minds of witnesses and jurors. Such a publication with knowledge that a proceeding is imminent will have a clear and substantial tendency to interfere with the fair course of justice and as such would constitute contempt.⁴ This is a perfectly reasonable restriction placed on such irresponsible journalism. The term 'reasonable restriction' in art. 19(2) refers not merely to future laws but also in a way to the existing laws.³ Before the amendment of 1951 the entire law relating to libel, slander, defamation, contempt of Court, etc. was excluded from the operation of art. 19(1)(a). There was then no question of reasonableness of the law or future law relating to the matters outlined in sub-cl. (2). After the first Constitutional Amendment of 1951, if the existing law or future law relating to the matters mentioned in sub-cl. (2) contravenes the limits of reasonable restriction on the exercise of the right of freedom of speech such law will be void. (Vide Lakhan Singh v. Balbir Singh.)

Merely because 'contempt' is not defined either in the Constitution or in the Contempt of Courts Act, it cannot be termed as unreasonable. It is felt unnecessary to define the term as it carries a set meaning given to it by judicial pronouncements of both Indian and English Courts.⁵ No doubt justice is not a cloistered virtue and as Lord Atkin stated⁶ she must be allowed to suffer the scrutiny and respectful even though outspoken comments of ordinary men. No wrong is committed by any one who criticises in good faith in private or public the public act done in the course of justice.

"...The path of criticism is a public way: the wrong headed are permitted to err therein: provided that members of the public abstain from imputing improper motives to those taking part in the administration of justice, and are genuinely exercising a right of criticism and not acting in malice or attempting to impair the administration of justice, they are immune." (p. 158)

Hence they cannot be immune from the operation of the law of contempt if they act to the contrary. It will, therefore, be a reasonable restriction to prevent freedom of speech descending into an offence of contempt of Court by the penal provision of the law.

The test of reasonable restrictions has to take into account the nature of the right alleged to have been infringed, the underlying purpose of the restrictions imposed, the extent and evil sought to be remedied thereby, the disproportion of the imposition, the prevailing conditions at the time etc.⁷ Judged by these standards the law of contempt of Court as it exists to-day is indeed reasonable. Narasimham J. said⁸ the words 'existing law' in art. 19(2) or cl. (10) of art. 366 when it refers to the law of contempt should not only be deemed to refer to statute law but the entire case law on the subject.

The law of contempt as laid down by the British and Indian Courts has been held to impose only reasonable restrictions on the guarantee of freedom of speech.⁹ Even after the 1951 Constitutional Amendment of art. 19(2), the previous law of contempt has continued to be in force and deemed quite reasonable. The American Courts have evolved the test of clear and present danger.¹⁰ Fortunately this test is quite unnecessary in India.¹¹

In *Schenck v. United States*¹⁰ it was posited that the Court must determine whether or not the words of contempt used were of such nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about substantial evils. In *Bridges v. California*¹² Black J. delivering the opinion of the Court said (p. 203):

"What finally emerges from the 'clear and present danger' cases is a working principle that the substantive evil must be extremely serious and the degree of imminence extremely high before utterances can be punished."

But four dissenting Judges in the same case adverted to this clear and present danger test and said (p. 220):

"...The Constitution, as we have recently had occasion to remark, is not a formulary. Nor does it require displacement of an historic test (the test of reasonable tendency) by a phrase which has gained currency on March 3, 1919 (Schenck v. United States (1919))

(5) Legal Remembrance v. Bibhuti Bhushan, [1954] A.I.R. Pat. 203.

(6) Andre Paul v. Attorney-General, [1936] A.I.R. P.O. 141, following Queen v. Grey, [1900] 2 Q.B. 36.

249 U.S. 47). Our duty is not ended with the recitation of phrases that are the shorthand of a complicated historic process. The phrase 'clear and present danger' is merely a justification for curbing utterance where that is warranted by the substantive evil to be prevented. The phrase itself is an expression of a tendency and not of accomplishment, and the literary difference between it and 'reasonable tendency' is not of constitutional dimension."

• In *Craig v. Harney*¹³ it was held

"The vehemence of the language used is not alone the measure of the power to punish for contempt of Court. The fires which it kindles must constitute an imminent, not merely a likely threat to the administration of justice. The danger need not be remote or even probable; it must immediately imperil."

It will be noted that these divergent views of American Judges have in a way diluted and confused the application of the law of contempt of Court. In *Lakhan Singh v. Balbir Singh*¹⁴ these American pointers were fully canvassed and it was decided

"There was still strong difference even in America about the application of the clear and present danger test to cases of contempt. We are not bound to apply any such test. Conditions in India are different from those prevailing in America. The language of our Constitution after the amendment of Article 19 requires us to see whether the restrictions are reasonable."

The test in India is negative while the American 'clear and present danger' is a positive test.

Our negative test of 'reasonable restrictions' is more near to the American conception of 'reasonable tendency' as envisaged in the minority judgment of the American Supreme Court in Schenck v. United States.¹⁵ 'The clear and present danger' test has led to these results in America:—

1. Mere criticism of a Judge is not punishable however untrue¹⁶, deliberate¹⁷, unfair¹⁸ or intemperate.¹⁹ The words imputed must make out a clear and present danger to the administration of justice.

2. Even if the criticism was in respect of a pending proceeding—e.g. a labour dispute it must be shown that an unfair disposition of the pending proceeding was the immediate result.²⁰

In India what is needed as proof is the tendency to bring the administration of justice into contempt, to prejudice the fair trial of any cause which is the subject of civil or criminal proceeding, or in any way to obstruct the course and cause of justice. The obstruction may be actual or merely a definite tendency. What the general public will feel and how the administration of justice is likely to be lowered in the estimation of the public is the criterion. There is absolutely no need to apply the 'clear and present danger' test. Mere reasonable tendency or apprehension is sufficient. In America the Constitution guarantees free speech unequivocally. Liberty is subject in America to due process. In such a context, a strict standard is recognised and a clear and present danger is expected if the freedom of speech is to be curtailed. But in India the law of contempt is constitutionally subject to reasonable restrictions only and not to the clear and present danger test. Liberty of speech in India is demarcated in art. 19(1)(a) and the restriction is specified in art. 19(2). The basis of contempt in India rests yet under the English concept as disclosed by numerous judicial decisions. This 'contempt' which is not defined in the Contempt of Courts Act or in the Constitution is the creature of judicial decisions. Such judicial background cannot but make them reasonable, and a fortiori, the application of the clear and present danger is quite out of place in India. Existing law of contempt is recognised by the Constitution, and therefore it would appear one cannot attack the reasonableness of the existing law. But under

art. 19(2), when the State does create any restriction by any new statute after the Constitution came into force, the yardstick of reasonableness can be applied to the same to test its constitutional validity in a Court of law. In effect it would appear that there is no constitutional question at all pertaining to the existing law of contempt as on the date of the coming into force of the Constitution.

Of course the determination by the Legislature of what constitutes a reasonable restriction is not final or conclusive for it is subject to the review jurisdiction of the Court.²¹ The concept of 'reasonable restriction' seeks to strike a balance between the freedom guaranteed under art. 19(1) and the social control exercised by cl. (2). In this context is not social control needed so as to prevent contempt of the Courts of justice in the land? Contempt provisions are not there to protect the person of the Judge. It is there more to protect the impersonal judgeship that adorns the seat of justice. It is wrong to suppose that the law of contempt contributes to the vanity of a Judge who is power-conscious. Contempt is no respecter of persons. It affects all alike, the Judge, the lawyer, the witness, the press and the public. We will presently analyse how the Judge also can be penalised for contempt of his own Court.

Judges of the High Court can take cognizance of contempt of themselves and also inferior tribunals subordinate to them. In the words of Justice Wilmot in *Rex v. Almon*²² which memorable unreported case is the basic foundation of the English law of contempt and which stands approved in numerous English and Indian decisions:—

"It is not their (Judges') own cause but the cause of the Public which they are vindicating at the instance of the Public...and so if the seat of Justice abuses that confidence and an impression is created in the Public mind that the Judge is excitable, indecorous and insulting to party, or counsel, then the confidence of the public is shaken, in the administration of Justice...and whenever their allegiance to the Law is so fundamentally shaken, it is the most fatal and most dangerous obstruction of justice and in my opinion calls out for a more rapid and immediate redress than any obstruction whatsoever, not for the sake of the Judges as private individuals but because they are the channels by which the King's Justice is conveyed to the People."

The question is should not the divine seat of justice and the pure stream of unsullied justice emanating from it be safeguarded from any fouling or obstruction of the same by whomsoever? Is this not a reasonable restriction in the interest of the fair administration of justice? If lawyers or witnesses offend this rule they are made liable to the penalty imposed by the law of contempt. But are Judges immune from this restriction? For instance, if the Judge uses indecorous words and indulges in unseemly, indecent and even outrageous language out of all proportion to the needs of the occasion quite unbecoming of a Judge, will it not be a reasonable application to extend the law of contempt to him also, in so far as he has sullied the seat of justice which for the nonce he was occupying and has brought the seat of the administration of justice to contempt and public ridicule? To that extent has he not obstructed personally as a person the free flow of administration of justice administered by him as a Judge?

Such a situation arose in a Lahore case, Muhammad Shafi v. Quadir Baksh.²³ In that case of rival lessees of a cinema; arraigned in proceedings under s. 145, Criminal Procedure Code, before the First Class Magistrate, Lahore, the respondent's counsel represented to the Court that he had obtained an injunction order from the sub-judge against the petitioner from proceeding with the s. 145 proceeding. Instead of this innocuous matter being disposed of on a simple proposition that there was no injunction as against the First Class Magistrate, the Magistrate fell out on the counsel for the petitioner, called the sub-judge foolish in passing such an order and named the sub-judge as well as the lawyer who obtained the order as fools. He further got up from the chair and hurled out abusive epithets against the poor lawyer as having done a crime for which the lawyer should be sent behind prison bars, that he would teach him a lesson and so forth. The advocate moved the High Court which took serious notice of the two-fold contempt of abusing the sub-judge and abusing the lawyer as an Officer of Court. Their Lordships even refused to accept an apology and sentenced the First Class Magistrate to a fine of Rs. 50. We invite a full reading of the judgment which in effect makes it clear that a Judge who exceeds his limits, and intemperately scandalises a lawyer in Court, also commits contempt. We may add that the Judicial Officers Protection Act (XVIII of 1850) will not afford protection to the Judge in such cases as 'good faith' is enjoined. In s. 77, Indian Penal Code, also the immunity to Judges from criminal action is conditioned by 'good faith'.

But if, therefore, 'bad faith is clear', the immunity disappears. So the law of contempt must be deemed quiet reasonable in restricting the right of speech by the Judge if he exceeds his limits and enters the domain of 'bad faith'. So also the lawyer if he exceeds the bounds of strong advocacy and indulges in abuse vilifying the Judge or a witness in Court, his fundamental right of speech from which flows the rules of advocacy also, should be curtailed to the extent needed to keep up the prestige and dignity of the Court. This should be deemed quite a reasonable restriction.

No right should be abused. The restriction is merely to prevent the arbitrary or excessive use of the right so as not to endanger a more sacred right namely the maintenance of the dignity and prestige of Courts of justice so as to create confidence in the public in the administration of justice. The law of contempt, therefore, answers the test of reasonableness as regards

- (1) the nature of the right infringed,
- (2) the purpose of the restriction,
- (3) the extent and urgency of the evil sought to be remedied thereby.

The nexus between the restriction (Law of Contempt) and the right of free speech is too clear to be further elaborated. The nature of the right of free speech in a Court of law or in relation to it is not absolute. It is circumscribed by the rules of procedure and the right of Courts to protect its dignity from the contemptuous onslaughts on it by any one acting under the guise of the exercise of freedom of speech. The extent of the evil and the urgency to remedy the evil is also self-apparent.

We may, therefore, conclude that the Law of Contempt as it exists to-day in India by statute or by force of judicial decisions is quite reasonable. That is why the Constitution framers recognised in arts. 129 and 215 the existing powers of the Supreme Court and the High Courts in relation to contempt of Court. Article 19(2) would appear to recognise this also. The restriction referred in cl. (2) does not appear to be for the existing law of contempt but to any future law. Even if it is construed that the test of reasonableness can be applied to any phases of the existing law of contempt, we may say the above discussion points out to only one conclusion; that the law of contempt does conform to the test of reasonableness.

GLEANNINGS.

MASTER'S LIABILITY FOR SERVANT'S GOODS

THERE are plenty of decisions on a master's liability in respect of personal injury suffered by a servant but few in regard to goods of the servant lost or damaged in the course of employment. We may conveniently sub-divide the matter under headings as below.

THEFT

The general rule is that a master is not under a duty to prevent the theft of a servant's goods: an attempt to make him liable was unsuccessfully made in Deyong v. Shenburn, [1946] K.B. 227, where the plaintiff was employed as an artiste to play Widow Twankey and to provide his own costume. He left the costume in the theatre after a dress rehearsal and it was apparently stolen owing to a defective lock on the dressing-room door. One wonders what value it had to the thief. The plaintiff put his claim on the basis of an "unsafe system of work," thereby inviting the Court to enlarge that concept from personal injury to property, but the Court of Appeal refused to do so. The same rule has been applied in the case of a claim against an occupier on the ground that loss of goods means that the premises are "dangerous". The Court of Appeal in Tinsley v. Dudley, [1951] 2 K.B. 18 (following Ashby v. Tolhurst, [1937] 2 K.B. 242), rejected the argument that where an invitation is extended to an invitee it extends to his goods so as to imply a duty to protect the goods against theft as well as against danger arising from the state of the premises. It is considered that the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, which by s. 1(3)(b) extends the common duty of care to goods, does not alter this position.

By contrast, there is a duty to take reasonable care of a lodger's goods imposed on a landlady of a boarding house, but where a servant "lives in" there is no corresponding duty on the part of the master to take the care which a boarding-house keeper would be required to take (Edwards v. West Herts Group Hospital Management Committee, [1957] 1 W.L.R. 415).

There is, however, one exception, and possibly two. In the case of a factory within the Factories Acts, 1937-48, it is enacted by s. 43(1) that adequate and suitable accommodation for clothing not worn during working hours must be provided. In McCarthy v. Daily Mirror Newspapers, Ltd., [1949] 1 All E.R. 801, it was held that in considering whether accommodation is suitable the employer must take into account the possibility of theft. The second exception which may possibly be operative was mentioned in Deyong v. Shenburn, supra, namely, that there may be a duty on a master to take care to prevent theft of tools of a workman left on the employer's premises.

The master will, however, be indirectly liable for theft or other wrongful deprivation amounting to conversion where the act is an act by another servant committed in the course of his employment even though the act be done for the wrongdoer's personal benefit only and not for the benefit of the master (Lloyd v. Grace, Smith & Co., [1912] A.C. 716).

DAMAGE

Another passage in Deyong v. Shenburn propounds the view, obiter, that there may be a duty on a master to prevent damage to clothing as much as to the person of a servant. "If through such a breach his clothes are torn off his back and he suffers no personal injury he may be entitled to recover damages...", said du Parc, L.J.

There is an interesting passage by the learned Lord Justice on the limitations of Donoghue v. Stevenson (which had been cited in argument). His Lordship said: "It is not true to say that wherever a man finds himself in such a position that unless he does a certain thing another person may suffer, or that if he does something another person will suffer, then it is his duty in the one case to be careful to do the act and in the other case to be careful not to do the act. Any such proposition is much too wide. There has to be a breach of duty which the law recognises, and to ascertain what the law recognises regard must be had to the decisions of the Courts." At the same time it is submitted that the latter part of this passage is not a ground for pleading novelty as a defence.

BAILMENT

Whether a bailment arises between master and servant in regard to the servant's property brought on to the employer's premises must depend on the facts of the case, and it will often be difficult to be sure about this. A bailment requires an acceptance by the bailee, so that goods brought on to the premises without the knowledge of the master would not be within the concept of bailment, but the question arises whether knowledge will sometimes be implied. Suppose a master provides a cycle rack for cycles: it may well be that there is a bailment of such cycles as are placed in the rack by anyone properly using the premises.

The duty of a bailee whether gratuitous or not is generally regarded as a duty to take such care as in the circumstances may reasonably be expected (Newman v. Bourne & Hollingsworth, [1915] 31 T.L.R. 209). He is not liable for accidents not caused by his negligence or the negligence of persons for whom he is responsible, but he is liable if he deviates from the terms of the bailment.

AS OCCUPIER

The duty of a master as an occupier of premises towards his servant in regard to dangers in the premises is apparently the common duty of care by virtue of the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, both in regard to goods and personal injury. This follows from the following considerations:

1. Section 5(1) says that where persons enter premises or bring goods to them in the exercise of a right conferred by contract, the duty owed them in respect of damage due to the state of the premises, in so far as the duty depends on a term to be implied in the contract by reason of its conferring that right, shall be the common duty of care. This appears applicable to servants, but it does not apply to contracts made before the commencement of the Act.

2. Section 1(3)(b) lays down that the rules enacted in relation to an occupier of premises and his visitors shall "apply...in respect of damage to property..."

This duty may be hived off on to the landlord where the master is a tenant and a danger arises by the landlord's failure to repair in accordance with a covenant to do so (s. 4).

NOTICES LIMITING OR EXCLUDING LIABILITY

It is an interesting question whether a master can limit his liability to his servant by a warning notice (whether in respect of danger to person or property). It is a fundamental rule of the law of contract that a notice may form part of a contract provided that it came to the knowledge of the other party (or ought to have come to his knowledge as a reasonable man) before the contract was concluded. But it is submitted that that rule has no application to the present problem: a warning notice for this purpose is a means of complying with the duty of care and not a term of any contract. But where there has been a breach the action could presumably be founded in tort rather than in contract and the question would then arise whether a warning notice was part of a contract to bar actions in tort.

The solution would seem to be this: that there are two kinds of notice. There is the notice which says "We will not be responsible for this, that or the other," which is meant to be a term or condition on which the premises are to be used, and the notice which says "Warning: this floor is dangerous, go the other way" which may be a sufficient compliance with the duty of care. —S.J.

A POINT ON CRUELTY

Those who are called up to advise in matters relating to divorce will wish to note the case of Clark v. Clark, (1958), The Times, June 25, where the Court of Appeal refused to grant a decree in favour of the wife on the ground of her husband's alleged cruelty, with which the decision of Mr. Commissioner McKee in Ward v. Ward, [1958] 1 W.L.R. 693, should be compared. In Clark v. Clark, supra, the petitioner maintained that her husband "ceased and refused to have sexual intercourse... and did so deliberately, notwithstanding her frequent protestations and requests that sexual intercourse should take place between them, and in the knowledge that by his refusal he was causing her great distress and unhappiness," and contended that on this ground alone she was entitled to dissolution of her marriage which had previously been consummated. Counsel for the petitioner admitted that he had not been able to find a case where refusal of sexual intercourse had been the main or only issue to be considered. Hodson, L.J., accepted the medical evidence that the wife was suffering from "sex starvation" but thought that this did necessarily mean that her petition should succeed. His Lordship cited Kaslofsky v. Kaslofsky, [1951] P. 38, where Bucknill, L.J., had said, in a case where the wife had refused sexual intercourse, that her husband could not rely on this fact in support of his petition on the ground of cruelty unless he could show that she had refused "because she knew it would injure his health and because she wished to inflict unnecessary pain and suffering on him." Denning, L.J., endorsed this view by saying that the husband must prove that the wife's conduct was "aimed at" him in so far as her actions or words were actually or physically directed at him. In Clark v. Clark, supra, the Court upheld the decision of Judge Howard, who had refused a decree because, in his opinion, the husband might not have refused sexual intercourse with a view to being cruel to his wife; there might have been a number of other explanations. It would seem that to have held that in such circumstances the petitioner should be awarded a decree regardless of motive would have established refusal of sexual intercourse as a matrimonial offence in the legal sense.—S.J.

CHANGE OF CHRISTIAN NAME

As frequently happens where doctors give newly born children little chance of survival, a hospital chaplain was recently called in to christen twin girls and he chose the names Ann and Sarah. Happily the twins did not die, but the parents thought that the names which their children had been given by the chaplain were old-fashioned and sought, unsuccessfully, to have them baptised again in the names Dawn and Marlene. Perhaps the clearest statement of the law governing the alteration of Christian names may be found in Re Parrott: Cox v. Parrott, [1946] 1 Ch. 183, and the judgment of Vaisey, J., in that case confirms that nobody can alter or part with a Christian name by deed poll. However, a Christian name may be legally changed by Act of Parliament or by exercise of a bishop's discretionary powers on confirmation, as explained in Phillimore's Ecclesiastical Law, 2nd ed., vol. 1, at p. 517, and illustrated in Coke's Institutes 1, 3a. A third possibility is the "adding" of a name on adoption, but his Lordship regarded this method as anomalous. In the case of the twins, although the use of one of these methods was unlikely to have been a practical possibility, the law did not completely frustrate the wishes of the parents as the registrar concerned agreed to accept the names Dawn and Marlene as additional to Ann and Sarah, presumably acting under the powers vested in him by s. 13 of the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1953. There may also be instances where a Christian name may be added, but not substituted, by use and reputation.—S.J.

AN EYE FOR AN EYE!

WE do not agree with Lord Goddard that the function of the criminal law is deterrence and not reform. Obviously deterrence is a factor, and a most important one, in our penal code, but in our opinion it is part of the duty of the Courts to take into account the prospects of reformation. In the narrow sense it is arguable that sentences of imprisonment protect the public in two ways; the threat deters and the imposition prevents, but the problem is deeper than this. The best protection for the public is to turn criminals into honest men—or honest enough not to fall foul of the law. The Courts would be failing in their duty if they were not to take into account the possibility or otherwise of permanently protecting the public by treating an offender in such a way that he does not offend again. It is a question of balancing the probabilities. At one end of the scale it is usually wrong to allow liberty to a dangerous and hardened criminal merely because of the outside chance that in favourable conditions he might reform. At the other end it is usually wrong to sentence to imprisonment a first offender, even though guilty of a serious crime, merely pour encourager les autres. It may well be that the function of the Courts should finish with conviction or acquittal and that sentencing should be entrusted to others, but so long as the system remains as it is the Courts cannot evade their responsibilities. We can agree with Lord Goddard that the causes of crime are the same as in the days of the Old Testament. It does not follow that the remedies should be the same.—S.J.

DAMAGES

THE principle that one who proves breach of a bargain is to be placed, as far as money can do it, in as good a situation as if the contract had been performed applies just as much to cases of hiring as to cases of sale of goods: so held by the Court of Appeal (Jenkins, Parker and Pearce, L.JJ.), reversing Pilcher, J., in Interoffice Telephones, Limited v. Robert Freeman Company, Limited, (1957) 3 All E. R. 479). Where, therefore, the plaintiffs had contracted to supply on a twelve-year rental basis interoffice telephone equipment to the defendants and the latter, on moving to other premises already so equipped, repudiated the contract, it was wrong to take into account the profits which the plaintiffs might have made by hiring out the same equipment to others during the period. There was no lack of such equipment and a notional re-hiring would not have diminished the loss sustained by the plaintiffs, since the substituted customer would be taking on hire the equipment taken back from the defendants instead of other equipment which the plaintiffs could have supplied. In so holding the Court of Appeal applied the principle stated by Buckley, L.J., in In re Vic Mill, Limited, (108 L.T. Rep. 25; [1913] 1 Ch. 183; affd. ibid. 465). It was doubtful whether the learned Judge had ever been referred to this case, and he had not had the advantage of seeing the decision of the Court of Appeal in Charter v. Sullivan, ([1957] 1 All E.R. 809), which had been given only a day before his own judgment.

The Court of Appeal seldom interferes with the amount of damages awarded by a trial Judge and will only do so when it is of opinion that the Judge has proceeded on an entirely erroneous basis. Nevertheless, the beginning of the judicial year witnessed three decisions by the Court of Appeal in which this was done. In one of them, Phillips v. Price, (The Times, 30th October), the damages were reduced; in two of them, Wilson v. Pilley, ([1957] 3 All E.R. 525), and Clarke v. E. R. Wright and Son, ([1957] 3 All E.R. 486), they were increased. In estimating the appropriateness of the amount awarded, an important factor would seem to be the permanence or otherwise of the injury in question.—L.T.

EVIDENCE

ONE of the questions in Corko v. Corko, ([1958] 1 All E.R. 224)—a husband's petition and a wife's cross-petition for divorce—was whether the wife had committed adultery. Immediately after the occasion on which adultery was alleged to have taken place the wife, at the co-respondent's suggestion, telephoned her doctor asking him to examine her. The doctor refused on the ground that any evidence he could give would be valueless. Mr. Commissioner Blanco White, Q.C., was assisted in coming to the conclusion that the wife was innocent by her statements on the occasion of this request. The Court of Appeal (Hodson and Sellers, L.JJ., Morris, L.J., dissenting) held that the evidence should not have been admitted, since statements made by the wife subsequent to the alleged adultery and in the absence of her husband were of no probative value. The wife's conduct and statements revealed at most consciousness of innocence that the doctor would not find any physical proof of guilt. Morris, L.J., dissented on the ground that, if the wife and co-respondent genuinely believed that any immediate examination by a doctor could or might establish whether they had recently had intercourse, their willingness to submit to such examination ought not to be regarded as irrelevant. The weight of such evidence was for the trial Judge. The appeal was dismissed, the Court holding that adultery had not been proved, apart from the evidence in question.

In Alderman v. Alderman, ([1958] 1 All E.R. 391), Sachs, J., held that an admission of adultery made by an infant co-respondent to an inquiry agent, after having been cautioned, could be given in evidence in a husband's petition for divorce, and in granting a decree costs were awarded against the co-respondent. His Lordship observed that no authority of any sort had been quoted to him in aid of the submission that an infant's admissions made before commencement of proceedings should be excluded from evidence in matrimonial causes or that they should not be given whatever weight the Court might consider it proper to attribute to them; nor could his Lordship find any reason on general principle why there should be a rule of that nature.—L.T.

HIGHWAY

In Baxter v. Stockton-on-Tees Corporation, ([1958] 2 All E.R. 675), the Court of Appeal (Jenkins, Parker and Pearce, L.JJ.), reversing Barry, J., held that a widow was not entitled to damages in respect of the death of her husband from injuries sustained by him when riding a motor bicycle as a result of coming into collision at mid-night with the kerb of an approach island in the roadway. The road had been constructed by a county council and taken over under s. 82 of the Local Government Act, 1929, by the defendant corporation. The former was not entitled to relief in respect of non-feasance, since an authority which constructed a roadway under statutory powers was not in relation to this immunity in the same position as an owner dedicating his land to the public as a highway. There was no dedication here: the way was public from first to last. Such a public authority was under a positive duty to take reasonable care to construct the road properly. But an authority which took over the road, as had the corporation in this case, was only liable for non-feasance and the action should have been held to fail in limine on that footing. The theory that the corporation inherited from the council the duty to light or provide some other form of warning was untenable having regard to Nash v. Rochford Rural Council, (116 L.T. Rep. 129; [1917] 1 K.B. 384). Works of this kind could not be classed as maintenance; and, if they could, the doctrine of immunity for non-feasance would prevail.

Section 35(1) of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, provides: "All vaults, arches, and cellars under any street, and all openings into such vaults, arches, or cellars in the surface of any street, and all cellar-heads, gratings, lights, and coal holes in the surface of any street, and all landings, flags, or stones of the path or street supporting the same respectively, shall be kept in good condition and repair by the owners or occupiers of the same, or of the houses or buildings to which the same respectively belong." In MacFarlane v. Gwialter, ([1958] 1 All E.R. 181), the Court of Appeal (Lord Evershed, M.R., Romer and Ormerod, L.JJ.), reversing Judge Glazebrook, held that one who was injured as the result of the dangerous condition of a grating which had formed part of the highway at the time of dedication was entitled to damages at the hands of the occupier of the property to the cellar window of which it admitted light. The grating was to the knowledge of the occupier in bad condition and it constituted a dangerous trap. The Court rejected the arguments (1) that the above quoted sub-section applied only to structures which had not been the subject of dedication; (2) that, if the grating had been the subject of dedication, it was wrong to introduce a "middle term" rendering the occupier liable since the local authority would not have been liable in the absence of misfeasance.—L.T.

MASTER'S DUTY TO SERVANT INJURED BY DEFECTIVE PREMISES OF A THIRD PARTY

THE extent of a master's duty towards his servant and what will suffice to discharge that duty has recently been much litigated. The purpose of this article is to examine the position when the master directs the servant to carry out work on premises occupied by a third party.

Three decisions by Courts of first instance first require consideration. In Taylor v. Sims and Sims, (167 L.T. Rep. 414; [1942] 2 All E.R. 375), an employee of a firm of contractors was under orders to repair the roof of a bomb-damaged house. He was seriously injured owing to the collapse of the floor, which had been tested almost immediately after the explosion and was then thought to be safe. Lewis, J., experienced very great difficulty in imposing a duty on the master to see that premises over which he has no control whatever are reasonably safe for the servant whom he orders to work there. He thought it "a very curious proposition that, when a householder asks a contractor to come in and paint his house, unless the contractor goes over the whole house to see that every floor is safe or takes reasonable steps to see that the house is safe, he, the contractor, is liable if the floor collapses and one of his workmen is injured." But, if the master was under any duty, it had in any event been discharged.

It will be seen that three issues are involved:—

- (1) Whether the master owes any duty at all in such circumstances.
- (2) Whether the duty, if he has one, is to see that the premises are reasonably safe.

(3) Whether, although some duty is owed, it is less stringent than this, and what standard of care will be required to avoid a breach of the duty.

The matter was again considered in Cilia v. H. M. James and Sons, ([1954] 2 All E.R. 9). A plumber's mate was employed by the defendants to carry out installation work on the ground floor of an unoccupied house. During the operation the storage tank in the loft above began to overflow, and when the mate went up to remedy this he was electrocuted owing to a defective electric conduit covered by steel plates. An action was brought against the master to recover damages on behalf of the estate and under the Fatal Accidents Acts, and it was alleged that the master had been negligent in failing to inspect the loft.

Byrne, J., expressed his entire agreement with the view that "the employer was under no duty, having regard to the fact that his workman was not to work on the employer's premises... to take all reasonable steps to see that the premises were reasonably safe." As he robustly observed: "I cannot imagine that we have yet reached the stage, if a householder finds that his storage tank in the loft is overflowing and there is obviously something wrong with the ball-cock or the valve, and he, therefore, sends for his builder and tells him that he wants a plumber to attend to this, that the builder would then have to go into the house and test every electric point and, perhaps, see whether the roof of the loft was quite safe or whether it was likely to fall in when the plumber went up to attend to the tank. Among other things it would, I should have thought, make attention to a ball-cock a prohibitive item for any householder." It would, of course, be otherwise if the builder was aware of the danger.

In Hodgson v. British Arc Welding Company, Limited, (174 L. T. Rep. 379; [1946] 1 All E. R. 95), on the other hand, Hilbery, J., assumed that the master did owe a duty as regards the safety of the premises, although on the facts of the case it had been discharged. There a welder employed by sub-contractors was injured by falling from a defective plank, which formed part of scaffolding erected inside a ship by experienced shipwrights who were the head contractors for the repair of the ship. The contention that the sub-contractors ought to have inspected each separate piece of scaffolding was not accepted. The master could not be blamed for neglecting to "inspect with the eye of an ignorant person the work which was being done with the eye of knowledge and skill."

Law Lib.
Acc. No. 7246

The master's liability has now been reviewed by the Court of Appeal in Wilson v. Tyneside Window Cleaning Company, ([1958] 2 All E.R. 265), in which a window cleaner of great experience unsuccessfully sued his master in respect of injuries received when the handle of a window by which he was supporting himself while cleaning came away. The injured man had often cleaned this window before; he knew the woodwork was unsound and that it was unsafe to trust to handles, but he had not been specifically instructed about the danger of using handles, nor given general safety instructions except that if a window presented unusual difficulty he was to obtain further orders before proceeding. The Court of Appeal held that in all circumstances the master owes a duty to take reasonable care for the safety of his men, but the performance of the duty must vary with the facts of the case. In support of the duty the Court placed reliance on its own previous decision in Biddle v. Hart, (97 L. T. Rep. 66; [1907] 1 K. B. 649), where a stevedores' workman unloading a ship was injured because the tackle used for the purpose, which had been supplied by a third party, was defective. It was held that the master owed a duty in respect of the tackle.

With respect, it may be pointed out that the decision related to the plant which was actually being used in the work done, and not to premises which were incidental to the work done. This distinction would appear to be recognised by Buckley, L.J., who says of one of the judgments in the Court below: "This sentence implies that in this case there is found plant which is outside the region for which the employer would be responsible. I agree that this is so if the plant was not connected with or used in the business of the employer." And Farwell, L.J., thought that the master could not succeed in Biddle v. Hart "unless he can induce us to affirm the proposition that anyone who uses tackle ... which is gratuitously lent to him is not bound to take reasonable care to see that that tackle is in proper condition." This seems a long way from the situation in Wilson v. Tyneside Window Cleaning Company.

While the extension of the master's duty does give rise to a more flexible test, it may not be improper to hope that the standard of care required will not be unduly rigorous, and that practical considerations of feasibility and relative expense will be given full weight. It seems clear that the duty does not extend, as had been argued, to ensuring that the premises of the third party are as safe as reasonable skill and care can make them. Nor will a detailed preliminary inspection by the master always be necessary, as, for instance, when a plumber sends his servant to mend a leak in a private house (per Pearce, L.J., in Wilson v. Tyneside Window Cleaning Company). "A window cleaning employer cannot, for example, be expected to lay out the job window by window," as Parker, L.J., pointed out in Drummond v. British Building Cleaners, Limited, ([1954] 3 All E.R. 507). Other relevant points are that the master must take additional care as regards his system of working when the men are ordered to work on premises which he does not occupy, and he must in general accept the risk if he instructs them to work in damaged or dilapidated buildings which cannot be made safe. It is not, however, necessary that he should give repeated and frequent warnings of a danger which is obvious to the men, although it is otherwise if the danger is insidious and concealed.—L.T.

OUT OF COURT

THE Society's Distinguished Speaker this year was Lord Monckton, who took as his subject "The Lawyer out of Court," and was largely concerned with the strength and weaknesses which are apt to characterise members of the profession in the political field. A lawyer who went into politics, he indicated, reaped the advantage of one who had subjected himself to the discipline necessitated by the obligation to present his case before a tribunal at a stated time on a named day. A lawyer must have had to work and think. Lord Monckton expressed himself as driven to the conclusion that many who had escaped the discipline of the law or some similar educative discipline were deficient in those things. It was good not to be at liberty to express views loosely or at large. Moreover, the lawyer became "an expert in finding the common ground, at locating the fruitful basis for co-operation." In those words Mr. John J. McCloy, the distinguished American lawyer, statesman and business man, had rightly fastened on the lawyer's role in effecting compromise.

On the other hand, the lawyer in the political field appeared, superficially at least, to be at a disadvantage because he saw more clearly than some others both sides of the question, and that might make him hesitant and undecisive. He must also overcome the handicap of being regarded as legalistic, even pettifogging, in his approach and of being too fluent to carry the conviction of sincerity. He must overcome too the disadvantage of having been confined by the dictates of his brief, which were not conducive to creative, comprehensive thought and action. Lord Monckton described the 19th century as a thin period for the lawyer statesman, but recalled that the present century has seen greatness come to many lawyers. Nevertheless, it seemed that lawyers were still unpopular in the House of Commons, at least compared with America, where in the 85th Congress lawyers had a representation of 61 per cent. in the House of Representatives and 59 per cent. in the Senate. After the last general election 19 per cent. of the members of the House of Commons were lawyers. Lord Monckton's theme is capable of almost indefinite expansion. Many lawyers are conscious of the ills to which he referred and to which they are exposed by the daily pursuit of an exacting profession. With them, as with those immersed in other professional activities, technical competence is apt to breed a myopic outlook. But qualities of vision and character, and the sense of proportion they engender, will find recognition in all fields and are of no less value within the legal profession than beyond it. These are the hallmarks of the distinguished practitioner of law no less than of the lawyer who makes his mark in the political arena.—L.T.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND PRECEDENT

THE position occupied by the House of Lords in the judicial hierarchy invests it with a notional inerrancy, which involves as a logical consequence the principle that the House is bound by its own decisions. It is hardly surprising that the strict application of precedent occasionally gives rise to difficulty. It involved, for example, in Nash (Inspector of Taxes) v. Topham and Sons Brewery (Brighton), Limited, [(1951) 2 All E.R. 869], a consideration of the ratio decidendi in Usher's Wiltshire Brewery, Limited v. Bruce, [(1915) A.C. 433], a fact which drew from Lord Reid the observations that it was "very unsatisfactory to have to grope for a decision in this way" but that the need to do so arose from the fact that the House of Lords had debarred itself from ever reconsidering any of its own decisions. It mattered not how difficult it was to find the ratio decidendi of a previous case, that ratio must be found. It mattered not how difficult it was to reconcile that ratio when found with statutory provisions or general principles, that ratio must be applied to any later case which was not reasonably distinguishable.

Recently, in London Transport Executive v. Betts (The Times, June 26) the House of Lords regarded itself as bound by its decision in Potteries Electric Traction Company, Limited v. Bailey, [(1931) A.C. 151], to conclude that an omnibus depot was not an "industrial hereditament" qualifying for relief from rates under s. 3(1) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928. The basis of the argument against this conclusion was that maintenance did not include repairs but only included such minor operations as oiling, greasing, inflating tyres and perhaps making adjustments and cleaning. The structure and wording of s. 3, Lord Reid observed, were such that at first sight this argument was attractive. He could not, however, accept it because it was not consistent with the decision of the House in the Potteries case. It had long been established practice, he said, that any decision of the House in a previous case on a question of law, such as the interpretation of a statute, should be regarded as binding, and should be followed, whether or not the question was adequately argued or considered, and however much their Lordships might disagree with the decision. He would not himself be against a modification of this strict practice, but so long as it existed, he did not think he was entitled to depart from it.—L.T.

PRIVILEGED DOCUMENTS: LITIGATION

THE subject of the recent decision of Havers J., in Seabrook v. British Transport Commission (The Times, July 9, 1958) was a series of documents consisting of accident reports and returns made by the defendants' officers and servants and correspondence passing between them relating to an accident in which the plaintiff's husband was killed. The dead man's widow, his administratrix, sued the defendants for negligence and breach of statutory duty as her husband's employers. The question arose on discovery. The defendants objected to producing the documents, which included a statement by a fellow worker of the deceased, on the grounds that they were made by their officers or servants after litigation was in contemplation and in view of any such litigation wholly or mainly for the purpose of obtaining and furnishing to the defendants' solicitor evidence and information to enable him to conduct the defence of any action that might result.

The plaintiff submitted that the documents came into existence as a result of a well established system of inquiries, which were made irrespective of contemplated litigation, and that although they might have had a subsidiary purpose that, if a claim were threatened, they should be submitted to the defendants' solicitor, that was not their main or dominant purpose. To be privileged, it was argued, the substantial purpose of the documents must be their submission to the defendants' solicitor. This view did not commend itself to the learned Judge, who stated that even if the documents were made for purposes other than submission to a solicitor, and even if the latter purpose was not the primary one for the documents' existence, the documents in this case were privileged. His Lordship observed that in these days whenever a fatal accident occurred it was probable that a claim would ensue. In the result his Lordship upheld Master Clayton, who held the document to be privileged, but gave leave to appeal.—L.T.

VIOLENCE PROVOKED BY NAGGING

IN King v. King, [(1952) 2 All E.R. 584], Lord Normand said: "The general rule in all questions of cruelty is that the whole matrimonial relations must be considered and that rule is of special value when the cruelty consists not of violent acts but of injurious reproaches, complaints, accusations or taunts. Wilful accusations may be made which are not true and for which there are no probable grounds and yet they may not amount to cruelty. To take an obvious example, they may have been provoked by the cruel conduct of the other spouse." This passage dealt with the converse of the position considered by a Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division (Lord Merriman, P., and Collingwood, J.) in Douglas v. Douglas (The Times, November 20), where the Court rejected the argument that nagging and words could never justify any form of violence. The wife appealed against the dismissal by magistrates of a summons against her husband in which she had alleged persistent cruelty, and the Court held that nagging could be made the basis of a plea of provocation for violence.

Another argument advanced on behalf of the wife which the Court rejected was that, because persistent cruelty was, in a magistrate's Court, a subject of complaint by a wife and was not yet a subject of complaint by a husband, the Court ought not to take into account such matters as nagging by the wife or anything which might be a matter of complaint by a husband in the Divorce Court, in considering the question of provocation to any form of physical violence. Lord Merriman, P., stated that this argument overlooked the fundamental point that cruelty, save for the element of persistence, which was necessary in magistrates' Courts, was, in every other respect, subject to precisely the same test, whether the matter was dealt with in the High Court or a magistrate's Court. A third argument was that even in the Divorce Court nagging could be made a matter of substantive complaint in an answer or cross-petition but could not be made the basis of a plea of provocation in connection with an allegation of violence. The answer to that was that nothing less than all the circumstances, on both sides, had to be considered before the issue of cruelty could be answered.—L.T.

ADVICE TO STUDENTS

Not only those about to go to university but also graduates whose examination days are far behind them may have been surprised to read Professor H. L. Elvin's advice to a group of young people about to enter a university for the first time. He is reported to have told them to "cut as many lectures as possible" in view of the "terrible danger that you will go to as many as possible and believe that you've been working." He freely admitted that lectures are advantageous if matter not found in text-books is passed on to students and the lecturer is able to bring the subject to life in a quite unusual way, but if the lecturer gives only what may be found in the books which the student should read for himself, in the opinion of Professor Elvin, who is the director designate of the Institution of Education in the University of London, those lectures should be avoided. He believes that too many students go to lectures for the purpose of evading "hard personal reading." Many students may also have been pleasantly surprised by Professor Elvin's contention that if they work for ten hours a day they will probably get a third, if they work for six hours, a second, but if they work for four hours they stand a good chance of getting a first. In making this suggestion he is in good company. Many years ago John Locke formed a similar view and said that "the great art of learning is to undertake but little at a time." However, whatever form "work" may take and for whatever time it may last, we doubt whether the majority of students in the faculty of laws will act upon Professor Elvin's advice and rely on their own reading of text-books and law reports for the purpose of passing their examinations. The wisdom of his advice cannot be questioned, but we wonder how many law students will be wise enough to arrange and conduct their studies in accordance with it.—S.J.

NEGLIGENCE: INJURY FROM GOLF BALL

We are indebted to an American reader for a brief note on a decision given by the Michigan Supreme Court at Lansing in a case in which a small boy, aged seven, while playing about on a municipal golf course was struck by a golf ball and so injured that he lost his right eye. His parents sued the municipality concerned, but lost the action on the ground that the boy had been warned against playing on the course and thus stood in the role of a trespasser. On appeal the High Court gave judgment for the plaintiffs holding that the warning to the child was not sufficient, and one of the Judges of the Court expressed the view that a child was far too valuable to society to hold that trespass cancelled any legal duty otherwise owed to him by a landowner who knew of the danger in which the child was placed. Whether that decision will be followed by other Courts in the United States remains to be seen. As far as this country is concerned, the legal position of a child who is trespassing is so unsatisfactory and the authorities are so tangled and complex (see the article at [1954] 104 L.J. 675) that it would be difficult to predict how a case of this kind would be decided here; an unsuccessful attempt to deal with this problem by statute was made when the Bill leading to the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, was before the House of Lords. It is, perhaps, also remarkable that there are very few reported cases dealing with injuries on golf courses. In Castle v. St. Augustine's Links, ([1922] 38 T.L.R. 615), judgment was given for the plaintiff, a taxicab driver, who was injured by a golf ball struck from the course on to the adjoining public highway, but the case's main claim to fame rests securely on the fact that it provides judicial authority for the proposition that "everybody who plays golf slices at times". In Cleghorn v. Oldham, ([1927] 43 T.L.R. 465), the plaintiff was injured when the defendant struck her with her club while demonstrating a correct swing. Swift, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff. A more recent decision is Potter v. Carlisle and Cliftonville Golf Club, Ltd., ([1939] N.I. 114), where the plaintiff, whilst putting on a green was struck by a ball driven by another player from an adjoining tee and lost the sight of an eye. The action against the club failed on the ground, inter alia, that the injury which the plaintiff received was due to a risk of the game, yet in Batcliffe v. Whitehead, ([1933] 3 W.W.R. 447), a Canadian decision on almost identical facts, the defendant was found guilty of negligence and thus could not escape liability on the ground that the plaintiff had accepted the risks incidental to the game.—L.J.

REVIEWS.

Company Law. By F. R. GINWALLA, B.A., LL.B. BOMBAY: N. M. Tripathi Private Ltd., Princess Street. Demi 8vo. Pages LVI+211. Price Rs. 10.

THIS is a very instructive and interesting monograph on the Indian Companies Act. Part I explains the economic aspect of the Act, Part II analyses the report of the Companies Act Amendment Committee. The sections are adjusted in accordance with changes proposed in the report. The case law which is restricted to the Companies Act of 1956 is fully dealt with in Appendix 3, and is arranged in the order of sections of the Act. Precision and lucidity have been the chief characteristics of the annotations. The anomalies and infirmities in the Act have been clearly pointed out. There are two Appendices dealing with technical details. The learned author has discussed the various aspects of the Company Law with great clarity and sound judgment. The book is bound to be very helpful to legislators when the new Company Bill comes on the legislative anvil.

The Special Marriage Act, 1954. By D. H. CHAUDHARI, B.Sc., LL.B., Pleader. CALCUTTA. Eastern Law House (Private) Ltd., 54, Ganesh Chunder Avenue. 1958. Second Edition. Size: Demi 8vo. Pages vii+340. Price Rs. 8.

IN preparing this edition the learned author has incorporated at appropriate places cases decided after the publication of the first edition and has also added fresh matter in some of the notes. Rules framed by some High Courts and State Governments have been given in the Appendices. The book has undergone a thorough and careful revision.

A Bibliography of Indian Law. Edited by CHARLES HENRY ALEXANDROWIEZ. LONDON. Oxford University Press. Amen House. 1958. Size: Demi 8vo. Pages ix+69. Price Rs. 4.50.

THIS is a first systematic bibliography of Indian law comprising treatises and text books published in the course of the last twenty-five years. It is arranged according to different topics of law in order to facilitate easy reference. The book will serve as a useful guide to legal practitioners and law students.

THE DEFINITION OF RELIGION IN INDIAN LAW.

An example of the as yet uneasy blending of Indian and foreign legal ideas is the problem of the Court's jurisdiction to define 'religion' and to determine the content of a particular religion. This is a fit subject to be written upon by a Christian, since Christians in Europe and Commonwealth countries generally are heirs to acute and at times highly embarrassing controversies on the nature of law and religion and the relationship between them. Christians can easily detect the penetration into Indian legal history, and into the customary attitudes amongst lawyers, of certain compromises which were worked out in Europe—compromises which were beneficial to countries torn by civil strife, but not necessarily relevant to modern India. A Christian may safely write on the legal aspects of non-Christian faiths, without fear of being suspected of hidden motives, or of trespassing upon topics where specialised, and in particular traditional, learning would be appropriate.

There seems to be a distressing conflict of decisions, or, to be more accurate, of the rationes underlying the decisions, on this subject. Problems have arisen in the fields of constitutional law, in the law of charities (both from the fiscal and the testamentary standpoints), and in the law relating to State supervision of trusts. It is not inconceivable that similar difficulties may arise in other contexts, particularly where privileges are awarded to persons possessing, or to persons other than those possessing, religious qualifications.¹ In the Hindu law we have latent difficulties where rights are lost by reason of conversion, or of ceasing to be a Hindu by religion.² The whole problem is complicated by the fact that whereas deep religious feelings are daily drawing together thinking people of all sects and religions, the mass of the public (as is always the case) is gradually discarding its superstitions, and with them its only genuine contact with religion. Each succeeding generation is less superstitious, less concerned with irrational ceremonies and taboos, and at the same time more materialistic and impatient of any restraints which religious teaching would impose on its freedom. In India the ancient plasticity of dogma, the tendencies towards sectarianism and at the same time syncretism, are in danger of giving way to the current tendencies which not only deny authority to the Vedas and the sutras, but also (unlike the Buddhists of old) are utterly indifferent to the old inducements, namely the avoidance of sin and rebirth, and the attainments of supersensory merit.

Constitutionally India attempts to be a secular State: in fact she is a multi-religious State tending towards a secular State. The intention of the founders of the Constitution was that no State advancement should be given to any religion, that no one should be penalised for his religion, that religion should not be the criterion in the selection of candidates for State employment, and that—to put it in homely language—religion should be a matter for the individual conscience, a question between Man and his Maker, and not a potential source of conflict between the citizen and the State. No one who has read the Indian

* 1. See Narayan Waktu v. Punjabrao, (1958) 60 Bom. L. R. 776.

2. There are, to the common lawyer's eye, far too many discriminations against persons leaving Hinduism in the Acts forming the Hindu Code. That in the Hindu Succession

Act, 1956, against the descendants of a convert seem inappropriate in a secular State, particularly in view of the fact that a Christian may be succeeded on intestacy by relations who are Hindus: Benoy Kumar v. Panolamba, [1958] A.I.R. Cal. 177.

Law Reports for the past dozen years can feel that this intention has been happily carried through, either by Legislatures inspired by pious fervour, or by Courts who have had the very painful and delicate duty of accommodating religious sentiments with the letter of the law and the plain intention of the founding fathers of the Constitution. It is easy to find fault with decisions, but in this paper an attempt will be made to suggest a constructive doctrine and this is put forward in the confidence that the Constitution gives us a sure, as well as practical, guide.

First, what does the Constitution say about religion? We must cite once again the principal provisions.

"Art. 25. (1) Subject to public order, morality and health and to the other provisions of this Part, all persons are equally entitled to freedom of conscience and the right freely to profess, practise and propagate religion.

(2) Nothing in this article shall affect the operation of any existing law or prevent the State from making any law—

(a) regulating or restricting any economic, financial, political or other secular activity which may be associated with religious practice;

(b) providing for social welfare and reform or the throwing open of Hindu religious institutions of a public character to all classes and sections of Hindus. . .

Art. 28. Subject to public order, morality and health, every religious denomination or any section thereof shall have the right—

(a) to establish and maintain institutions for religious and charitable purposes;

(b) to manage its own affairs in matters of religion;

(c) to own and acquire movable and immovable property; and

(d) to administer such property in accordance with law."

Supreme Court decisions make it clear that here we have a scheme which takes advantage of the judicial experience gained in the United States, Australia and elsewhere, with the fortunate result that it is seldom necessary to go outside the words of the Articles for a definition of 'freedom of religion' as known in India.³ There is, however, an obvious loop-hole. It was found, though not much adverted to, in the very important case of M. H. Quareshi v. State of Bihar.⁴ Public order, morality, health, fundamental rights, and legislation concerning secular and political activities, etc., as well as reform of a social nature, such as the abolition of untouchability, etc., list finally the grounds and the means according to which freedom of religious profession and practice may be curtailed. This list is obviously taken from experience outside India, coupled with the experience gained by India during earlier days of British (and other European) rule. It must be remembered that 'religion' to Europeans, in so far as it applies to conduct, is concerned mostly with prohibitions. One must not eat this or that, one must not take certain oaths, one must not participate in certain ceremonies or secular activities.⁵ When Christians of particular sects began to claim that their

4. [1958] A.I.R. S.C. 731. It is to be observed that the composition of the Court, which consisted of four Judges besides the Chief Justice of India, did not include a Muslim.

5. Latham C.J.'s extremely able judgment in Adelaide Company of Jehovah's Witnesses Inc. v. The Commonwealth, (1943) 67 C.L.R. 116 at 123 and following—repeatedly approved in India—lays stress upon the fact that religion for many, and particular primitive and also non-western communities (at p. 125), implies positive conduct of a kind which may attract disapproval in modern societies. It is important to note that Art. 25 deliberately avoids the negative attitude towards the active content of religion revealed by s. 116 of the Australian Constitution Act, as understood by Latham C.J.: 'religion should, for political purposes, be regarded as irrelevant'. Whether or not religious activity is directed to 'anti-social' ends it is protected in India, unless the exceptions apply: in Australia the good citizen is presumed unlikely to indulge in anti-social acts sanctioned by religion; in India there is no comprehensive presumption regarding the acts sanctioned by religion, and the very concept of society's requirements may be open to debate. Consequently, the loop-hole is very important. A highly unpopular religious practice may be protected under art. 25, and cow-slaughter by Muslims for religious purposes is a splendid example.

religion required them to do rather than abstain from doing, it was inevitable that where they were a small minority their claims should be held invalid if they conflicted with State policy. The techniques adopted to achieve this solution differed in the United States, where a short way with religious pretensions is traditional (for the original colonists were intent not upon toleration so much as upon their various 'conscientious vagaries' being respected to this extent, that, subject to the law of the land, they should not suffer for their consciences), and in Australia, where the wording of the Constitution Act suggested a more liberal protection. But the outcome was the same. In India in the period 1772-1871 it was axiomatic amongst the European residents that Indians favoured in the name of religion practices which were obnoxious to Christians and in many cases possibly or certainly harmful to individuals and to the community in general. No one doubted that it was the duty of the government to suppress them. But action to prevent human sacrifices, religious suicides, offensive displays such as hook-swinging in the name of religion, sati, and other aberrations intended to awaken awe or religious zeal, was delayed because it was believed that Indian consciences might be hurt, and that civil unrest would result. In an age when the Europeans had little doubts of their own rectitude the claim that religion implied activity, doing as well as abstaining, was met by the proposition that the State could properly curtail freedom of activity, since the individual's conscience could hardly be hurt if his failures in the field of religious obligation were the result not of his own neglect, but of the State's inhibition. This attitude has been retained to some extent in modern times. Reformers have prohibited the dedication of devadasis (no doubt rightly) without anxiety as to the trespass upon religious doctrines; they have prohibited other activities such as child marriages, sometimes with the sanction of reformed religious beliefs. The reform of the Hindu law, and the (much qualified) abolition of untouchability, both affront religion as understood in India but the old European approach is maintained, on the ground that the majority can decide, and freedom of conscience is not affected. For example, the soulless man's freedom to believe that he ought to marry a second wife in the lifetime of the first is not affected by the State's rule that if he does so he will go to goal! So, illogical as it all is, it is settled that the State may interfere with religious practice for the reasons listed in arts. 25 and 26. But what of other interference with religious practice? Surely that is prohibited by the Constitution? It would seem from the Supreme Court case cited above that it is. And we have ample authority from other cases. The religious requirements that the inner sanctum of a temple should not be entered at certain times or at any time by unqualified persons, and also that certain properties should be dealt with in a particular way or that no property belonging to an endowment should be used for purposes other than those of the endowment itself, have been accepted as inviolable, notwithstanding well-meaning statutes. It was the intention of the promoters of anti-untouchability legislation that all temples should be open to all Hindus, and political movements from the pre-Independence days have sought to equate Hindus, Jains, Sikhs etc., as the wording of the second explanation to art. 25 (not cited above) indicates fairly clearly. Yet it has been held that Jain temples are not open to Harijans other than Jain Harijans (if any there be).⁶ There are, therefore, religious practices which cannot be interfered with by a Legislature, for they are not economic, financial, political or secular, nor have they come within the scope of legislation for social welfare, reform, or temple-entry. How, then, can one justify the Madras Animals and Birds Sacrifices Prohibition Act, 1950, an Act which aims to prevent Hindus from practising their religion by sacrificing animals or birds? Such sacrifices are unquestionably religious practices, although they are not approved by more 'respectable' sects of Hinduism. The sacrifice of a buffalo may not be regarded everywhere as a meritorious act, but can the Legislature inhibit such an act, seeing that it is not economic, financial, political, etc.⁷ The fundamental right to freedom of religion, it must be remembered, is intended for the protection of minorities and in particular unpopular minorities.⁷ The Madras Act has not been challenged because no prosecution has been brought against an offender sufficiently powerful to pursue the point. But the Acts passed to prohibit the slaughter of cattle impinged (as they were expected to impinge) upon a widespread, numerous, and respectable body of people, namely the Muslim butchers, who bought cows and buffaloes from Hindu dairymen, and the Muslim hide-and-gut-dealers who lived upon the proceeds of such slaughter. In the Animal-slaughter case it was decided that the prohibition of the slaughter of all cows was valid. This was notwithstanding the case for the butchers that art. 25 was infringed by the Acts in question.

The Supreme Court was very candid. That freedom of religion meant freedom to practise religion and to do acts extending far beyond mere expressions of belief was already established in unambiguous terms in The Commissioner, Hindu Religious Endowments, Madras v. Sri Lakshmindra Thirtha Swaminar of Sri Shirur Mutt,⁸ and in Ratilal Panachand Gandhi v. The State of Bombay.⁹ The American concept of religion as a mere question of belief was unhesitatingly rejected, and the sapient dicta of Latham C.J. in the High Court of Australia were approved.¹⁰ It is quite clear that in India the right to do what the religion commands is protected by the Constitution, unless contrary legislation is saved by one of the listed exceptions. It was perfectly clear that the sacrifice of a cow by a Muslim on Bakr-Id was a religious obligation. The obligation is expressed in some such form as this: for each person a sheep, or a cow or a camel for seven persons, or failing these animals or the means to acquire them, a gift in charity. Plainly where a cow was available the Muslim family had not merely a religious duty but a perfect right to have a cow slaughtered for them. If Muslim rulers at times, out of respect for Hindu sentiment, prohibited animal-slaughter, as Hindu rulers themselves did at times (but usually for stated periods only—soldiers and manual labourers at all times ate meat when they could get it), there is no proof that slaughter for bona fide religious purposes was forbidden—indeed the presumption is all the other way. Thus the Supreme Court were faced with a dilemma: either the religious duty was protected, in which case the Acts were invalid even in respect of cows; or, if the Acts were to be upheld on other grounds, the alleged right under art. 25 was no right at all, because it was defective in some way. Unfortunately (and this is written with great respect for the learned Judges, for a majority of whom the writer has a warm personal regard as well as professional admiration) the Supreme Court came to the conclusion that the alleged right was no right at all, on the ground that because there was an option to slaughter a sheep or a cow—an option which, with the candour characteristic of this remarkable decision, they agreed might well be illusory in particular cases—the deprivation of one arm of the option would not be an interference with religious freedom, since there was in their own words

“...no material on the record before us which will enable us to say, in the face of the foregoing facts, [i.e. the option, and the instances of prohibition of slaughter by Muslim emperors] that the sacrifice of a cow on that day is an obligatory overt act for a Mussalman to exhibit his religious belief and idea.”¹¹

We know that the Supreme Court is not bound by its own decisions—a facility of which, outside Constitutional questions, it cannot be expected to take frequent advantage—but one day it will want to distinguish this case. Knowing this the learned Judges have very carefully emphasised that the Islamic religious position was not argued before them with any vigour and that no doctor of Islamic law appeared to depose as to the theological or customary position.

Thus in any similar matter a better-prepared case might well be successful: but before we can hope for that the underlying principle must be established, firstly that religious practices are not to be curtailed unless they come clearly within the exceptions, and secondly that the Court has no jurisdiction to decide argumentatively and of its own judicial knowledge what is the content of a particular religion. Both propositions are more than hinted at in this very case, but the second requires further exploration since it is already in danger of being controverted.

• It is all very well for a Legislature to say, "The Vedas do not require such-and-such an act; there is no sanction in the sastras for your usage; what you are up to is no better than sati and hook-swinging, and just as the British prohibited those so we shall prohibit your activities". This may well be unconstitutional, or it may come, as in the case of the devadasis and the Hindu Code, within the exceptions. But it is quite another thing for the Court to say, "What you claim to be your religion is nothing of the sort. You say you are a Hindu, but Hinduism does not know any such usage as this. You say you are a Muslim, but there is nothing about this in the Quoran." In the Animal-slaughter case the Supreme Court were very cautious, and covered themselves carefully with ample description of the type of information before them. But they imported into their decision judicial reasoning of a type which an Islamic theologian cannot accept, and to decide questions of Islam with the aid of non-Islamic precepts (such as that the presence of an option destroys the obligatory character of each item in the command which is expressed alternatively) is a very questionable proceeding.¹² This is not the first time the Supreme Court has undertaken such responsibility. The case of *Saraswathi Ammal v. Rajagopal Ammal*¹³ has not attracted much notice, but it is a most important instance of the Court's deciding that a particular belief, unquestionably of a religious character, was not consistent with Hinduism, and was not on that account a basis for such secular recognition as an established Hindu belief could claim.¹⁴ The decision gives ground for anxiety, particularly when everyone knows that Hinduism has no creed or hierarchy, and at a time when even backward and criminal tribes are becoming 'Hinduised' and are being claimed as members of the 'Hindu' fold. The authorities upon which the Supreme Court relied in that case are not without their weaknesses. In *Kunhamutty v. Ahmad Musaliar*¹⁵ the Madras High Court held that to create a valid trust for religious purposes there must be a charitable object, and a dedication for the purpose of reciting the Quran over a private person's tomb did not create a valid wakf. The indignation which has been aroused by the Privy Council decision as to what was not a valid wakf should serve as a warning that the English law of charities is a poor guide to determining what is in India a valid dedication or bequest for religious purposes. What is senseless and superstitious to one may be valid for another, and the sanctity of tombs in popular Islam is notorious. Upon this weak foundation was built one of the rationes in Draviasundaram v. Subramania,¹⁶ that the direction that money should be spent on the building of a tomb (samadhi) and its maintenance did not constitute a charitable endowment (and was not a gift for religion), whereas if the deceased had been a true sanyasi his burial and the upkeep of his samadhi might have other implications. In English law the maintenance of tombs of private persons is well known not not whether it conforms to any particular school of Agama Sastras; we think that the question must be decided with reference to the view of the class of people who take part in the worship. If they believe in its religious efficacy, in the sense that by such worship they are making themselves the object of the bounty of some super human power, it must be regarded as 'religious worship'."

to be a charitable or religious purpose, but can the same be said in India, whether of Muslims or Hindus? The usages of Lingayats in this respect ought perhaps to be investigated more closely. For the test is not what is said in the texts, but what the public actually believe. Upon Draviasundaram Pillai was based the somewhat similar, and, it might be thought, equally oppressive decision in Veluswami v. Dandapani.¹⁷ A recent Bombay decision applies the same technique: a dedication to an existing foundation, whatever its motives, is one thing, but a dedication for worship at a place of samadhi, a type of worship having no charitable connotation (in the current sense of that word) though having a hold on the sentiments of unorthodox or uninstructed people, will be void: Rangrao Bhagwan v. Gopal Pundlik.¹⁸ The Court's readiness to decide what is religious without reference to custom or actual belief could hardly be illustrated better than by the two examples that follow, vastly as these differ inter se. In Chhotalal Lallubhai v. Charity Commr., Bombay,¹⁹ Shah J. said:

"...We do not think that the other bequests can be regarded as religious. A bequest to Panjrapole, i.e. a home meant for maimed, aged and deformed animals, can by no stretch of imagination be regarded as a religious bequest. Similarly, a bequest for practising kindness to all forms of life cannot, in our judgment, be regarded as a religious bequest; and a bequest for providing food to pilgrims visiting temples or providing clothes to Jain male and female Sadhus and Sadhis cannot also be regarded as a bequest for religious purposes."

The learned Judge continued to remark that there is a vital difference between the nature of the bequest or trust and the motive with which the benefit of the bequest or trust is given. It can cogently be argued that Jain theory regards such gifts as religious gifts, and the giving of them a religious duty. If the Court is at liberty to apply a priori tests of what is religious, drawn, in the case of charities, from English cases (where the technical considerations, in the field of religion, may be quite irrelevant), and in constitutional and fiscal cases from a regard only for orthodoxy or for literary sources, there seems to be something amiss with the conception of religion in the secular State. The second example, taken from Madras, namely Kalandai v. Gnanavaram,²⁰ is likewise seemingly oppressive in that, far ahead of its time, it lays down that a manager of a Hindu joint family may validly dedicate joint family property to religious purposes, that is to say, for the purposes of a Church. Chandrasekhara Ayyar J., whose authority none will question, actually said:

"...The Hindu religion has been the most tolerant religion of the world and the very idea that pious and charitable purposes should refer to and mean objects that can be said to promote a particular faith, creed, or dogma is foreign to its ideals. True piety transcends castes and creeds and whatever is done to advance belief in God and His rule over the universe can be said to be an act of broad-minded piety."

It is submitted that Shah J. should have enquired what were the beliefs of the Jain sect to which the testator belonged, and Chandrasekhara Ayyar J. should have enquired whether the Hindu caste in question had (as they quite possibly had, cf. customs in Travancore) a belief in the mutual co-operation of Christians and Hindus in matters of religion.

It is submitted, finally, that the correct test to apply is that of usage, proved in evidence, by witnesses in Court or by affidavit. We must take as our leading authority the admirable judgment of Davar J. in Jamshedji C. Tarachand v. Soonabai.²¹ The beliefs of Parsis were determined from the evidence of members of the community, and not merely from sacred books: the beliefs were inconvenient, but the learned Judge held that "a secular Judge is bound to accept the belief of the community". This was quoted with approval by the Supreme Court in Ratilal Panachand's case, and as their Lordships of the Supreme Court say in that very case²² "no outside authority has any right to say that these are not essential parts of religion...." In other words the definition of religion itself, and the determination of the content of a particular religion, as well as the decision as to what practices are or are not enjoined by religion (and so protected by the Constitution) must all be left to the community itself, and the Court cannot substitute its own judgment or skill for the beliefs and theological techniques of the community in question.

On the subject of charitable bequests, and the difficult problem of whether bequests for dharma, and other similar vague terms, are or are not valid, we have many old cases and conflicting trends of decision. It may be that the anomalous and unsatisfactory rule which is often traced to *Ranchordas Vandra-wandas v. Parvatibai*²³ will one day be overruled by the Supreme Court. But that subject must await fuller treatment. In the meanwhile it is certain that customary approaches to such matters can be consulted by the Court in purely secular connections, for we have the instance in *Govindlalji v. Commr. of Inc-tax*²⁴ of the Court's insistence that judicial notice may be taken that members of a community regard it as a religious obligation to make payments to an individual who would apparently not qualify as a proper patra, that is to say donee, according to the dharmaśāstra: so that the community's belief as to the absolute obligation to make such gifts, notwithstanding criteria applicable by orthodox Hinduism, was actually relied upon by the revenue authorities, and it was held rightly relied upon, for the purpose of assessing the donee to income-tax. As for the Animal-slaughter case it is submitted that the correct decision in this regard would have been that the impugned Acts were void in so far as they attempted to deprive Muslims of their fundamental right to freedom of religious practice, and that, in view of considerations enlarged upon elsewhere in that judgment, it would have been proper for the Acts to prescribe an age-limit or some other criterion for this purpose. Islam does not require that a young or tender animal should be sacrificed: religious freedom is not impaired if the only legally available cows are old cows unfit for giving milk or producing calves, and the Acts could have permitted the slaughter of animals for bona fide religious purposes providing that in the case of cows they were over a certain age. The fact that this care was not taken (we must contrast the terms of the Bombay statute) raises the inference that the legislation was sectarian and sentimental rather than economic, and goes far to rebut in this instance the presumption that the Legislature is the appropriate arbiter of its duty.

J. DUNCAN M. DERRETT.

MR. JUSTICE TENDOLKAR.

ON January 23, 1959, a portrait of the late Hon. Mr. Justice S. R. Tendolkar was unveiled by the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chainani, Chief Justice, Bombay High Court, in Court Room No. 31, High Court, in the presence of a large gathering of members of the Bar and Attorneys of the High Court.

In requesting his Lordship the Chief Justice to unveil the portrait, Mr. H. M. Seervai, Advocate General, said:

My Lord the Chief Justice, Judges of the Bombay High Court, ladies and gentlemen:

It is less than a year ago that Mr. Justice Tendolkar passed away, but it was the desire of all his friends, inside and outside the Bar, that a suitable memorial should be raised to his memory. We knew that his most enduring memorial was in the memory of those who practised before him, and, so far as the law was concerned, in the pages of the law reports. But we desired that a portrait indicating his fine and vivid personality should remain in the Court in which he had worked so long and so well. We knew for a fact that he greatly admired the portrait which had been painted by Mr. Pithawalla of his learned leader Sir Jamshedji Kanga. In fact he liked it so much that he kept a copy of it in his own chamber. We, therefore, engaged Mr. Pithawalla to paint the portrait, and I believe, when it is unveiled, you will find that it presents a striking picture of the late Judge.

There is little to be said on an occasion like this, for the Bar has paid its unmistakable tribute to the late Judge. But a few facts have come to light after he died, which have added greatly to his stature, for we did not know when he sat in this Court for the last time on the 20th of January, 1958, that for months he had known that he was suffering from an ailment of which the end was certain and which nothing could avert. Knowing this he faced the end with an unflinching eye, continued to come to the Court till the last day on which he could work, and then went home.

This portrait will remind us, as we sit in this Court, of a fine and masterful Judge, and so far as those who practised before him are concerned, this Court seems to us to be full of him, and as we look at his fine face it will recall to us the great occasions in which high and important constitutional matters were decided firmly, resolutely and fearlessly. I think no better tribute can be paid to a Judge than that the Bar has estimated his work as worthy of its highest praise, and in this particular matter I happen to know that the Bench fully shares the view which the Bar has taken.

It remains for me to thank the artist who painted this portrait, who unfortunately has suddenly passed away, to a member of the Bar Mr. Oak who completed part of the work which had remained unfinished, to the several friends and donors who have contributed so generously to the fund which has been set up, and to the members of the staff and office of the High Court who have done their best to make all arrangements for this occasion. We are thankful to my Lord the Chief Justice for coming here to unveil this portrait. It is fit and proper that the seniormost colleague of the late Judge should unveil the portrait which has been put up in his memory. May I request my Lord the Chief Justice to unveil the portrait.

In unveiling the portrait Hon'ble the Chief Justice Mr. H. K. Chainani said:

Mr. Advocate General, brother Judges and friends:

You have rightly observed that on an occasion like this much may not be said. I thank you for inviting me to unveil the portrait of the late Mr. Justice Tendolkar. I accepted your invitation with great pleasure, because he was not only a colleague with whom I had worked together in the High Court for several years, but he was a great personal friend. I did not know him before I came to the High Court. But soon after I came here, I realised that he was a masterful personality, who commanded universal respect and admiration. He was a kind-hearted and a good friend, and he endeared himself to everyone who came in contact with him. To all his colleagues he was a source of considerable strength. In his untimely and premature death, we all suffered a great personal loss.

As a Judge, Mr. Justice Tendolkar dedicated himself to justice. In him, there was a rare blend of a clear head, keen and sharp intellect, quick grasp, sound commonsense, and a profound knowledge of law. To those great qualities were added courage, impartiality, independence, and a high sense of devotion to duty. His judgments, which most of us have read, are remarkable for their precision and lucidity of expression. He was a great, good and wise Judge, who upheld and maintained the best traditions of this Court.

I, therefore, regard it as a great privilege to be asked to unveil his portrait. May his portrait inspire the lawyers, who practise in this Court, to prepare their cases thoroughly and to present them forcefully, but accurately and fairly. May it also inspire the Judges, who work in this Court, so that like him they may administer justice wisely, impartially, and fearlessly.

GLEANINGS.

FAIR WEAR AND TEAR

Taylor v. Webb ([1937] 1 All E.R. 590) is overruled. Though the decision that the principle of Taylor v. Webb was wrong was reached by the House of Lords in a case on the Rent Act, 1957, Regis Property Co., Ltd. v. Dudley, ([1958] 3 All E.R. 491), it is in this respect of general application to all repairing covenants in leases where liability for fair wear and tear is excepted. The principle of Taylor v. Webb was that the exception for fair wear and tear relieved the tenant not only from the immediate effects of wear and tear but also from the obligation to take any steps to avert any consequential damage. The decision of the House of Lords restores the law as it was before Taylor v. Webb. Thus, if want of repair is alleged and proved, it is for the tenant to show that the want of repair is within the exception. The exception for fair wear and tear is limited to what is directly due to wear and tear, reasonable conduct on the part of the tenant being assumed. The tenant remains bound, however, to take such steps as are required to prevent the consequences flowing originally from wear and tear producing others which wear and tear would not directly produce. The example given by Talbot J., in Haskell v. Marlow, ([1928] 2 K.B., at p. 59), whose judgment was approved by the House of Lords, was that of a tile falling off a roof. The tenant would not be liable for the immediate consequences, but if through the hole in the roof so caused by fair wear and tear water got in and rendered part of the house uninhabitable, that latter damage would not be within the exception for fair wear and tear, and the tenant would be liable for it.—L.J.

PROSTITUTION

THE general feeling of the House of Commons appeared to be in favour of increasing the penalties imposed on prostitutes for soliciting but stopped short of sending them to prison. We find this aspect of the Wolfenden Report more difficult than the other. No one is idealistic enough to imagine that it is possible to abolish prostitution; the only question is how to put an end to a public nuisance and in particular how to diminish the revolting evil of the men who live on the earnings of prostitutes. We agree with Mr. Anthony Greenwood, who is in favour of heavier fines for prostitutes but would reserve imprisonment for those who organise prostitution and who profit from it. We must have a sense of proportion. If the resources now at our disposal enabled us to attempt the reformation of thousands of prostitutes there would be an argument for detention, but they do not and, in our opinion, there are more urgent claims. The Government's provisional view is that imprisonment, even if only invoked in the last resort, would go a long way to help, partly because it would give probation officers the opportunity to persuade prostitutes from their folly before they were beyond redemption.—S.J.

BYE-LAWS: NOISY INSTRUMENTS

THE ice cream van fitted out with a musical box and an adjustable electric amplifier to attract its customers, a familiar sight in our streets, has now become immortalised by finding its way into the law reports. It has for some time been a matter of absorbing interest to local authorities whether the van's chimes constitute a "noisy instrument" for the purposes of s. 54(14) of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839 (which appears to place postmen who wish to use a horn or other noisy instrument in the performance of their duties in a most privileged position) or would come within the good rule-and government bye-laws of local authorities. There is in general existence a bye-law prohibiting any person, for the purposes of selling any article in any street, from shouting or using any noisy instrument in such a manner as to cause annoyance to inhabitants. In John v. Heath (The Times, April 24, 1958, p. 5) music lovers along with music haters were offended, for while "Toni's" van was playing the Anniversary Waltz on the loudspeaker, "Wall's" van appeared in the same street in Dunstable emitting a series of five melodious notes at frequent intervals. Only one annoyed witness was called before the justices, but, in the view of the Divisional Court, that was quite sufficient. In Raymond v. Cook, ([1958] 3 All E.R. 407), the scene shifts to Westleigh, Havant, and this time there was a solo performance from "Toni's" van which seriously disturbed the day-time slumbers of two inhabitants of the town who were night workers. The bye-law being of a similar type, it was argued that a distinction ought to be drawn between a musical and a noisy instrument, but the Divisional Court were content to assume that an instrument may be both musical and noisy—which few of us will dispute seriously—and once the justices were satisfied that the instrument was likely to cause annoyance it was unnecessary that there should be any evidence whether one or more people were in fact annoyed by it. So the local authorities appear to have won the day, even outside Glamorgan where, we are told, is to be found the only local Act which directly restricts the use of loudspeakers for trading in the street.—L.J.

OBSCENE PUBLICATIONS

THERE is a wide measure of agreement that both substance and language of the law relating to obscene publications stand much in need of change. A Bill, introduced last year with the backing of the Society of Authors was considered by two Select Committees. The findings of the Second Select Committee were embodied in the Obscene Publications Bill which was introduced—again as a Private Member's Bill—on November 10. The Bill sought to enact, by cl. 1, that any publication should be deemed to be obscene "if its effect as a whole is such as to tend to deprave and corrupt persons to or among whom it was likely to be distributed, circulated, offered for sale or let on hire". The literary, artistic, scientific or other merits of the work in question were to be taken into consideration, and in any prosecution or other proceeding the author of the publication alleged to be obscene was to have the right to be heard in its defence. It may well be that the definition of obscenity lacks the precision that is needed if unnecessary controversies over the question of the literary or artistic value of a publication are to be avoided. Even so, it is surely a matter for regret that the Bill did not secure a second reading, and that yet another opportunity of improving the law has been postponed for some time, if not lost altogether.—L.J.

SILENCE IS CONSENT

It is a rule of universal law that if a man, either by words or by conduct has intimated that he consents to an act which has been done and that he will offer no opposition to it, although it could not have lawfully been done without his consent, and he thereby induces others to do that from which they would otherwise have abstained, he cannot question the legality of the act he has so sanctioned to the prejudice of those who have given faith to his words or to the fair inference to be drawn from his conduct. In such cases proof of positive assent or concurrence is unnecessary: it is enough that the party had full notice of what was being done and the position of the other party is altered (Cairncross v. Lorimer, (1860) 3 Macq. 827).

On this rule is founded the law of consent or, more properly, acquiescence. Acquiescence implies that a person abstained from interfering whilst a violation of his legal rights was in progress. If a party having a right stands by and sees another dealing with the property in a manner inconsistent with that right and makes no objection whilst the act is in progress he cannot afterwards complain: this is the proper sense of acquiescence (Duke of Leeds v. Earl of Amherst, (1846) 2 Ph., at p. 124, per Lord Cottenham, L.C.).

In another sense acquiescence implies that a person refrains from seeking redress when a violation of his rights of which he did not know at the time is brought to his notice. Here the term acquiescence is an element of laches.

Acquiescence operates by way of estoppel. It is quiescence in such circumstances that assent may reasonably be inferred, and is an instance of estoppel by words or conduct (De Bussche v. Alt, (1878) 8 Ch.D. 286). The estoppel rests upon the circumstances that the party standing by in effect makes a misrepresentation as to a fact, namely, his own title. A mere statement that he intends to do something, as to abandon his right, is not enough (Jorden v. Money, (1854) 5 H.L. Cas. 185; Citizens' Bank of Louisiana v. First National Bank of New Orleans, (1873) L.R. 6 H.L. 352).

Consequently, if the whole circumstances are proper for raising this estoppel, the party acquiescing cannot afterwards complain of the violation of his right. For this purpose the lapse of time is of no importance. He is estopped immediately by his conduct; and hence the effect of acquiescence has been expressly preserved by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 29.

The principle of estoppel by representation applies both in law and in equity, though its application to acquiescence is equitable (R. v. Butters (Inhabitants), (1796) 6 Term. Rep. 554). The term appears to apply only to estoppel as a bar to a claim for equity (Evans v. Bicknell, (1801) 6 Ves. 174; Burrows v. Lock, (1805) 10 Ves. 470).

This is not, of course, to say that mere silence or inactivity, in the absence of a duty to speak, amounts to a representation (see Welch v. Bank of England, [1955] 1 All E.R. 811 (not answering a letter), and Leslie and Co. v. Works Commissioners, (1914) 78 J.P. 462 (party to a contract not estopped from denying its true construction by failing to answer a letter in reference to its meaning)). If a person's consent to a particular act is required, he may be under a duty, when he knows that it has been done without his consent, not to stand by for so long that another is induced thereby to do that from which otherwise they might have abstained; and he cannot afterwards question the legality of the act to the prejudice of those who have given faith to the fair inference to be drawn from his conduct (Greenwood v. Martins Bank, Ltd., [1933] A.C. 51; Cairncross v. Lorimer (supra)).

A duty to speak arises where a person knows that someone else is acting on an erroneous assumption of some authority given or liability undertaken by the former, or is dealing with or acquiring property in ignorance of his title to it (Stroud v. Stroud, (1844) 7 Man. & G. 417).

It is the duty of a person who knows that another is relying on a document bearing a forgery of his signature to give notice of the forgery without delay (Greenwood v. Martins Bank, Ltd. (supra)). A fortiori, it is clearly the obligation of one who has by his own mistake led another into an incorrect belief to correct that belief as soon as the mistake has been discovered (Holt v. Markham, [1928] 1 K.B. 504).

One who stands by and allows another to proceed and interfere with his legal rights in the hope that they will eventually arrive at an agreement is not, however, estopped from asserting that the proposal is ultra vires when it is found that no mutual agreement can be reached (Jackson v. Knutsford Urban Council, [1914] 2 Ch. 686).

Where a person has a right of election between two courses mere silence or inactivity does not amount to an election. But it is the duty of a person who has to make an election not to be silent so long as to lead another person, either the person against whom the election is made, or a third party, to alter his position in the belief that the first person has elected to let things remain as they are; and, by so doing, he will be precluded from making a different election (Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co., Ltd., [1946] 1 All E.R. 98).

It is on the foregoing that Jenks' maxim qui tacet consentire videtur (Cent. 32) is based, which brings us back to the title of this article.—L.J.

DOCTOR'S DUTY TO TELL

THE substance of Chapman v. Bix, (The Times, November 11, 1958), is that where a doctor makes a preliminary examination of a patient and then tells him to see his own doctor, the doctor who first examined him has a duty to ensure that the second doctor has a sufficiently full picture of the first examination and the findings to ensure that proper steps continue to be taken on behalf of the patient.

In this case, the action was brought by the widow of the deceased, who had been working in the cutting room of a butcher's shop when the knife had slipped and had caused a wound in his abdomen. A telephone call was put through to a local hospital which was a "cottage hospital" without any resident surgical staff. The defendant was a doctor who used that hospital and happened to be present. He acted without delay, going straight away to the shop after ordering a bed to be got ready at a fully equipped hospital. He made an examination of the deceased at the shop and formed the impression that the knife had not penetrated the abdominal wall but that the wound was a mere "nicking". On a further examination at the cottage hospital, using a probe, he again thought that the wound was superficial. He had the wound stitched, told the deceased that it was superficial, and advised him to see his doctor that evening.

The deceased's doctor called and was told that the defendant had said that the wound was superficial. Consequently, the doctor dismissed the wound as of no further significance, and diagnosed subsequent pain and nausea as due to other causes. But the deceased was worse next day and he was sent to another hospital with a note: "Probably due to acute appendicitis." An examination showed a half-inch wound of the small bowel, and, as the diagnosis came too late, death ensued.

Mr. Justice Barry took the view that there was in this case no reflection on the defendant's general professional reputation, since he clearly acted with great promptitude and keen interest. The Judge is reported as having said "There was here no attack on the defendant's bona fides; nor was there any suggestion that he did not try to do his best for this unfortunate man. He showed a very keen and helpful interest in the case... On the evidence it was impossible to suggest that the defendant was negligent in not arranging for an immediate operation. His diagnosis was clearly wrong but the evidence did not establish that it was a negligent diagnosis. It was a unanimous medical view that there was extreme difficulty in ascertaining the depth of an abdominal wound."

It seems that some professional men consider that an exploratory examination is always necessary where the skin has been penetrated; others that careful observation is required for some hours.

In case these remarks concerning the absence of any reflection on the defendant's professional reputation seem out of place, in view of the fact that he was found to be negligent, it should be said that it often happens that negligence arises from both want of skill and want of care, but the two are combined under the one head of want of care. Consequently a finding of negligence against a professional person is an ambiguous finding in that regard unless the Judge makes clear that there was no want of skill. The basis on which want of skill is treated as negligence in an expert is that it is careless for anyone to profess to be an expert who has less skill than that which may reasonably be expected of an expert.

His Lordship came to the conclusion that steps should have been taken to ensure careful observation of the deceased for eight to ten hours, either at a hospital or at home where there was a relative apprised of the symptoms to be looked out for. That was not done nor was the deceased's doctor made aware of what examination had and had not been made. It might be sufficient to send a long and complicated message by a patient, but unless he was the right sort of person to convey such a message the first doctor should get in touch with the second and explain the position. His Lordship said that because of the frightful risk involved if a penetration of the abdomen were undiscovered and untreated, he was bound to hold the defendant guilty of negligence in law.

In the above case the deceased from the point of view of treatment fell between two stools. Neither doctor failed to exercise care from the medical point of view, and if the first doctor did not send on any message one feels that the reason may have been that there seemed no reason to do so, since apparently the first doctor's conclusion was that the wound was superficial. It is said that there is great difficulty in ascertaining the depth of an abdominal wound, but this would be known as much to one doctor as another, and the need for careful observation would also be known.

The nature of the injury in the above case appears to have been one with exceptional dangers, but whatever the injury may be one would suppose that the test of negligence is whether it is the usual practice amongst professional men of reasonable skill to ensure that when a patient is passed on to another doctor that doctor is informed of all facts which are foreseeable as likely to be relevant for further treatment. The answer must surely be in the affirmative and the inquiry then becomes one of fact as to what was relevant in the particular case and whether it was communicated. The means of communication chosen will obviously also be relevant.—S.J.

THE NEW "VICTORIANISM"

FOR a very long time our vision of Soviet Russia was a blood-boltered tyranny and slave-camp, a composite picture of the horrors of the French Revolution and its dictatorial aftermath. But time, like an ever-rolling stream, flows on and the human landscape changes, and gradually we have been becoming aware that the sequel even of revolution and dictatorship is not (for better or for worse) all that any of us might have imagined. From what we hear of the Soviet world there is abroad there a strong element of something for which it is hard to find any word except "Victorianism." There is deliberately propagated an earnest sense of moral purpose and of the virtues of industry. There is the serious, straightforward approach to the arts. There is the confident, forward-looking belief in the unlimited possibilities for human happiness in the new wonders of industry and science. There is the faith in Progress. There is the sense of a beneficent imperial mission to lesser breeds without the law; although the actual word "imperial" is not used, the atmosphere of expanding influence is much the same. There is also the sublime trust in peace through strength. How well that great English nineteenth-century peace song, "We don't want to fight," could be adapted to the present mood. You remember it—something like this:

"We don't want to fight,
But, by jingo, if we do,
We've got the ships, we've got the men,
And we've got the rockets too."

It is amusing to contrast this impression with that which returning travellers bring back from Warsaw of the French-men of Eastern Europe, the Poles, their restless, lively intellectual curiosity, their gaiety and love of entertainment and their appreciation of feminine elegance. The French were never Victorians.

Of course (as you may suspect), Victorian moral earnestness and industry is not the whole picture by a long chalk. There is a great importance in being earnest if you want to get on, but the Soviet has other problems, and one of them is: What shall we do with the drunken comrade? That problem and what the Russians are doing about it is not altogether without interest to ourselves, since in 1957 there was a rise of 11 per cent. in the number of offences proved. This followed a similar rise in the previous year. It is true that the City of London's figure of 397 convictions per 10,000 residents is one of those misleading frolics of statistics, because the resident population is very small and the working population very large, but Liverpool following with 81 convictions per 10,000 has not the same mitigating explanation. Well, what do the Russians intend to do about it? There has been a certain righteous primness in the propaganda against the old traditional national sport of hard drinking, but Mr. Krushchev recently announced legislation which (if it is enforced) promises a common-sense remedy, a rule, so far as spirits are concerned, of "one bar, one drink." Of course, the determined drinker will go to another bar. "Let him go," says Mr. Krushchev. "If there are people who want five tots they will have to go to five bars. They will sober up as they go from one to the other." The notion of the five bars "pub crawl" is eminently sensible, but it takes a good deal of ruthlessness to make the Russians law-abiding.

Another interesting lapse from high moral purpose is that the Russians share our problem of a juvenile crime-wave, complete with an indigenous species of Teddy Boy called "stilyagi," from the Russian word for "style." Their stilyahness takes the form of narrow trousers, bright shirts, wide-shouldered jackets. They tend to be addicted to drunken assaults, and it is reported that the death penalty (mostly confined to political offences) is being extended to killers of that description. It is a very distressing phenomenon in a country which believed it had eliminated the economic and social basis of crime. Is there a Hogarth in the Union? He had better get busy on an up-to-date version of the decline and fall of the Idle Apprentice. Or perhaps that Victorian classic "Eric, or Little by Little" might be translated and transposed to fit another social scene. Reared in the good influences of school and factory, the stilyagi start on the downward track with their taste for their curious clothes, which their mothers weakly encourage by "mutilating" their trousers. Then come Rock 'n' Roll records illegally made from old X-ray plates. Another step and it is a decadent addiction to cocktails. Their restlessness is fostered by "The Voice of America" on the radio. Their wages are no longer sufficient for their needs. Crime is the logical and necessary sequel and here they are, fully fledged gun and knife boys. The Russians with their wave of juvenile crime have their own pet diagnosis, as we have with ours. But, instead of being tempted to say "Yah!" to each other, it would be interesting to inquire what it is we have in common that we produce such curiously similar phenomena.—S.J.

A.I.D.

LORD READING, writing in the Michaelmas, 1958, number of the Oxford Lawyer, expresses his view that for a wife to be given artificial insemination by a donor without her husband's consent is not at present a ground for divorce but that it would be in the general interest to make it so; the further opinion is expressed that it is no solution to the legal problems raised by artificial insemination to bring the whole practice of A.I.D. within the scope of the criminal law. In his article entitled "Some Legal Aspects of A.I.D.," Lord Reading indicates some of the problems which will face the Departmental Committee on human artificial insemination and its legal consequences, under the chairmanship of the Earl of Feversham, when it drafts its recommendations. Must a "test-tube baby" be illegitimate? Where marital intercourse continues alongside artificial insemination, can there be certainty that the husband is not the father? How should parentage be entered on the registration of the child's birth? Although the British Medical Association is collecting evidence from doctors and others with experience of artificial insemination, we understand that it is not yet certain whether that Association will give evidence to the Committee. It would be a pity if the Committee is deprived of information from any knowledgeable source to assist its members in reaching conclusions and making recommendations on this difficult subject involving, as it does, much both in the way of human happiness and legal pitfalls.—S.J.

REVIEWS.

The Individual and the State. By the Hon. Mr. M. C. CHAGLA. BOMBAY: Asia Publishing House. 1958. Demi 8vo. Pages: xi+132. Price: Rs. 9.75.

IN this book the eminent author has collected his speeches, broadcasts and writings which emphasise tolerance and understanding in the country at large. He rightly points out that "Truth has many facets...and it is a grievous sin against the Light to imagine that some of us have gazed at Truth in all her splendour and have been specially commissioned to proclaim it." The eminent author is not concerned with the trappings of democracy, viz., adult suffrage, an elected Parliament, and a Government enjoying the confidence of Legislature. But in his opinion what is important is a democratic spirit, a democratic outlook on life, and a democratic attitude of mind. There is nothing more important today than the consolidation of our national interest and the strengthening of all those forces which unify and not divide. One may glibly talk about a Welfare State. But what about the liberty of the individual? It is wrong merely to emphasise freedom, and to point out that law places restraints and compulsions upon the actions of the individual. The contents of the book are divided into three Parts. Part I contains speeches delivered on various topics, such as Individual Freedom and Welfare State, International Court, Constitution of India, Legal Profession and Art of Advocacy. Part II deals with several renowned personalities, for example, critical tributes are paid to Lokmanya Tilak, Vithalbhai Patel, Bhulabhai Desai, Vallabhbhai Patel, J. B. Kanga and Paul Robeson. Part III comprises miscellaneous topics such as Human Right's Day, Integrated Education and Working Journalist. Thus the book embodies a great variety of topics. It is a unique collection of speeches and writings of a great and renowned Judge.

Principles of Hindu Law. By the Right Hon. Sir DINSHAH FURDUNJI MULLA, K.T., C.I.E., M.A., LL.D. Twelfth Edition by: the Hon. Mr. Justice SUNDERLAL T. DESAI, Judge, Bombay High Court. BOMBAY: N. M. Tripathi Private Ltd., Princess Street. 1959. Roy. 8vo. Pages: lx+1203. Price: Rs. 21.

WE welcome a new edition of this wellknown work by a learned Judge of the Bombay High Court. The Indian Parliament has made many important and far reaching modifications in the old Hindu law since the publication of the last edition by enacting the Hindu Marriage Act, the Hindu Succession Act, the Hindu Minority and Guardianship Act, and the Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act. These enactments have abrogated several principles of Hindu law which were in force before their promulgation. The outstanding feature of the modifications made in the old Hindu law is that all disparities in the rights of men and women and disabilities based on caste or sex are eliminated in matters of marriage, succession, and adoption. The learned author has added a very enlightening Introduction to this edition with particular reference to the sources of Hindu law. This edition as a whole has undergone a thorough and careful revision in the light of pertinent cases reported since the publication of the previous edition. The four recent enactments and comments thereon are published separately at the end of the main work. The commentary on the provisions of the new Acts is very instructive and illuminative. This edition maintains the high degree of excellence of all previous editions and is bound to be very popular with the profession at large.

Jurisprudence. By M. J. SETHNA, Ph.D. (Bom.), Barrister-at-Law, Professor of Jurisprudence, Government Law College, Bombay. BOMBAY: Lakhani Book Depot, Girgaon. Second Edition. 1959. Demi 8vo. Pages: XLIII+689. Price: Rs. 13.25.

In this very instructive work the learned author has propounded several new thought provoking theories pertaining to the important subject dealt with. His theories of "Mind Behaviours" and of "Personality of the Corporation" are very instructive. The Chapters dealing with Custom, Legislation, Precedence, Legal Rights, Liability, Property, Persons etc. open a vast vista of useful knowledge. In this edition the author has added many important decisions and brought the book up-to-date. He has very carefully revised and enlarged the whole work both in topics and treatment. The footnotes are full of Indian case law on the interpretation of statutes. The introduction deals with various schools of thought including the Hindu and Mahommedan systems of Jurisprudence. We have nothing but unstinted praise for this excellent work which is sure to rank as a leading authority on the important topic of Jurisprudence.

THIS is the third volume in the Industrial Law Digest series covering three years from 1955 to 1957. Important decisions on Industrial Law reported during this period have been included in this volume. To facilitate reference a subject index and a table of cases are given. The table of cases has been arranged with the name of the employer company appearing first for the purpose of easy reference. Employers, Trade Unions, Officials and Tribunals dealing with industrial disputes will find this volume very useful.

THIS book indicates the great influence of the theory and practice of the Common law on the political, economic, and constitutional history of England in the 15th, 16th and 17th centuries. The gradual process of development of the English legal system, both civil and criminal, is carefully traced. The sanctity of private property is the main basis of English law. The book discloses how Charles I unsuccessfully tried to overcome the stronghold of the prerogative of the subject. It further shows that the monarchy had a much freer hand in criminal matters. This is a very interesting work tracing the gradual development of the Common law of England.

• • THE DRAFTING OF THE INDIAN CONTRACT ACT.*

A LETTER signed by about a score of persons at the top of English Literature in the early twenties at the time of Byron's centenary requesting the authorities to accord Byron a proper place in Westminster Abbey was criticized in one of the issues of the London Mercury of that time as containing about a score of mistakes not one of which any one of these great writers writing by himself could have committed. No wonder then that the Indian Contract Act, which passed through at least three different stages at which different sets of draftsmen worked on it, suffered from the process in many ways, though it is on the whole considered to be one of the best drafted statutes, drafted in an age when men were generally not hustled into producing draft statutes to meet the ephemeral needs of some government frantically attempting to meet an emergency or to appease the electorate. The Indian Law Commission in England produced a good draft embodying the combined effect of Common Law and Equity on contracts. Thereafter, the Legislative Department in India revised the draft. In this process, they seem to have had for a model the draft Civil Code of New York as they could get no English statute on the subject and they believed that the English law of contracts would be properly incorporated in the Code of a State that was believed to have adopted the English law on the subject. This draft was ultimately not accepted even by the State of New York itself and has in some ways proved to be the evil genius of the Indian Contract Act. In the third important stage, came the great Sir James Stephen with his revision of the Act and his addition of introductory definitions couched in a style different from that of the rest of the Act.

The writer of this article is aware of the many virtues of the Indian Contract Act as a piece of legislative drafting. He has also had the benefit of the various comments made by high judicial authority and of juristic observations like those of Pollock and Mulla on some of the defects of the Act. He has observed a few others. This, however, is only a humble attempt at showing in one article some of the defects in what might be regarded as the parent part of the Act—ss. 1-75 dealing with general principles, so that at some opportune moment, say, when the Legislature recognises the sui juris status of the children that still remain with it (Indemnity and Guarantee, Bailments and Pledges and Agency)—two other children having already been granted such recognition in 1930, the Legislature might remove these gaucheries from the parent revealing thereby its enduring greatness.

The first mistake is seen in the very first section—that of an unnecessary and misleading comma between the word 'contract' and the words 'not inconsistent with'. The relevant paragraph runs thus:

"Nothing herein contained shall affect the provisions of any Statute, Act or Regulation not hereby expressly repealed, nor any usage or custom of trade, nor any incident of any contract, not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act."

The effect of the comma as their Lordships of the Privy Council observed in *Irrawaddy Flotilla Company v. Bugwandass*¹ is to connect the expression "not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act" with the clause with which it was not intended to be connected, viz., "nor any usage or custom of trade" as well as the clause with which it was obviously intended to connect it, viz., "nor any incident of any contract". This seems to be the result of careless punctuation. The probability of the two commas enclosing a clause connecting the clause preceding the first comma with the clause following the second comma has been lost sight of. This mistake had repercussions in *Kuverji Tulsidas v. The Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company*² and *Moothora Kant Shaw v. The India General Steam Navigation Co.*³ It had also to be considered in *In the matter of McCorkindale*⁴. Thus for about twenty years after the Act was enacted this comma continued to cause confusion.

The definitions in s. 2 are no doubt drafted by a master. They are, however, drafted in a style different from that of the vast majority of the sections in the Act. Some confusion is created in s. 2 by the use of the word 'promise' in two different senses. Thus in cl. (b) 'promise' is used in the sense of contract or agreement whereas in the same section in cl. (d) 'promise' is used in the ordinary sense of the term. Clause (e) merely adds to the confusion. Further, it would have made for greater clarity if the English word 'offer' had been used for 'proposal'. Apart from the brevity secured by the cognate word offeree (for which 'propose' has no equivalent cognate), the word proposal seems to be confined to an offer to be bound by a promise. The result of this is that in the case where a person offers not a mere promise but an act, e.g., to sell and deliver a ring on the spot and the other party takes the ring on the spot and becomes liable to pay for it, the seller does not appear to make a proposal under the Act. This is perhaps not what the draftsman intended and such a conception of offer would at Common Law cause surprise in England, particularly as the word 'proposal' is synonymous in English use with 'offer' (vide Pollock and Mulla, 8th edition, at p. 13).

Further, an unnecessary confusion is created by the use of the word 'offer' in s. 38 in the phrase "offer of performance" which is a different thing altogether from an offer in the sense of a proposal. In view of the word 'proposal' getting mixed up in Common Law with the word 'offer', it would have added to the clarity of the Act if the word 'tender' had been used in s. 38.

When referring to the use of the word 'promise' in two different senses in the same section, we are reminded of the words 'reciprocal' and 'implied' which qualify the word 'promise' in s. 8 and s. 9 respectively. The distinction sought to be drawn between 'express promise' and 'implied promise' in s. 9 creates some confusion as 'implied promise' is a term generally used in English text-books to denote what are otherwise known as 'quasi-contracts' and are referred to in Chapter V of the Act as "Certain relations resembling those created by contract". An 'implied promise' thus generally means a fictitious promise whereas s. 9 uses this expression for an actual promise "made otherwise than in words". Further, a term which may on a true construction of the words of a contract be said to be implicit or implied therein in addition to what is expressed in words is 'implied', but in the sense of s. 9, such a term would not be 'implied'; for it is contained in the words in spite of its being not apparent on the face of the words. Read with s. 3, s. 9 would appear to suggest that where signs or other representations (such as the firing of a gun twice at sunset on the other bank of a river in spite of the acceptor to communicate his acceptance in the manner suggested by the proposer) are used to communicate (a proposal or) an acceptance, the promise would appear to be implied whereas ordinarily the law would regard it as express.

Even s. 3 is not happily worded. To say that "The communication of proposals... (is) deemed to be made by any act or omission of the party proposing... by which he intends to communicate such proposal... or which has the effect of communicating it" is to suggest something which the Act obviously does not intend to enact, viz., that an act or omission by which the proposer intends to communicate a proposal is communicated under s. 3 even if it has not that effect and that were it not for s. 4 such an inchoate communication would be valid. The word 'or' might be replaced by the word 'and'.

Reverting to s. 8, we may observe that the word 'reciprocal' before the word 'promise' does not fit the commonest class of cases it is meant to cover. If A sends goods to B on approval and B keeps them with the intention of buying them, he accepts the consideration for his promise to pay, but as A in such a case does not couple the goods with any promise of his own, B's promise coupled with his keeping the goods constitutes the acceptance, but could hardly be dubbed 'reciprocal' as defined in s. 2(f) as there is no promise from A.

It is also doubtful whether by framing ss. 10 and 11 in such a way as to make a minor's contract not merely voidable but void, the draftsman really intended to depart from the rule of Common Law and to incorporate the rule of Hindu law. The latter suggestion of Their Lordships of the Privy Council does not fit into the general scheme of the Act, viz., to consolidate the English law of contracts with only such alterations as local circumstances necessarily require. If Their Lordships had rested content with saying that they would only follow the cardinal rules of interpretation, it would have been sufficient to justify their decision in Mohori Bibee v. Dhurmodas Ghose.⁵

The use of the words 'to deceive' in s. 17 both in the main body of the section and in cl. (4) appears to create a distinction. Clause (4) by referring to 'any other act fitted to deceive' makes it clear that those in the preceding clauses are all acts fitted to deceive and cl. (5) refers to other acts which whether in fact fitted to deceive or not are in law so considered. Unless the expression 'fitted to deceive' is used to mean something different from 'with intent to deceive', where is the necessity for cl. (4) at least as at present worded? If it is, as Pollock and Mulla say, used only by way of abundant caution and is meant only to exhaust all categories of such acts, where is the necessity for the use of the words 'means and includes'? Further, in the body of s. 17, the words 'with intent to deceive another party thereto or his agent or to induce him to enter into the contract' might lead one to the conclusion that the fraud might not be the inducing cause of the contract in order to render it voidable. Pollock and Mulla in their commentary state clearly that "under the Contract Act we are concerned with the effects of fraud only so far as consent to a contract is procured by it". This is no doubt the correct position. Would it not then be better to make it clear in this section instead of in the Explanation to s. 19?

The law on the subject of consideration is not dealt with in one place, nor is it dealt with in the proper order, nor is attention paid to a very important aspect of it, viz., its reality. The main proposition, viz., that consideration is essential to a contract is stated in s. 25 not only far removed from the definition in s. 2, but after the Act tells us in s. 23 what unlawful consideration is. This again is mixed up with a quite different element, viz., the object of a contract. Unlawful consideration and unlawful object could have been treated separately. The important element of reality is hardly mentioned except by implication and that too only in Explanation 2 to s. 25.

Section 2, cl. (d) runs as follows:—

"When, at the desire of the promisor, the promisee or any other person has done or abstained from doing, or does or abstains from doing, or promises to do or to abstain from doing, something, such act or abstinence or promise is called a consideration for the promise."

This definition might be improved in the following respects:

(a) Even if the above language is to be kept intact, two 'promises' being referred to, the second promise at the end of the definition might be distinguished from the first by the addition of the words 'of the promisor' at the end of the definition.

(b) Further, the words 'at the desire of the promisor' imply a somewhat more active movement on the part of the promisor than is sometimes actually the case especially in protracted negotiations that finally result in a contract. It is suggested that words like "with the consent express or implied of the promisor" would, being wider, be more suitable. Perhaps the word 'prior' might be placed before the word 'consent' in order to avoid any confusion with s. 25, Explanation 2.

(c) The definition might make it clear that consideration might take the form not merely of 'some right, interest, profit or benefit accruing to one party', but even of 'some forbearance, detriment, loss or responsibility given, suffered or undertaken by the other' in return for the promise received (*Currie v. Misa*⁶). It may take the form not merely of abstention or forbearance but of abandoning something which might cause the party so abandoning something to suffer a detriment or loss without any actual benefit correspondingly accruing to the other party (though of course it must have been suffered at the desire or with the consent of that other).

A more comprehensive and clearer definition would therefore be couched in some such words as follows: "Consideration is any act of the promisee or a third person from which the promisor or a stranger derives a benefit, profit or advantage or by which any labour, detriment or inconvenience is sustained by the promisee or a third person if such act is performed or such labour, detriment or inconvenience is suffered with the (prior?) consent express or implied of the promisor". The word 'act' could mean both the positive act of doing something and the negative act of abstaining from something and therefore need not be amplified in the definition.

A curious instance of carelessness disfigures s. 23, the relevant portion of which (as invariably printed in various texts) is as follows:

"The consideration or object of an agreement is lawful, unless—it is forbidden by law; or is of such a nature that, if permitted, it would defeat the provisions of any law; or is fraudulent; or involves or implies injury to the person or property of another; or the Court regards it as immoral, or opposed to public policy."

The subject of the second, third and fourth clauses is 'it' and this should have been repeated before each of these clauses, if the section is to be printed as above, i.e., as it is found printed in the texts including the authentic text. The way the section is printed is perhaps responsible for an unnecessary ugliness; but the semi-colons in the first four clauses and the dash after the word 'unless' show that the draftsman intended the section to be printed in this manner only. Further, even if 'it' in the first clause were printed with 'unless' so as to show that 'it' was intended to be the common subject of the four clauses that follow, 'it' would then have to be read with the fifth clause reducing the sentence to a grammatical absurdity. Two courses only are open to the draftsman, neither of which he has taken. Either the word 'it' might be repeated before the second, third and fourth clauses, or the dash and the semi-colons might all be dropped and the whole of this first paragraph of the section written continuously with commas as the only punctuation marks and without breaking up the paragraph as is at present done into separate lines for each clause. Further, the comma in the last line between 'immoral' and 'or' is, according to the accepted rules of punctuation, unnecessary.

Further, the dubious implication of the word 'or' in the phrase "the consideration or object of an agreement" might be misleading and could easily have been avoided by merely drafting two separate sections—one for 'lawful consideration,' the other for 'lawful object'.

We may here mention briefly a few other matters. The addition of the words 'or seize' after the word 'detain' and 'or seizing' after the word 'detaining' in s. 15 might have rendered the section more comprehensive. Perhaps, these words were not used as it might have been thought that the unlawful seizing of property fell under the words 'act forbidden by the Indian Penal Code' and unlawful detaining did not.

Section 14 refers, at it were, in the same breath, to coercion, undue influence, fraud and misrepresentation, which merely make a contract voidable and to 'mistake subject to the provisions of ss. 20, 21 and 22' which when operative makes the agreement void (see s. 20).

Further, the addition of the word 'existing' before the word 'mistake' in the first paragraph of s. 20 is necessary, because, as would appear from Chandan-mull v. Clive Mills, Ltd.,⁷ if the mistake is as to a future event, the contract is binding and may be avoided at some future date if the expected event does or does not occur and the section itself only speaks of 'the agreement' being 'void' which would mean that it is void ab initio.

The term 'contingent contracts' in Ch. III might have been replaced by the more familiar expression of English law—'conditional contracts'.

Section 70 runs as follows:

"Where a person lawfully does anything for another person, or delivers anything to him, not intending to do so gratuitously, and such other person enjoys the benefit thereof, the latter is bound to make compensation to the former in respect of, or to restore, the thing so done or delivered."

Illustration (a) is as follows:

"A, a tradesman, leaves goods at B's house by mistake. B treats the goods as his own. He is bound to pay A for them."

It is clear, therefore, that the enjoyment must be by a more or less voluntary or deliberate act and some such words as these should be inserted before the word 'enjoys': otherwise a curious situation would arise in a case like the following: X having agreed to paint the wall of A's compound paints by mistake a part or the whole of the compound wall of A's neighbour B. B cannot help enjoying the benefit of it, but is he bound to pay anything to X? There is obviously no contract or quasi-contract here. As Pollock, C. B., observed: "I clean your property without your knowledge, have I then a claim on you for payment? One cleans another's shoes; what can the other do but put them on? Is that evidence of a contract to pay for the cleaning?" (*Taylor v. Laird*⁸). For that matter, is that evidence of any quasi-contract?

The decision of the Privy Council in *Sri Shiba Prasad Singh v. Maharaja Srish Chandra Nandi*⁹ has now made it clear that the words "money...paid or anything delivered by mistake" in s. 72 include both money paid by a mistake of fact and money paid by a mistake of law, i.e., a payment which was not legally due and which could not have been enforced. For seventy-six years, however, the Courts took the view that 'mistake' was used in the same sense as in ss. 20-22, i.e., a mistake of fact making an agreement void under s. 20 and a mistake of law under s. 21 not affecting its validity. If the term 'mistake' had been clearly defined for the purpose of s. 72, the wrong notion that prevailed in this matter for so many years would not have gained currency. In the same section, the word 'coercion' is used, but as pointed out by the Privy Council in *Seth Kanhai Lal v. National Bank of India*¹⁰ the word is used in its ordinary sense. If the Act solemnly defines 'coercion' in s. 15 in a particular way, the draftsman should have confined the meaning to certain sections by some such words as "For the purposes of ss. ...". In the absence of any such words, the definition would seem to control at least the sections that follow in the Act. In the alternative, the use of some such equivalent as 'compulsion' in s. 72 might have at least made for greater clarity.

The writer need not repeat here that this article is not intended to detract from the greatness of the Indian Contract Act. He believes, however, that every great statute which goes beyond mere regulation of details is in the words of Sir Frederick Pollock "a work of art", and almost every work of art can

THE DEFINITION OF RELIGION IN INDIAN LAW.

POSTSCRIPT

THE Supreme Court having, in the constitutional cases of the Shirur Matt and Ratilal Panachand, approved the contention that religion is far more than a mere matter of belief, and that the question regarding practices, whether they are religious or not, must be decided according to the tenets of the sect or community in question and not merely the dicta of any particular literature or the opinions of the Judges themselves, it follows that attempts, such as those noticed above, to define 'religion' with reference to criteria other than those accepted by the communities in question are repugnant to what we may call the 'better'—and certainly the better considered—doctrine laid down by the supreme tribunal. The Supreme Court has recently affirmed this 'better' view in a striking case that arose, it is true, not under the Constitution, but under the Penal Code: but the implications of the judgment are equally relevant with the constitutional cases.

In *S. Veerabadran Chettiar v. E. V. Ramaswami Naicker*¹ an appeal by special leave from the order of a Judge of the High Court of Madras was allowed, and an exceptionally severe rebuke was administered not only to the respondents whose misbehaviour had led to the complaint, but also to the learned Judge who 'clearly misdirected himself'. The reader's attention is drawn to the ominous words with which the judgment ends, and which emphasise the Supreme Court's opinion that s. 295 of the Penal Code does penalise destruction, etc., of an object 'however trivial or destitute of real value in itself' which is 'held sacred' by any class of persons with the intention of thereby insulting the religion, etc. The facts of the matter were not in evidence, because the complaint had been wrongly dismissed in limine, but they appear to have been common knowledge and not in dispute. A member of a society of religious reformers gave notice of his intention to break a mud image of the god Ganesa in public, made a speech defaming the religious beliefs of certain Saivites, and broke the image in the presence of large numbers of them. The learned Judge took the view that a mud image, like an abandoned idol, pictures on the wall of a room, or puppets in a shop, was not an object held sacred within the meaning of the section. From the point of view of the dharmaśāstra it is probably true that unless an idol is properly pratishthita and continues thereafter undefiled it is not fit for worship. But, as the Supreme Court show with great emphasis, this is not the test to apply here, and the Judge's attitude was 'cynical'. Without (it is true) hearing any evidence on the point, their Lordships say,

"...it is a well-known fact that the image of Lord Ganesa or any objective representation of a similar kind, is held sacred by certain classes of Hindus, even though the image may not have been consecrated...nor is it absolutely necessary that the object, in order to be held sacred, should have been actually worshipped...Courts have got to be very circumspect in such matters, and to pay due regard to the feelings and religious emotions of different classes of persons with different beliefs..."

This contrasts very happily with the case of Saraswati Ammal (cit. sup).

ADVOCACY*

ADVOCACY is a branch of the practice of the law entirely neglected by many solicitors, undertaken with reluctance by some, and practised with distinction and substantial profit by a few. It cannot be taught by law schools, coaches or text-books. It must be learnt from practice. The only help that the experience-

1 [1959] S.C.J. 1.

* By Sir Sydney Littlewood in S.J.

ed advocate can give to the less experienced is to tell the things that he has found useful in his own work.

The solicitor-advocate

Advocacy in itself can be a very profitable branch of practice. For a solicitor it offers two advantages. It gives him opportunities to help his client when in difficulties and it enables him to bring and keep his own name before the public. As to the first of those, when a client finds himself a party to proceedings in Court or before a tribunal, generally he would much prefer his case to be handled by the solicitor he knows and trusts than by someone he has never met before. As to the second, the Council of the Law Society will not allow advertising, but it encourages the solicitor to become an advocate, and many a successful advocate has built up a good general practice because his name has been before the public so often by reason of his appearances as an advocate.

With the great increase in administrative tribunals and public inquiries, advocacy becomes more and more important. In 1955 there were 6,558 town planning appeals, in 1956 there were 6,699, in 1957 there were 6,921, and I am told that 1958 looks like producing even more. Some of these were trifling affairs, but many of them were of great importance and large sums were at stake. Again, the compulsory purchase of land is becoming more frequent, and in connection with that the advocate is often needed.

In many of these matters the solicitor works closely with his client and so gets a detailed knowledge of the matter in hand which he finds difficult to pass to a barrister in a brief. That is particularly the case in town planning appeals. In such a case, if the solicitor is an advocate, he has a great advantage over the barrister, who is kept so far removed from the practical side by the rules of his branch of the profession. In short, there are many occasions when the solicitor-advocate has advantages over the barrister.

Law of evidence

All too many advocates do not know and understand the law of evidence. It is not enough to know that you must not ask a leading question and to know that you must exclude hearsay. The whole of the law of evidence must be known and understood. I think the most useful book on evidence is Stephen's Digest of the Law of Evidence. It is a small book, but difficult to read. Nevertheless, the man who has read it and taken pains to understand it will find himself far better equipped than the many he will encounter who have never taken that trouble. It has always been a matter of regret to me that more attention to the law of evidence is not paid in the solicitors' professional examinations. Advocates often have to wait in a Court until their case comes on. Stephen's Digest of the Law of Evidence is a small book and could be comfortably carried about, and time spent in waiting for a case could be usefully employed in studying it. When you take a point on evidence or when a point is taken against you it is a pleasant feeling to be sure that you know.

When to employ counsel

Whenever a client has said to me: "Shall I have a barrister?" I have said: "By all means." That was not because I lacked faith in myself, but because I always remember the tale of the unsuccessful litigant in the county Court who had been represented by a solicitor, and who said to his friends: "It would have been very different if I'd had a proper lawyer with a wig." I had one interesting example of the employment of counsel going against a client's interest. On instructions, counsel was employed to do a case before magistrates in front of whom I regularly appeared. My client was convicted by the magistrates but the conviction was quashed on appeal. After the case, but before the appeal, I saw one of the magistrates and told him I was surprised that he and his colleagues had found my client guilty. He said: "We were sure you knew he was guilty because you had counsel. If you had thought him innocent you would have done it yourself."

Preparation of the case

It is impossible to overstate the importance of the preparation of a case. It does not matter how competent the advocate is, he can never do justice to a case if he has not spent time on its careful preparation. I know that there are many advocates who think that they have a heaven-sent gift that enables them to walk into Court, pick up a few notes from a clerk, and without any preparation deal with a case. Those people may be able to make a show but they fail their client.

In preparing and in conducting a case, it is a mistake to allow your client's feelings to be your feelings. You can help him much more if you deal with the matter objectively and above all if you are fearless in the advice that you give him. It is easy to give advice that is palatable, but to give unpalatable advice is often the best way to help. Therefore, in preparing your case, never allow your judgment to be impaired by sympathy for your client. It is quite possible to do your case and do it really well while having no sympathy at all with your client. I can illustrate this by telling a story of my own articulated clerk days. My principal was a splendid advocate and on one occasion I went to Court with him when he was appearing for a man charged with an offence against decency. In those days the Probation of Offenders Act was rarely used. My principal put up a magnificent plea for probation, a plea that almost brought tears to my young eyes, and affected the Bench so much that they acceded to his request. As my principal and I left Court together I said to him, "I was very pleased with that result, weren't you?" He turned to me and said, with feeling, "No. The dirty fellow should have been sent to prison."

The preparation of a case always involves eliciting the facts and sometimes looking into the law.

As to facts. You must take your own client's story and take this as fully as you can. If you take it too briefly you are liable to find something cropping up in Court that takes you by surprise and, if things go wrong, your client will think, and probably say, that if only he had been given the opportunity he would have told you that. Do not be satisfied with your client's own version of facts. Check that with whatever you can. Sometimes it is possible to check with facts given by other witnesses; sometimes documents will help, and sometimes a visit to a site will show whether your client's story is right or wrong. Check in every way that you can and, where you find any inconsistencies, get them settled before you go to Court. Nothing is more damaging to a case than to have something that your own witness has said disproved either by another of your own witnesses or by a document in your possession, or a fact that should have been in your knowledge. Such careful preparation takes time, but it is never time wasted. I know time is money, but I shall say something of that later.

I have mentioned a visit to a site. In motoring cases, accident cases, planning appeals, and any other case where the locus or site is important, a visit should be made by the advocate himself.

When you are satisfied that you have all the facts, turn to the law, and if there is a legal point, see that you have it thoroughly prepared. Do not rely on text-books, but look up the cases upon which the writer of the text-books has based his proposition. If you have not done this you may find, when you get to Court, that your opponent has, and while you quote a line from Stone or Chitty or Salmond or some other text-book your opponent produces the case upon which the author has based that line and says, "But my friend should read the judgment, where he will find..." and then comes something for which you are entirely unprepared.

Professional witnesses

In the preparation of your case you will have decided whether a professional witness is necessary. Such witnesses are often necessary in cases before magistrates' and county Courts, but even more frequently are they necessary in cases before tribunals. Professional witnesses are expensive but often indispensable. When I have decided that I need professional witnesses I tell my clients why I need them, whom I suggest, and the probable cost. If I am authorised to engage professional witnesses I always see those witnesses myself and tell them exactly what I need, and ask how far they can help me.

"Briefing" the client

It is important to see that your client is aware of his position throughout and that is particularly true in the case of defendants to criminal charges before magistrates. It is no unusual thing to see a defendant who is represented taken completely by surprise when he is asked by the Bench whether he wishes to be tried summarily or to go for trial. That look of surprise is a bad mark for the solicitor. The client should have been told of his rights and have had them carefully explained before he got to Court.

Court Tactics

When the advocate has got together all of his witnesses' proofs and satisfied himself about the law, he should make up his mind what line he is going to take when he gets into Court. I know this sounds elementary but it is no uncommon thing to see an advocate who has not done that. It is a sad sight. He flounders all the time, makes points that are bad, misses points that are good and is no help to his client, the Court or himself. It is true that in a magistrates' Court one may be taken by surprise because the prosecution produces something unexpected. This rarely happens to the advocate who has prepared his case with the thoroughness that I recommend, but on those rare occasions the experienced and well prepared advocate will adjust his own plan of campaign according to the new circumstances without difficulty.

I want to turn now to the Court or the tribunal.

The advocate should make himself acquainted with the procedure of the Court or tribunal before which he appears. The man who appears regularly in a magistrates' Court knows the procedure of that Court and the man who goes regularly to the county Court knows county Court procedure. Some tribunals, such as the Lands Tribunal, have their own rules of procedure and the solicitor who is appearing before such tribunal for the first time should make a point of studying those rules. There are, however, tribunals where there are no written rules: for instance, inquiries held by inspectors of the Ministry of Housing and Local Government are not, at the present time, subject to rules, but in practice a procedure has grown up. The solicitor who is appearing before such a tribunal or inspector for the first time should take steps to find out what the procedure is. Frequently he will be able to find another solicitor who can help him with advice, but if he cannot, when he gets before the tribunal he should ask the chairman or the inspector, as the case may be, if he would be good enough to let him know what is the procedure. He will always get the guidance he seeks.

Demeanour—and some "don'ts"

There are a few general propositions that I would like to make with regard to the advocate in Court.

Be well dressed. In my very early days a chairman of a Bench made a point of seeing me after I had appeared in Court in a coloured soft collar and telling me that he thought I would make a better impression if I wore a stiff white one. I have always been thankful for that piece of advice.

Be respectful to the Court. This does not mean be servile; there are many times when one must stand up to a Court, but this can be done in a respectful way. There can never be any excuse for being rude to the Court.

When addressing a Court look straight at the Judge or the Chairman. Too many advocates look down at their papers while they are speaking.

Speak up, try to avoid a monotonous voice, and do not drop your voice at the end of sentences.

Do not try to be slick. It does not pay in the long run.

Be courteous to your opponent. This is often difficult but it shows handsome returns.

Never deliberately mislead the Court. It may produce a satisfactory result on one occasion, but the solicitor-advocate usually appears before the same Court time and time again, and if once he has misled that Court, he will never be trusted again. It is an excellent thing to be trusted by the Courts before whom you appear. I have known solicitors who have been so completely trusted by magistrates that they have almost been a menace because the magistrates were always satisfied that those solicitors were right.

Do not make admissions unless you are quite sure that thereby you cannot harm your case. This should not be carried to foolish extremes, but if there is a burden of proof upon your opponent leave him to discharge it.

Prior Observation

When I appear before a Court or tribunal for the first time I do my utmost to assess the character of the person or persons before whom I am appearing. In the magistrates' Court, if you are not first on, you can often help yourself a good deal by watching the behaviour of the various magistrates in the cases that precede yours.

The Opening

The object of the opening is to enable the Court to appreciate the law and the evidence that will be put before it. The method of opening must differ from Court to Court. The advocate appearing before lay magistrates should remember that, even if the Chairman is a lawyer, it is a lay tribunal, and the advocate should make sure that they all understand the case to be presented to them. It is a mistake to make the opening longer than is necessary, but with magistrates it is equally a mistake to leave them in a position where they do not understand the case which is to be put to them. The advocate should keep the Court interested. Photographs and models help to do that, and an apt quotation is sometimes useful. Before magistrates the solicitor for the defence has the right to address the magistrates before calling evidence or after calling evidence, or (with leave) both, but if he exercises his right to address the Court twice, the prosecution have a right to address the magistrates at the conclusion of his final speech. I know that most advocates defending before magistrates elect to address the magistrates at the close of a case and not to open. That is sound in the majority of cases, but if the defence is complicated it is important that the magistrates should understand it before they hear the witnesses, and my own experience has been that, by a defence being opened, magistrates often receive the evidence of the defence witnesses in a more favourable way than they would otherwise have done. Whether, when a defence has been opened, it is wise to address the magistrates at the close of the evidence and so give the prosecution another opportunity, is a matter to be decided by the advocate in each case.

When opening a case before a county Court Judge or a stipendiary magistrate it should be remembered that he is a lawyer and that it is probably not necessary to open in the same detail as before lay magistrates.

When opening before a tribunal where the members are specialists and when opening before an inspector, it is wise to remember that you are dealing with specialists, and to open on the basis that they understand the matter to be discussed as well as you do. (They probably understand it a good deal better than you do, but never let them or your client know you think that.)

May I repeat something that I have said earlier: if, in the course of opening, you quote cases, have the reports there.

Calling Evidence

Before an advocate goes to Court he should have decided in which order he will call his witnesses. The only guidance that can be given on that is to call them in the order that will present the most coherent story to the Court.

Examination-in-Chief

Examination-in-Chief is much more difficult than many people think. The temptation to ask leading questions is one to which the most experienced advocate falls at times, and, of course, we all know the advocate who asks them deliberately. When an advocate persistently asks leading questions of his own witnesses, magistrates are very ready to think that the case is weak, even though the advocate is not pulled up by his opponent.

The advocate must get from his witness every bit of useful evidence that that witness can give, and this is not always easy. If a witness does not give the answer that you want, never let him think you are getting impatient with him, because the probabilities are that he has not given you the answer because he is nervous and if you make him more nervous he will get worse. I find that if I cannot get the answer I want I usually get it if I put my question another way or by putting a series of questions. There are occasions when the witness will not give you the answer that you want, try how you will. I remember a county Court Judge saying to me once, "You can take a horse to water but you can't make him drink." When you reach that stage there is nothing for it but to abandon the question.

Re-examination is very important but seems to be incompletely understood by many advocates. The object of re-examination is to clear up anything injurious to your case that has come out in cross-examination. Here, again, the advocate must know what he wants to do. My own practice is to write down as the cross-examination proceeds any point made in cross-examination that I think needs to be and can be cleared up on re-examination. Sometimes some of those points are cleared up before the cross-examination is finished and I cross them off. In re-examination I only deal with the points that remain.

There are occasions when the cross-examination reminds you of something that you failed to bring out in chief and yet the question that you would like to put cannot be said to arise out of cross-examination. Usually a little thought will find a way round this, but it is wise to have in mind how you will relate your question to the cross-examination when your opponent jumps up and says, "This does not arise out of my cross-examination."

Cross-examination

Cross-examination needs much thought.

First, assess the witness you have to cross-examine and on that assessment decide how you will deal with him. Some witnesses will respond best to kindly treatment, some to firm treatment. By the time the witness has given his evidence in chief you should have made up your mind which course you will adopt.

An advocate should always know exactly what he wants when he starts to cross-examine. Many ask questions for the sake of asking questions, and ask questions on points that do not affect their own case at all. This tends to irritate the Court and helps no one. If you know exactly what you want you will cease cross-examining as soon as you have got it. In my view, it is a mistake to ask any question in cross-examination unless it is directed to something that you have already decided you want to elicit. It is true that there are times when you have to approach your point in a roundabout way, but, even so, every question that you ask while proceeding in that roundabout way should lead up to the point that you seek to establish or destroy.

There are instances, and they are not infrequent, where there is no point in cross-examination. In such cases do not cross-examine.

Closing Speech

I have already referred to the value of a closing speech. Never start a closing speech in a mood of despondency. I have often known a good closing speech to alter completely the previously half-formed opinion of a Court. The closing speech needs more thought than some advocates give to it. A closing speech should be constructive; it should have as its object the driving home of the main points of your case. Having watched numbers of advocates, I believe that many of them get up to make their final speech without having given a thought to what it is to be or what ground it is to cover. As a case proceeds I make a note on a separate sheet of paper of everything that I ought to deal with in my final speech. As in the case of my notes for re-examination, some of these notes sometimes have to be struck out because of something that has happened subsequently to their being made, but, by means of these notes, when I start my closing speech I know what I have to deal with and, I hope, get an orderly speech.

With the final speech, as with an opening speech, keep the Court interested, look straight at the Judge or Chairman, press your points hard, but avoid repetition. I like to see an advocate in his closing speech addressing the Court as though the Court had no option but to find in his favour. That spirit is infectious.

When appearing before magistrates I have often been asked by a client to combine in my closing speech a plea for leniency in the event of the Court deciding against me on the question of guilt. When such a combination is attempted magistrates regard it as an acceptance of the fact that the defendant is guilty. I have always advised a client against that course, have explained the difficulties of combining the two pleas and advised that he should make up his mind which plea he wanted put forward. If a client thinks he is not guilty, he should let his advocate fight the issue of guilt and, in the event of the magistrates being against him on that point, let the advocate ask to be heard before the magistrates pass sentence. He cannot demand that as of right, but it is unusual for magistrates to refuse such a request. I may say that as a result of following that practice I have had many people plead guilty who originally intended to plead not guilty, and I cannot recall a case where it has not paid, but let me add I have always insisted upon the client making his own decision.

After the case

If a case goes against an advocate he should take the decision with a smile. It will not help him in the case he has just lost, but it may help him a lot in the next one.

One great difference between the barrister-advocate and the solicitor-advocate is that the barrister-advocate can leave the Court without seeing the client, but the solicitor cannot do that. Not infrequently the client feels sore at an adverse decision and immediately talks of an appeal. Save in a case where a defendant has been given a prison sentence it is always wise to wait a day or two before discussing the question of an appeal. The client will then be calmer and it may be that the advocate will be able to think more clearly than he could have done in his first disappointment at losing.

Particular Courts, etc.

Space does not permit of my dealing with the many Courts and tribunals before which a solicitor has a right of audience, but there are one or two to which I should like to make reference.

Consistory Courts: I only once appeared in a Consistory Court and did so without robes, to the disgust of the chancellor. I lost my case!

Coroners' Courts: At onetime solicitors had no right of audience before a Coroner but appeared by his permission. That has been changed and by the Coroners' Rules of 1953 any person who, in the opinion of the Coroner, is a properly interested person may examine witnesses either in person or by counsel or solicitor. The rules of evidence are not strictly followed in Coroners' Courts and hearsay evidence is fairly commonly admitted.

Commissioners of Taxes: The solicitor who appears before Commissioners of Taxes should make himself thoroughly acquainted with tax law in so far as it affects the matter in hand. He will find a paper delivered at the Oxford Week-end Course in 1957, entitled "Taxation," helpful. Copies of this pamphlet can be obtained from The Law Society, price 2s. 6d.

There are two kinds of Commissioners who hear appeals against tax assessments—General Commissioners and Special Commissioners.

General Commissioners are unpaid local men, the sort of people you would have on a bench of magistrates, and they act for separate divisions throughout the country. The majority of appeals before them are now conducted by accountants, and the Revenue case is presented by an inspector of taxes, who is sometimes, but by no means always, a capable advocate.

Special Commissioners are a very much more expert body sitting mainly in London.

In many appeals there is a right to elect whether to be heard by General or Special Commissioners, and the tendency is for cases involving points of law to go to the Special Commissioners. Counsel is usually employed, but solicitors have an equal right of audience.

Both types of Commissioners hear cases in private. The taxpayer, on whom the onus of proof lies in all appeals against assessments, opens his case, and then his witnesses, if he is calling any, are examined, cross-examined and re-examined in the ordinary way. The Revenue answer and the taxpayer has a right of reply. There is one vital thing to remember, and that is that, if you lose and want to appeal to the High Court, you must express dissatisfaction with the decision immediately it is given.

Appeals to the High Court can only be taken on a point of law. This means that the presentation of the facts to Commissioners is often of crucial importance, and solicitors would have a valuable service to perform if they were more ready than they are at present to make themselves familiar with tax law and accept instructions to appear before Commissioners.

Lands Tribunal: The matters dealt with by this tribunal require a specialist's knowledge, but there is no reason why the solicitor should not acquire this. He should bear in mind that he is an advocate and look to expert witnesses to deal with technical matters, but he himself should be sure that he understands these technical matters before he goes before the tribunal.

Inquiries: Under this heading I group public inquiries on development plans, public inquiries on planning appeals, and public inquiries on compulsory purchase orders. Here there is great scope for the solicitor-advocate, and in my view the volume of this work is likely to go on increasing. The advocate who wishes to practise in this field successfully should do all that he can to learn about planning. By this I do not mean the law of planning, for law very rarely enters into these inquiries, but the practice of planning. I know that for the busy practitioner this is not easy, but he can learn much by reading regularly the Journal of Planning and Property Law, and in addition I would recommend him to become a subscriber to Town and Country Planning, a journal published monthly by the Town and Country Planning Association, 28 King Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.2, and to the Journal of the Town Planning Institute, which is published by the Town Planning Institute, of 18 Ashley Place, London, S.W.1.

Public inquiries on planning appeals often involve very heavy work and long hearings. Hearings of up to three days are by no means uncommon and even longer hearings are known. The work of preparation can be heavy, but it is important because these appeals are decided very largely on facts and it is the solicitor's duty to see that all relevant facts are properly put before the inspector. At these inquiries written proofs are commonly used, copies being supplied to the inspector and interested parties. At the present time there are no written rules of procedure, but the procedure is well-established and the same procedure always followed.

In heavy appeals it is my practice to prepare proofs well in advance of the date of the inquiry. When they are all ready I have a meeting at which all witnesses (professional and otherwise) are present. I read each proof and invite comments from all present. It is surprising how often proofs have to be altered as a result, in spite of the care that has gone into their preparation. These meetings are often long affairs (my longest lasted 6½ hours), but they are always worth while.

At public inquiries there is an atmosphere of informality which the advocate who is accustomed to Courts may find disconcerting at first. Sometimes local feeling runs high, there are many members of the public present, and they are liable to show their feelings notwithstanding warnings from the inspector. It would be quite easy to lose one's temper, but that would be a great mistake. In those cases one sometimes gets a constant stream of witnesses going into the box who express in varying terms of vehemence their opposition to what you are supporting. Usually it is a mistake to cross-examine those "witnesses."

I have mentioned the importance of professional witnesses in some planning appeals. The Law Society is often asked to supply names of people who can give expert evidence and is usually able to meet the request.

Planning appeals were the subject of another paper at a Law Society's Week-end Course. Copies of that paper can also be obtained from The Law Society, price 2s. 6d.

Fees

I want to conclude this article with a few words about the solicitor-advocate's charges.

From time to time it is suggested that there should be a scale of advocate's fees. I am most strongly opposed to this. Earlier I said that advocacy had to be learnt by practice. The young solicitor who wants to become an advocate should be prepared to accept any work that he can get that will take him into the Court and not to worry about the fee that he can get for it. He has to learn, he can only learn by conducting cases in Court and clients will not employ the inexperienced man if they can get an experienced man at the same price. If he takes an intelligent interest in the work and perseveres, in time he will find himself able to command fees that will show him a profit, and if he develops into a good advocate he will be able to get fees that would certainly not be contemplated by any scale.

I know of no reason why a solicitor should not be as good an advocate as a member of the Bar, and I see no reason why fees for a first-class solicitor-advocate should be any less than the fees for a first-class barrister-advocate.

I have emphasised the importance of careful preparation of a case. This involves time and time must be paid for. For my own part, I would much rather not undertake a case than undertake it at a fee which would mean that I cannot give the time that is necessary for proper preparation. For many years I have told clients that and find it is not difficult to make them understand.

GLEANINGS.

MATRIMONIAL HOME: OWNERSHIP

THE old-established doctrine that equity leans towards equality is peculiarly applicable to disputes as to ownership of the matrimonial home. From this doctrine stems the general rule that, on a purchase in the husband's name or in joint names out of money provided by both parties, whether in equal or in varying shares, the house will generally be treated as belonging in equity to the parties in equal shares. The latest decision, Richards v. Richards, ([1958] 3 All E.R. 513), deals with a case where the facts as a whole did not permit the application of the doctrine. The property there was purchased in the names of the wife and her father out of money contributed by the wife and her parents. The wife's payments were made out of one of her bank accounts which she had had since before her marriage and into which she had paid, during her marriage, her own earnings and monthly naval allotments credited to her by her husband out of his service pay. The husband, who was abroad, was unaware of the purchase at the time it was made; when he heard of it, he sent to his wife a small cash contribution and subsequently increased his monthly naval allotments. The Court of Appeal held on those facts that the husband had no beneficial interest in the house, inter alia, on the ground that in so far as moneys previously paid by the husband to the wife may have been used to pay for the purchase, they were paid unconditionally to the wife and were not payments by way of housekeeping allowance; consequently, the wife was not accountable to the husband for them. The case differs from Silver v. Silver, ([1958] 1 All E.R. 523), where the arrangements at the time of purchasing the house were made with the concurrence of the husband, and from Rimmer v. Rimmer, ([1952] 2 All E.R. 863), where both husband and wife had a part in the arrangements when a house, bought in the husband's name, was to serve as their matrimonial home.—L.J.

DEFAMING THE DEAD

- THERE can be little doubt that, in English law, in order to maintain an action in respect of defamatory words published concerning a deceased person, his relatives must show that their own reputations, and not merely that of the deceased, have been damaged. Libel and slander are essentially personal wrongs and a right of action on either of these grounds dies with the person defamed. It can be said with certainty that an action for defamation does not survive for the benefit of the deceased's estate (s. 1(1) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934) but the publication in question may be a criminal offence if the words are likely to provoke the members of the deceased's family to a breach of the peace (R. v. Topham, (1791) 4 Term Rep. 126). In this respect the law would seem to be the same in Scotland (see Broom v. Ritchie, (1904) 6F. 942 (Ct. of Sess.), and in other parts of the Commonwealth, but in New South Wales a Defamation Bill is now giving rise to heated controversy. The Legislatures of Queensland, Tasmania and Western Australia have already enacted that a person can bring an action for a libel on a deceased member of his family if the words are likely to injure his own reputation or induce other persons to shun, avoid, ridicule or despise him, but there are those who fear that the Government of New South Wales is about to go one stage further by providing that a person may sue for damages when a dead relative has been defamed by historians without showing injury to himself. However, it should be emphasised that the New South Wales Government maintains that the principal object of the Bill is merely to codify the existing law relating to defamation following the pattern of the Queensland Code. The Bill is expected to become law next week.—S.J.

A SOLICITOR'S LIEN

As a general rule, where a client discharges a solicitor, the solicitor can seek to enforce payment of his costs by withholding delivery of such of the client's papers as may have come into his possession in his professional capacity. In Lord v. Wormleighton, (1822) Jac. 580, Lord Eldon said "the discharged solicitor ought to be able to make use of the non-production of the papers in order to get what is due to him," but this does not mean to say that he is able to retain documents if he is thereby preventing persons other than his client from exerting their rights. No one can create a lien beyond his own interest, and this has been recognised at least since Marsh v. Bathoe, (1744) Ridg. 256. We assume that the line of authority which has its roots in this case was followed by Wrangham, J., when he affirmed a decision of Mr. Registrar Compton Miller to the effect that a solicitor (we will refer to him as "solicitor B") should deliver certain papers to solicitor C. A petitioner in a suit for divorce originally instructed solicitor A but he discharged that firm and instructed solicitor B who took over the papers at the same time giving a written undertaking to respect the lien of solicitor A. Solicitor B was later discharged and the petitioner then instructed solicitor C. Solicitor B contended that he had a lien on the papers. Wrangham, J., rejected this argument on the ground that divorce proceedings, having regard to the public interest involved, are in the same category as those cases where there is the interest of a third party. The Court of Appeal has now overruled this decision [Hughes v. Hughes, (1958) The Times, 31st July] and the judgment of the Court was delivered by Hodson, L.J. His Lordship conceded that divorce affected status and that the public interest was involved, but as divorce proceedings inter partes were still litigation he saw no reason why a litigant who sought to put away his wife should be in a better position in this respect than a litigant in any other civil proceedings. It would be odd, he remarked, if the petitioner was "able to get solicitors' work done for nothing by the simple expedient of changing his solicitor as often as he chose, leaving a trail of unpaid costs in his wake and demanding the papers without payment when he had no just cause to complain of the solicitors instructed and discarded."—S.J.

MARRIAGE OF AN EPILEPTIC

TOWARDS the end of last term, Collingwood, J., granted a decree of nullity to a wife petitioner on the ground that, at the time of the marriage, her husband was suffering from recurrent attacks of epilepsy of which she was entirely ignorant. Section 8 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, enabled the Court to hold that the marriage was voidable on this ground as it was satisfied that the petitioner was at the time of the marriage ignorant of her husband's condition, proceedings were instituted within a year of the marriage and the petitioner had not allowed sexual intercourse since her discovery of the existence of this ground for a decree of nullity. If the petitioner discovers that the respondent is subject to these fits and the Court cannot be satisfied on any one of these points, epilepsy in itself does not provide a sufficient ground for relief. Following the reasoning of Lord Merriman, P., in Leng. v. Leng., [1946] 2 All E.R. 590, it does not seem to be open to the petitioner, if unable to rely on the provisions of s. 8, to maintain that the unfortunate respondent is guilty of "constructive desertion". To argue otherwise would, in effect, be to contend that epilepsy, apart from the statutory provisions referred to above, is in every case a ground for dissolution of marriage.—S.J.

REVIEWS.

The Hindu Marriage Act, 1955. By P. V. DEOLALKAR, M.A., LL.B., Pleader. NASIK: 46, Main Road. 1959. Demi 8vo. Pages xii+321. Price: Rs. 10.

THE Hindu Marriage Act codifies the law relating to marriage among Hindus, and overrides ancient Hindu law relating to marriage. It introduces the institutions of judicial separation and divorce and recognises the principles of social equalities. The learned author has attempted to bring out in clear terms the precise significance of its various provisions. He has carefully compared many of the provisions of the Act with the provisions of allied Acts such as the Matrimonial Causes Act of England and the Indian Divorce Act. His exposition in the comments is brief but lucid. It has been suggested that the provisions in respect of registration of marriage under the Act should be uniform in all the States. Similarly, the law in respect of publication of proceedings under the Act should be uniform throughout the country. Certain anomalies existing in the Act have been clearly pointed out. There is a very thoughtful and illuminating foreword by Mr. Justice P. B. Gajendragadkar of the Supreme Court. The profession will find the book useful and instructive.

The Hindu Succession Act. By DEOKI NANDAN AGARWALA, Advocate. ALLAHABAD: Ram Narain Lal. 1959. Royal 8vo. Pages viii+230+xviii. Price: Rs. 6.

IN this book each section of the Act has been carefully analysed and references to all relevant cases bearing on each section have been given. Extensive quotations from important cases have been given to elucidate various points. The conflicting decisions on some of the controversial points have been carefully summarised, and the learned author has expressed his own opinion thereon. Section 14 of the Act seems to be very controversial and it has been dealt with by most of the High Courts. The book is sure to be helpful to all who have an occasion to deal with the law of Hindu Succession.

NATURE OF PROOF IN ELECTION PETITIONS.*

THE question in regard to nature of proof in election petitions is highly interesting both because it gives rise to heterochromous arguments and also because two conflicting views are propounded on this point, the first view being that the Legislature has made the procedure provided in the Civil Procedure Code applicable to the trials of election petitions and hence it is essentially a civil proceeding, that the person proceeded against, namely, the respondent is not an accused in law and that the applicability of the rules of decision of criminal cases being inconsistent with the spirit and requirements of the Representation of the People Act, the nature of proof should be the same as that in a civil proceeding; whereas the second view being that in an election petition, there are charges of corrupt practice which are of a criminal nature, that the consequences of an erroneous decision holding a person guilty of corrupt practice will be very grave both to the individual and to the society, that the success of a returned candidate is the verdict of the people, that the trial of an election petition is not of a civil nature and that it is almost a criminal inquiry and hence the standard of proof required is the same as in criminal cases.

Section 90 of the Representation of the People Act, 1951, lays down that subject to the provisions of the Act and of any rules made thereunder, every election petition shall be tried by the Tribunal, as nearly as may be, in accordance with the procedure applicable under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (Act V of 1908) to the trial of suits, and that the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872 (I of 1872) shall, subject to the provisions of the Act, be deemed to apply in all respects to the trial of an election petition. Section 3 of the Evidence Act gives the definition of "proved" by saying that a fact is said to be proved when, after considering the matters before it, the Court either believes it to exist, or considers its existence so probable that a prudent man ought, under the circumstances of the particular case, to act upon the supposition that it exists. The aforesaid definition indicates the degree of certainty which is required to treat a fact as proved and is so worded as to provide for two conditions of mind; first, that in which a man feels absolutely certain of a fact, in other words "believes it to exist" and, second, that in which, though he may not feel absolutely certain of a fact, he thinks it so extremely probable that a prudent man would, under the circumstances, act on the assumption of its existence. Absolute certainty in this work-a-day world is seldom to be had in the affairs of life, and we are frequently obliged to act on degrees of probability which fall very short of it and hence what is required in a legal trial is not absolute certainty. Practical good sense and prudence consist mainly in judging aright whether in each particular case, the degree of probability is so high as to justify one in regarding it as certainty and acting accordingly. Though the rules of evidence in civil and criminal cases are in general the same, still the probative effects of evidence in civil and criminal cases are not always the same and hence we find that a fact may be regarded as proved for purposes of a civil suit, though the evidence may not be considered sufficient for conviction in a criminal case. Best says that there is a strong and marked difference as to the effect of evidence in civil and criminal proceedings, that in the former a mere preponderance of probability, due regard being had to the burden of proof, is a sufficient basis of decision; but in the latter, especially when the offence charged is serious, a much higher degree of assurance is required, and that the serious consequences of an erroneous condemnation both to the accused and society have induced the laws of every wise and civilised nation to lay down the principle that the persuasion of guilt ought to amount to a moral certainty or such a moral certainty as convinces the minds of the tribunals, as reasonable men, beyond all reasonable doubt. Unlike criminal cases, in civil cases it cannot be said that the benefit of every reasonable doubt must necessarily go to the defendant. In other words, it may be said that whereas in a civil case a mere preponderance of probability is a sufficient basis of decision, in a criminal case persuasion of guilt must amount to such a moral certainty as convinces the minds of the tribunal as reasonable men beyond all reasonable doubt; that in a criminal case before the Court is called upon to convict a person, it has to satisfy itself that possibility of his innocence is ruled out, but in a civil case all that is necessary to insist upon is that the proof adduced in support of a fact is such that should make a prudent man to act upon the supposition that it exists, and that acting on the well-established principle that it is better that ten guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should suffer, Courts always insist on a much higher degree of proof in criminal cases than in civil cases. The aforesaid distinction is nowhere enacted in the Evidence Act but is based upon the rules of prudence and is founded on public policy. The special rules and principles applicable to criminal cases may be epitomised in brief as follows:—

- (1) Everyone is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved.
- (2) Proof must amount to a moral certainty and must exclude all reasonable doubt.
- (3) The benefit of doubt must be given to the accused.
- (4) The onus of proving everything essential to the establishment of the charge against the accused always lies on the prosecution.
- (5) Suspicion, however strong, is not legally tantamount to proof.
- (6) If an accused person offers an explanation which is reasonably true, it should not be rejected and the accused must be acquitted the reason being that the main burden of proof of establishing guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt rests upon the prosecution.
- (7) Proof of the case against the accused person depends not upon the absence or weakness of explanation on his part but on positive affirmative evidence of his guilt.
- (8) Stronger proof is required in criminal cases than in civil cases on the principle that it is better that 10 guilty men should escape than one innocent man should suffer.
- (9) When there is circumstantial evidence against the accused, then in order to justify the inference of guilt, the incriminating circumstances must be incompatible with the innocence of the accused and incapable of explanation upon any other reasonable hypothesis than that of his guilt.

So far as an election petition is concerned, it is strongly and seriously argued that the rules of decision of criminal cases are inconsistent with the spirit and requirements of the Representation of the People Act, that there is no presumption of any kind in favour of the respondent, that he could have no benefit of doubt and that the nature of proof in the case of election petitions should be the same as that in civil cases. The argument in favour of the view that the nature of proof in election petitions should be the same as in civil cases may be adumbrated in brief as follows:—

- (1) The nature of proof in election petitions rests upon the character of the proceeding, and in this respect it is to be noted that s. 90 of the Representation of the People Act provides that subject to the provisions of the Act and of any rules made thereunder, every election petition shall be tried by the Tribunal, as nearly as may be, in accordance with the procedure applicable under the Code of Civil Procedure to the trial of suits.
- (2) Election proceedings are initiated by the presentation of a petition either by a candidate or a voter and the main relief claimed consists of two declarations, namely void nature of the election of the returned candidate and a declaration that a candidate other than the returned candidate has been duly elected. Thus, in essence the proceeding is one which pertains to the establishment of rights and is of a civil nature.

(3) The proceedings before the Election Tribunal can under no circumstances be said to be criminal proceedings especially when the position of the respondent who is the successful candidate is not in law that of an accused and hence he would not be entitled to have the proceedings against him decided on the general principles applicable to prosecutions based on technicalities peculiar to criminal trials.

(4) Since an election petition is to be tried in accordance with the procedure applicable to the trial of suits, the petition can not be justifiably compared to a complaint. The petitioner makes some averments of facts and law against the respondent and he desires the Court to give a judgment and naturally the burden of proof of the facts for establishing the case will be on him. However, just like in a suit, there may be various issues in an election petition and the burden of proof of some of them may be on the petitioner and of some of them on the respondent and in such cases if the petitioner establishes the facts on which he relies, naturally it will be for the other side to establish his contention and then the burden of proof will be said to have shifted to him.

(5) Regard being had to the procedure and the rules of evidence it is not proper to accept the principle of never shifting character of the burden of proof in an election petition.

(6) It cannot be gainsaid that the respondent is to put forth his case by way of written statement in answer to the allegations made against him and since even issues are required to be framed, the whole trial of an election petition is exactly similar to the trial of a civil suit.

(7) The provisions of the Evidence Act are applicable to the trial of an election petition and s. 3 of the Indian Evidence Act which defines proof and which governs the trial of election petitions does not make any distinction between civil and criminal cases regarding proof.

(8) Being a party to the proceeding, the respondent is to give evidence in his favour and also is to be examined on oath by the Tribunal and this circumstance shows that the election petition is not a criminal proceeding.

(9) It is not the nature of the issues to be tried that will determine the nature of the trial and attract the rules governing proceedings, but it is the nature of the Court or Tribunal that is material and that will show that an election proceeding is a civil proceeding and not a criminal proceeding.

(10) If we examine the provisions of the Representation of the People Act regarding corrupt practice, we will find that many acts which constitute corrupt practice are not in fact criminal in nature but they have been banned because of their relation to election. The ordinary acts such as treating and common hospitality, appeals on the ground of religion, use of religious symbols, hiring vehicles for conveyance of others or incurring expenses cannot ordinarily be said to be repugnant to lawful behaviour or public morals. However, if they are practised for inducing others to vote for particular candidate, they become corrupt and come within the mischief of the Act. Many corrupt practices are not offences as such under criminal law and the inquiry in respect of them is purely of a civil nature.

(11) The reasons on the strength of which a presumption of innocence has been claimed in election cases, are neither sufficient nor so compelling as those that are the basis for raising the same presumption in criminal trials. The functions of a sovereign democratic republic are carried out by the people through their representatives who constitute the legislative bodies and the Representation of the People Act has been enacted to make provision for the elections of the representatives who are chosen by the electors who themselves are the privileged citizens and have the necessary qualifications.

(12) Every citizen cannot qua a citizen claim the status of an elector. For the membership of either house of the Legislature also some qualifications are necessary. It cannot be argued that a presumption will be raised that every person is qualified for the membership of the Legislature similar to the presumption of innocence in favour of an accused.

(13) The result of a finding that a person has committed a corrupt practice is the disqualification of that person i.e. suspension of his electoral rights which is the creation of the electoral law. This disqualification can also be removed by the Election Commission and the consequences of an erroneous decision regarding the finding of corrupt practice cannot be said to be as great and as serious as those of an erroneous decision in a criminal case in which an innocent person is convicted.

(14) It cannot be said that it is better to allow 99 corrupt members to continue their seats in the Legislature than to unseat one uncorrupt member on the analogy of the maxim in respect of criminal trials that it is better that 99 guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should suffer.

(15) Such a maxim and the presumption of every individual being innocent in election inquiries will not advance the interests of the society or the State. The electoral law has not laid down any artificial presumption of innocence or uncorruptness or the rules of burden of proof beyond reasonable doubt and hence it is quite safe and rather desirable to follow the rules governing the decisions of civil proceedings in respect of standard of proof or the quality, quantity and force of evidence required for finding the truth in the case of election petitions.

(16) The rule of benefit of doubt is a necessary corollary of the rule requiring the rigid standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt and in inquiries of a civil nature where the Civil Procedure Code is made applicable, there is no scope for such a reasonable doubt and if at all such case arises, the matter of the proof of a particular fact is generally decided taking into consideration the burden of proof. In civil cases it cannot be said that the benefit of doubt must go to the defendant.

(17) It is well-known that in criminal trials the accused is not bound to open his mouth nor is he bound to give any explanation and by mere argument and suggestions taking the case against him within the pale of a reasonable doubt he can escape the consequences of conviction.

(18) The question of benefit of doubt is intimately connected with criminal proceedings, but the respondent in an election petition has no privilege to keep silent and there is no scope for benefit of doubt.

(19) It is also to be noted that there is no presumption in favour of the respondent and hence he is not entitled to any benefit of doubt. It is further to be noted that the rules of evidence in respect of confession and accomplice evidence which are peculiar to a criminal trial will not be applicable to a civil trial.

(20) Thus it can be said with sufficient force that the inquiry of an election petition is of a civil nature and the general principles governing decisions in civil cases regarding nature of proof will have to be adopted in that case.

In Election Petition No. 116 of 1957 decided on February 20, 1958 (Shri. Prataproa Deorao Bhosale v. Shri. Shivram Sawant Khem Sawant Bhosale, published in Bombay Government Gazette, Part IV C, dated June 26, 1958) the view adopted is that so far as election petitions are concerned, they are of a civil nature and the nature of proof in such is the same as the nature of proof in civil proceedings.

As against the aforesaid view, it may be noted that the charges of corrupt practice are of a criminal nature, that the consequences of an erroneous decision holding a person guilty of corrupt practice would be very grave both to the individual and to the society, that the success of a returned candidate is the verdict of the people, that the trial of an election petition is quasi-criminal, that the petitioner must establish the alleged corrupt practice beyond reasonable doubt, that the burden of proof of the corrupt practices is exclusively upon the petitioner and it never shifts and that the standard of proof required is the same as in criminal cases and accordingly the charges must be proved beyond reasonable doubt and the respondent will be entitled to the benefit of doubt as an accused person. It is also to be noted that an election petition is not a matter in which only the two candidates are interested as plaintiff and defendant in a civil suit but the citizens at large have an interest therein and in such circumstances mere preponderance of probabilities should not be the basis of proof in an election petition as in civil cases.

Before deciding the point in question, some cases may be noted. It is held in *Dr. K. N. Gairola v. Gangadhar Maithani*¹ that in the case of allegations of corrupt practice, the burden of proof is on the petitioner and that burden never shifts, that the standard of proof is as in criminal cases and that the benefit of doubt will go to the respondent.

In *Sudhansu Sekhar Ghosh v. Satyendra Nath*² it is held that it cannot be laid down broadly that an enquiry into a corrupt practice is in the nature of a criminal case, and that the respondent is in the position of an accused person and that though the burden of proof is on the petitioner to prove a corrupt practice, still the respondent is not absolved from all liability to adduce evidence to disprove the case of the petitioner.

In *Abdul Rouf v. Makhtar Ali*³ it is held that the enquiry into corrupt practices under the law of election being of a quasi-criminal character, strict proof is to be demanded of the person bringing the charge to prove his case beyond all reasonable doubt, but that does not fully exonerate the person charged with such corrupt practice, from producing evidence, specially of facts within his special knowledge as he is bound to do under the provisions of s. 186 of the Indian Evidence Act.

It is held in Bombay City South (N.M.U.) 1930, Hammond, p. 191 that the standard of proof necessary to establish a corrupt practice of bribery should be that required at a criminal trial.

In Sri Ram v. Mohammad Taqi Hadi,⁴ it is observed that the charge of bribery is a serious one and the same kind of evidence is required to prove such a charge in proceedings arising out of an election petition as is necessary in criminal trials, and that in any event, clear and unequivocal proof is required before a charge of bribery can be held to have been established.

After having closely and carefully gone through the various cases and after having considerably cogitated thereabout, I think that when an election petition is being heard wherein a corrupt practice is charged against the elected member, the proceeding must in its very nature be looked upon as a quasi-criminal proceeding, that the charge of corrupt practice is a very serious charge and that the approach which is to be made to the inquiry by the Tribunal must be the approach which is to be made in regard to a criminal proceeding. Section 123 of the Representation of the People Act refers to corrupt practices and s. 141 thereof lays down that if any person is upon the trial of an election petition found guilty of any corrupt practice, he shall for a period of six years from the date of the conviction or from the date on which such finding takes effect, be disqualified for voting at any election. I am fortified in my view by the observations of their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Harish Chandra v. Triloki Singh,⁵ wherein it is said at page 456 that it should not be forgotten that charges of corrupt practices are quasi-criminal in character and that the allegations relating thereto must be sufficiently clear and precise to bring home the charges to the candidates. I may also refer to the decision in First Appeal No. 381 of 1958 decided on September 19, 1958 (Ahmedmiya Sherumiya Shaikh v. Chhippa Ibrahim Nuraji, published in the Bombay Government Gazette, Part IV-C, dated January 15, 1959) wherein the view adopted by the Bombay High Court is that an election petition wherein there is a charge of corrupt practice is to be looked upon as quasi-criminal.

By way of epilogue and epitome, it may be stated that the argument that the nature of proof in election petitions should be the same as in civil cases can be successfully confuted and that the true and proper view is that the nature of proof in election petitions should be the same as in quasi-criminal proceedings. In an election petition therefore which involves charges of corrupt practices:

- (1) The respondent is to be presumed innocent until the contrary is proved.
- (2) The onus of proving everything essential to the establishment of the charge of corrupt practice lies on the petitioner.
- (3) Proof in regard to corrupt practice must amount to a moral certainty and must exclude all reasonable doubt.
- (4) Benefit of every reasonable doubt must be given to the respondent against whom a charge of corrupt practice is levelled.
- (5) Suspicion, however strong and grave it may be, cannot be legally tantamount to proof so far as the charge of corrupt practice is concerned.
- (6) If the respondent offers an explanation which is reasonably true; that should not be rejected and he would be acquitted of the charge in regard to corrupt practice because the main burden of proof of establishing the guilt of the respondent lies upon the petitioner beyond all reasonable doubt.
- (7) Proof of the case against the respondent is to rest not upon the absence or weakness of explanation on the part of the respondent but on the positive affirmative evidence of his guilt to be adduced by the petitioner.
- (8) In the case of circumstantial evidence against the respondent in regard to corrupt practice, the incriminating circumstances must be incompatible with the innocence of the respondent and incapable of explanation upon any other reasonable hypothesis than that of his guilt. If there is a reasonable hypothesis inconsistent with the guilt of the respondent, then there would be a reasonable doubt about the charge of corrupt practice and the benefit of that doubt will go to the respondent.

BOMBAY REGULATION VIII OF 1827.*

THIS Regulation VIII of 1827 is kept alive and published in Bombay Code Vol. I, p. 9 in its present modified form. It contains 11 sections and three Appendices A, B, and C, with the forms of proclamations. Section 10 of this Regulation is very important. It is not applicable to intestate property which is dealt with by a Magistrate under the Bombay District Police Act, Bombay IV of 1890, s. 58(3).

This Regulation gives jurisdiction to a Zilla Court. The Zilla Court is nowhere defined under any of the laws that are prevalent and current in India. Therefore to take its ordinary meaning it would mean a District Court throughout the State. Then the question would naturally arise which is the District Court for Greater Bombay where there are no District Courts. The Courts in Bombay are the High Court, the City Civil Court, the Court of Small Causes and the Presidency Magistrates' Courts. None of these Courts are by any implication or otherwise a District Court. Then the next question that would arise would be that whether the entire population which is about 40 lacs of people that live in Greater Bombay have any remedy under this Regulation or not. So far as the mofussil is concerned anybody can walk up to the District Court and make an application under this Regulation. Then what about Bombay? In order to answer this question it would be necessary to trace the history of this Regulation and find out when this Regulation was passed and how was it being operated; and whether the very same powers that were exercised since 1827 by the Courts at Bombay are continued at present or not? Then the next question that arises would be which were the Courts that were exercising jurisdiction in 1827 and thereafter.

This Regulation was promulgated by the Directors of the East India Company in Bombay in 1827. It was repealed in part by Act XII of 1873. The application of s. 10 of this Regulation was restricted locally by Bombay Act IV of 1890, s. 58(3), which is the Bombay District Police Act. It has again been modified by the Adaptation of Indian Laws Order in Council. It is further adapted and modified by the Adaptation of Laws Order, 1950. Thus it will be seen that the Regulation is kept alive and operative till today. The Chief Presidency Magistrate at Bombay does issue even today an "heirship certificate" from the time since the said Regulation was passed in 1827. And such "Heirship Certificates" issued by the Chief Presidency Magistrate are accepted by the Government offices, mills and other semi-government bodies. But banks and other bodies do not accept them as valid representation to the estate of a deceased person. The State Bank and other Government banks do accept them. The reason for the refusal of some banks to accept these Heirship Certificates is that they think the Chief Presidency Magistrate has no such authority under law. This argument is erroneous as will be seen from the following previous history which will show how the Chief Presidency Magistrate has derived these powers.

Now in order to determine whether the Chief Presidency Magistrate has the necessary powers to issue such Heirship Certificates in Bombay is a point which can be determined by going through the history of Justice and Protection in the island of Bombay. This history of Justice and Protection is given in the Gazetteer of Bombay City and Island, Vol. II, p. 204, Chap. VII, heading Justice and Protection. At page 204 you find that when General Aungier arrived in Bombay he first made a systematic attempt to introduce Courts of law in 1669-70. He established two types of Courts. (1) Inferior Courts took cognisance of all disputes under 200 zeraphins. It consisted of a civil officer of the company assisted by native officers. (2) Superior Courts with higher jurisdiction consisted of Deputy Governor-in-Council which took cognisance of all civil and criminal cases. They were styled as Judges of the Courts of Judicature. At p. 206 you find that the Island of Bombay was divided into two distinct precincts; one comprehending Bombay, Mazagaon and Girgaum; the other comprising Mahim, Parel, Sion, Worli and the pakhadis thereto belonging. At p. 207 you find that George Wilcox was appointed a Judge on August 8, 1672, in charge of civil and criminal work. He was also in charge of the Register of Probate of Wills and Inventories of dead man's estates. After his death in 1674, Thomas Nicolls was appointed in 1675. He was succeeded by Captain Henry Gray who was granted the title of Chief Justice. Captain Gray and Captain Keigwin were appointed joint Justices of the Peace and sat together with Messrs. Ward and Day to hear all causes and try criminals. At p. 211 you find, in 1726 the Court served at one and the same time as a civil, criminal, Military, Admiralty and Probate Court; it even framed rules for the price of bread and wages of black tailors. At p. 212 you find, the directors of the company asked for the establishment of a Mayor's Court to deal with ordinary civil and criminal work. Connected with the Court of this date (1720-27) were the Vereaders (Procurator or Attorney) a body of native functionaries who looked after orphans and the estate of persons dying intestate, who also audited accounts like a Panchayat. About 1726 they were granted certain judicial powers which they retained until 1775. Even now the Mayor of Bombay is addressed as His Worship in view of the previous judicial, civil and criminal powers he had then. At p. 213 it is stated, the Court of Directors represented to the King and asked for permission to establish Mayor's Courts at Madras, Bombay and Calcutta. It was granted on September 24, 1726, and a new Charter was issued creating the Mayor's Courts consisting of a Mayor and nine Aldermen. The Court was declared a Court of Record, and was empowered to hear civil cases of all kinds. The Charter further authorised the Governor and Council to hold quarter Sessions for trial of all offences except high treason. At p. 214 it says, William Henry Draper was appointed the first Mayor. At p. 218, it is stated, on January 8, 1753, a new Charter was issued which replaced the old Charters whereby the civil jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court was forbidden to entertain suits between natives of Bombay except with the consent of the parties. The jurisdiction of the Governor's Court in criminal matters was limited to offences committed within Bombay and the factories and places directly subordinate to it. The new Charter also created a Court of Requests for the summary disposal of small causes not exceeding 5 pagodas or Rs. 15 in value. At p. 220 it is stated, the Mayor's Court was abolished and was replaced by a Recorder's Court composed of a Recorder, the Mayor, and three Aldermen. And the Court was invested with the whole civil and criminal jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court and the Court of Oyer and Terminer. Its jurisdiction extended to ecclesiastical and admiralty cases. The first Recorder of Bombay was Sir William Syer being appointed in 1799. At p. 222 it states, the Recorder's Court was not free from irregularities. In 1825 Sir E. West animadverted severely upon the irregularities perpetrated by the magistrates of Police and the Court of petty sessions, which had been established in 1812. At p. 223, it says, in 1823 Recorder's Courts were abolished and a Supreme Court of Judicature was established by an Act passed in 1823. The first Chief Justice of Bombay was Sir E. West, then Recorder of Bombay. The Supreme Court of Judicature was duly opened on May 8, 1824. The new Court was invested with full power and authority to exercise and perform all civil, criminal, equity, admiralty and ecclesiastical jurisdiction within the island of Bombay and the factories subordinate thereto. It was invested with jurisdiction of King's Bench in England, and generally was granted all powers exercised by the Mayor's Courts and the Recorder's Courts. At p. 225, it mentions of the transfer of Sadar Diwani and Sadar Foujdari Adaulat from Surat to Bombay in 1827, and they were wholly independent of the Supreme Court. The inferior Courts in the Island of Bombay at this period were the Courts of the Police Magistrates including a Court for the Mahim division opened in 1830. At p. 226 you find, in 1858 Queen Victoria took over from the East India Company the direct government of the country. On August 6, 1861, an Act of Parliament was passed abolishing the Supreme Court, the Sadar Diwani Adaulat and the Sadar Foujdari Adaulat, and established instead the High Court, vested with entire jurisdiction, power and authority hitherto exercised by the three abolished Courts. At p. 233 it states, at the outset of the nineteenth century no special Regulations existed dealing with crime or with minor offences within the Island of Bombay, and such offences as were committed were punished under rules applicable to the whole of British dominions in Western India consisting of Surat, Salsette, Bombay and Bankot. But by 1812 public attention had been directed towards the need of reform in matters both police and sanitation; and on March 25, 1812, a "Rule, Ordinance and Regulation" was passed for the good order and civil government of the Island of Bombay, whereby, a senior and junior Magistrate of Police and a Court of Petty Sessions were created. At p. 235 it mentions, the Chief Presidency Magistrate was granted powers similar to those exercised by District Magistrates over subordinate Magistrates. These powers were subsequently confirmed by the Amended Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898). The Chief Presidency Magistrate, apart from his ordinary magisterial duties and his control of his three colleagues, has various miscellaneous duties to perform within the limits of the Island of Bombay. Thus he is a Revenue Judge under the Bombay City Land Revenue Act II of 1876, Judge of the Court of Survey for the disposal of cases arising under the Indian Merchants Shipping Act VII of 1880, and the President of Marine Inquiries.

Thus it will be seen from the history of the establishment of various types of Courts in Bombay, the powers exercised by the Mayor's Courts and Recorder's Courts were being exercised by the Police Magistrates. And the present Presidency Magistrate's Courts are the successors in title of those Courts exercising the same powers. The Chief Presidency Magistrate is also the Revenue Judge for the Island of Bombay. The Court Fees Amendment Act, XXXIV of 1949, s. 2 states: In this Act, the Collector shall include any officer authorised by the chief controlling Authority to perform the functions of a Collector under this Act. The Chief Presidency Magistrate is performing the same duties of a Revenue Judge even now. Besides, the Indian Succession Act, ss. 214 and 215, mentions a certificate granted under the Bombay Regulation VIII of 1827. Section 58(3) of the Bombay District Police Act mentions the Heirship Certificate. Section 390 of the Indian Succession Act also mentions such a certificate. Now the Bombay City Police Act and the Bombay District Police Act are abolished and a new Act called the Bombay Police Act comprehending both the Acts is passed wherein ss. 83, 84, 85 and 86 are similar to the provisions of the Bombay District Police Act. The Criminal Procedure Code also in ss. 516A and 517 and 523 are similar.

Now the word used in Regulation VIII of 1827 is the Zilla Court which is empowered to issue such certificates. The word Zilla is not defined in the said Regulation. It is not defined by the Civil Procedure Code nor by the General Clauses Act, Central as well as the Bombay Act. Thus it follows that the Zilla Courts which were functioning in 1827 were the Police Magistrates who were looking after the Probate and intestate matters. The present Chief Presidency Magistrate is the successor in title of those Police Magistrates. None of the later Acts have taken away any powers that were exercised by the Police Magistrates. And therefore, the Chief Presidency Magistrate in Bombay is the only authority and has powers to issue Heirship Certificates under the said Regulation VIII of 1827, which is kept alive by the Adaptation of Laws Order, 1950. And for the last several years in the past the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Bombay has been issuing such Heirship Certificates. If necessary the Government may be moved to define the word Zilla or amend the said Regulation by putting an appropriate word in place of the word Zilla so as to include the Chief Presidency Magistrate's Court as a Zilla Court for Bombay.

The Accountant General of Bombay does accept such Heirship Certificates issued by the Chief Presidency Magistrate. Mills and other semi-government bodies including the various municipalities also accept such certificates.

The ordinary meaning of the word Zilla is a District. Section 2, sub-a. (4) of the Civil Procedure Code defines the word district; and Bombay is considered a district for the purposes of the Civil Procedure Code. Therefore, the only Court that could be considered a Zilla Court in Bombay, from the previous history shown above is the Court of the Chief Presidency Magistrate. Because the High Court nor the City Civil Court nor the Court of Small Causes in Bombay are the District Courts within the meaning of the Civil Procedure Code.

The amended Court-fees Act, s. 12A, states that no court-fees are chargeable for granting succession certificate for the estate of deceased intestate below Rs. 1,000. The Succession Certificate Act, VII of 1889, also mentions the Heirship Certificates. Sir Dinshaw Mulla in his Mahomedan Law, Ch. V, mentions the grant of Heirship Certificates and they are accepted as valid. The Government Securities Act, s. 13, mentions an Heirship Certificate being issued by the Chief Presidency Magistrate in the Presidency towns upto the face value of Rs. 5,000. And in the mofussil the District Magistrate is the proper authority for the Government Securities Act. The definition given in the said Act says that the Chief Presidency Magistrate is the District Magistrate for Presidency towns.

There are a few authorities reported in the Law Reports. They are: *Shripat R. Kulkarni v. Vithoji M. Patil*¹, *Abaji Gopal v. Ramchandra Chimanaji*² and *Khanderao Rayajirav v. Ganesh Shastri*³.

DR. M. R. JAYAKAR.

On March 11, 1959, the members of the High Court Bar gathered together in the First Court to mourn the loss caused by the sad death of Dr. M. R. Jayakar.

The Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chainani, Chief Justice, said:

Mr. Advocate General, Mr. Government Pleader and members of the Bar,

We meet today under a tragedy of death. We meet to mourn the death of a great son of this country and an eminent lawyer of this Court.

Dr. Jayakar was called to the Bar in 1905. He was enrolled as an advocate of this Court on the Original Side in the same year. He started practice on the Original Side, but, to use his own expression, he gradually gravitated to the Appellate Side, where he built up a very large practice. He took to public life at a very early stage of his career in 1916, where he distinguished himself in working for the freedom of this country. In 1923, when he was still very young, he was elected as a member of the Bombay Legislative Council. He then moved to the Centre and he became a member of the Central Legislative Assembly in 1926. Thereafter his career alternated between law and politics.

His great work as a lawyer received recognition in 1937, when he was appointed as a Judge of the Federal Court. Two years later he was appointed a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, where he worked till 1941. In that year he resigned his membership of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and then he returned to this country. Here he continued his public activities.

Towards the end of his career, he devoted himself to the cause of education. He was Vice-Chancellor of the new Poona University for eight years from 1948 till 1956, and he put that University on a solid and firm foundation.

He had also a very great love for this High Court, which he showed in 1948 when he presented to this Court the Kirtikar Law Library. He also gave to this Library securities of the value of Rs. 25,000.

By his death we have lost a great and eminent lawyer, a great educationist, and a true patriot. May his soul rest in peace.

Mr. H. M. Seervai, Advocate General, said:

My Lords,

On behalf of the Bar I desire to associate myself with what has fallen from My Lord the Chief Justice. We have come to mourn the loss of one of our members which is not the less keenly felt because for long he has ceased to be in active practice. So far as my connections go, he was a Professor of English in a College to which I am proud to belong and my Professor of Philosophy always used to say that he was second to none in the clarity of his thought and the precision with which he spoke English. He was also an illustration of a broad Victorian culture; of a man of independent means and considerable wealth who could have spent his time in ease but who preferred to devote his time to work for public welfare. The high offices which he filled—he was a Judge of the Federal Court and a Member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—bear testimony to his great legal learning and repute. He was a very fine speaker and I recollect with pleasure listening to his arguments in this very Court before an Appellate Bench. It is a matter of regret that his and should have come so soon because some time before he died he has published the First Volume of his Autobiography and glancing over its pages, I see that he noted for himself that he was never a very good party man because he had essentially a judicial approach. He looked at the other man's point of view and that essentially judicial approach helped him to serve as a peace-maker on many important political occasions.

My Lord, at a time like this not much is required to be said. He himself has said a good deal in his Autobiography and we can only hope that the remaining portions of it are complete, even only in manuscript.

We would wish on behalf of the Bar to express our deep sense of sorrow at the loss of a very distinguished lawyer.

Mr. Y. V. Chandrachud, Government Pleader, said:

My Lords,

We meet today under the shadow of a grievous loss. Death has laid its icy hand on Dr. Jayakar and on behalf of the Bar, I associate myself with the sentiments which have been expressed by My Lord the Chief Justice and by the learned leader of the Bar.

The death of Dr. Jayakar removes from our midst a personality that was cultured and colourful. Dr. Jayakar was a man of many parts and in his versatility he combined within himself qualities which were apparently inconsistent and irreconcilable. Though he was a keen and trenchant debater, he, with his legal training, never failed to appreciate the other man's point of view. Though he was a powerful and picturesque orator, he displayed no particular passion to reach the masses. Education was perhaps his first love, but he took to it in the closing years of his life. It was after he resigned his membership of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that he became the first Vice-Chancellor of the Poona University.

Dr. Jayakar was a renowned scholar of Sanskrit literature and with his command over the English language and the mastery over Sanskrit literature, he gathered a lucrative practice. He was a noted Hindu law lawyer. It is said that in those old days a number of rich Hindu widows—and with no Death Duty and with small taxes, there were quite a few of them—used to consult Dr. Jayakar on matters, as for example, whether expenses for a pilgrimage to Benares would fall under the label of that fluid entity called 'legal necessity'. In his later years, Dr. Jayakar shifted his fidelity from Hindu law to Constitutional problems and it is well-known that he acted as a legal adviser to many a princely State in India.

As I said Dr. Jayakar was a man of many parts. It is not widely known that he had a passion for music. For several years, after a hard day's work, he found relaxation in playing the Sitar and he would not retire for the night unless he played the Sitar for a brief while.

It is a sad thought that Death, with one stroke, can destroy so much that is good. Dr. Jayakar is dead but his golden voice will continue to resound through the corridors of these Courts. We, of the Appellate Bar, can ill-afford to forget Dr. Jayakar. For us he will live through his munificent donation of the Kirtikar Law Library.

May his soul rest in peace.

Mr. N. H. Sethna, President of the Incorporated Law Society, said:

My Lord,

On behalf of the Incorporated Law Society and the members of my profession, I beg to associate myself with the sentiments expressed by your Lordship the Chief Justice, the Advocate General and the Government Pleader.

My Lord, there is very little which I can say of Dr. Jayakar except to strike a personal note that perhaps of all those who have gathered here I happen to be the one person who learnt the Hindu law sitting at his feet and who subsequently briefed him in this Court and had the privilege of acting for him as a solicitor, since he and his family used to be the clients of my former firm M/s. Mervanji Kola and Co. As such, my Lord, I came into contact with him on several occasions and naturally could not fail to admire the manner in which he not only conducted his affairs, but also the manner in which he looked upon the large public interests, particularly during the political struggle which preceded the grant of independence to India.

My Lord, Dr. Jayakar's one great regret so far as Bombay was concerned was that large tracts of land, which formerly belonged to the Marathi-speaking people, went out of their ownership into other people's hands. He used to express great regret at that.

Moreover, my Lord, as a virtual founder, I may say, of the Poona University, he tried his level best to get munificent donations; and I know, as a matter of fact, that on one occasion he narrowly missed receiving the princely sum of Rs. 10 lakhs from a Parsi gentleman who died just before the cheque which he had passed could be honoured at the Bank. My Lord, that was one of his greatest regrets that such a munificent donation was lost to the Poona University which he considered as his pet.

My Lord, there is no doubt that it would be impossible easily to find a man with such versatility, so much energy and who could even before his death, when he was suffering from physical defect, did so much in the cause not only of the country, but generally of education and of law.

May his soul rest in peace.

The following resolution was passed at the Special General Meeting of the Kirtikar Law Library held on March 11, 1959:—

This Special General Meeting of the 'Kirtikar Law Library' places on record the profound sorrow of its members on the sad and sudden demise of Dr. M. R. Jayakar, the founder-father of this Library but for whose abiding interest in the members of the Advocates' Association of Western India, and but for whose munificent gift of very valuable law books, Government Securities worth Rs. 25,000/- and the glass cases, valued in the Trust deed dated 27th January 1943, at Rs. 1,00,000/-, in memory of his maternal grand-father Shri V. J. Kirtikar, this Library would never have come into existence.

This Special General Meeting further places on record with gratitude and admiration, its appreciation of the magnificent services rendered by Dr. Jayakar, to the country as a leading, scholarly and brilliant member of the Bombay Bar, as a profound Jurist, a noted Liberal Politician, as a Judge of the Federal Court, as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, as an eminent Educationist, as an Original-Thinker, and author, and above all as a matchless Orator with a grand style, both inside and outside the Courts, whose heroic and sublime words inspired dignity, courage and patriotism among Indians every time and every where.

This Special General Meeting shares with the members of his family the deep sorrow on account of the irreparable loss caused by his departure from us and prays that his Soul may rest in peace.

GLEANNINGS.

COUNSEL'S DUTY TO CITE AUTHORITIES.

LORD BIRKENHEAD L.C. said [in *Glebe Sugar Refining Co. Ltd. v. Trustees of the Port and Harbours of Greenock] that a point of considerable general importance had arisen upon which he thought it right to make some observations.

* (1921) W. N. 85, 86.

It was not, of course, in cases of complication possible for their Lordship to be aware of all the authorities, statutory or other, which might be relevant to the issues requiring decision in the particular case. Their Lordships were, therefore, very much in the hands of counsel and those who instructed counsel in these matters, and the House expected, and indeed insisted, that authorities which bore one way or the other upon the matters under debate should be brought to the attention of their Lordships by those who were aware of those authorities. That observation was irrespective of whether or not the particular authority assisted the party which was aware of it. It was an obligation of confidence between their Lordships and all those who assisted in the debates in this House in the capacity of counsel. It had been shown that Mr. Sandeman, Sir John Simon, and Mr. Macmillan were unaware of the existence of the section, which appeared to their Lordships to be highly relevant to, and indeed decisive upon, the matters under discussion here. Indeed, the circumstances in which leading counsel were very often briefed at the last moment rendered such an absence of knowledge extremely intelligible. But he himself found it very difficult to believe that some of those instructing learned counsel were not well aware of the existence, and the possible importance and relevance, of the section in question. It was the duty of such persons, if they were so aware, to have directed the attention of leading counsel to the section and to its possible relevance, in order that they in turn might have brought it to the attention of their Lordships. A similar matter arose in this House some years ago, and it was pointed out by the then presiding Judge that the withholding from their Lordships of any authority which might throw light upon the matters under debate was really to obtain a decision from their Lordships in the absence of the material and information which a properly informed decision required; it was, in effect, to convert this House into a debating assembly upon legal matters, and to obtain a decision founded upon imperfect knowledge. The extreme impropriety of such a course could not be made too plain. The learned counsel who had addressed their Lordships were acquitted of personal responsibility in this matter, but he very much hoped that the observations he had thought it necessary to make would prevent a recurrence of that with which he had dealt. It was possible that the views which their Lordships had formed upon this point would be reflected in the order which their Lordships might think proper to make.

A GRAVE OFFENCE

In Reg. v. Moodie (The Times, January 14) the Court of Criminal Appeal (Lord Parker, C.J., Stable and Donovan, JJ.) substituted a sentence of twelve months' imprisonment for one of three years passed by Ashworth, J., on the appellant, who had been charged with murder, set up the defence of diminished responsibility under s. 2 of the Homicide Act, 1957, and was convicted of manslaughter of his twelve-year-old daughter. The matter came before the Court on an application for leave to appeal against the sentence and the Court treated the hearing of the application as the hearing of the appeal. The child had been an idiot since birth. She could neither walk nor talk and was subject to seizures without warning, so that her mother and her father had to be with her all the time. The tragedy became worse as the child grew. The appellant, who bore an exemplary character, administered under extreme pressure of emotion a dose of a drug known as nembital and put something over the child's mouth to stop her breathing. She died peacefully in her sleep.

The Lord Chief Justice, delivering the judgment of the Court, said that this was clearly a most difficult case in which to pass sentence. If there were only the appellant to consider, one's sympathy would dictate the most lenient of sentences, but there were public considerations. Nothing that the Courts did should lead the public to believe that a killing of this kind was other than a grave offence. The trial Judge had taken the view that considerations of a public character dictated a sentence of at least three years' imprisonment. But the Court of Criminal Appeal thought the circumstances were such that it was in a position to reduce the sentence. Persons such as the appellant were not criminals in the ordinary sense; they often acted in what they considered were the best of motives and the real deterrent, if deterrent there were, was not a question of how many years' imprisonment they would get.—L.T.

RECRUITS FOR THE PROFESSION: SCOTTISH AND AMERICAN PROBLEMS

In England, neither the quantity nor the quality of the human material seeking a legal career has yet given cause for serious alarm, although prophets have not been lacking who foresee a decline in both. Scottish concern, it appears, is with the shortage in number of legal apprentices, believed to be due to such causes as inadequate salaries, holidays, time off for study and personal supervision by partners. The Scottish Association of Law Students and Apprentices is to investigate the "long dissatisfaction with conditions in some legal offices" by issuing a questionnaire to all law apprentices in Edinburgh covering these matters (The Times, December 22). Complaints of this nature are certainly not unknown in England, but as yet do not seem to have led to any perceptible diminution in the annual flow of candidates entering articles. In the United States the President of the American Bar Association, writing in the December issue of the Association's Journal, expresses uneasiness at the competing attractions of science as a career in present conditions. The full impact of this, in his opinion, has not yet been felt, but it is evident that it is particularly in the sphere of quality of entrants that anxiety is entertained. The Board of Governors of the Association at the beginning of November authorised the institution of a programme to accelerate the recruitment of law students with emphasis on ability: this largely consists of increasing the number of "prelaw counsellors" in "undergraduate institutions of higher learning." The function of the prelaw counsellors is to give advice to students, if they are interested in or are considering the legal profession as a career, and each will be backed by an outstanding member of the legal profession to assist and collaborate with him in his contacts with members of the student body interested in law as a career. Other activities, including the organisation of "prelaw clubs" and vocational conferences, are contemplated. Are we in England thinking ahead in this way?—S.J.

AUTOMATISM: THE BURDEN OF PROOF

THE possibility of the accused relying on the fact that, at the time of committing the offence, he was in a state of automatism, was examined by the Divisional Court in Hill v. Baxter, [1958] 1 Q.B. 227. One of the points considered by their Lordships was the onus of proof where this defence is raised. Devlin, J., was satisfied that even in cases in which liability depends upon full proof of mens rea it is not open to the defence to rely upon automatism without providing some evidence of it. The accused should adduce evidence which shows that his irrational conduct was due to some cause other than disease of the mind, but where it amounts to insanity in the legal sense his Lordship found that it is well established that the burden of proof would start with and remain throughout upon the defence. This important decision has since been considered by the New Zealand Court of Appeal in R. v. Cottle, [1958] N.Z.L.R. 999. In that case Gresson, P., reviewed all the cases touching upon the defence of automatism and found that Hill v. Baxter, supra, was authority for saying that where "automatism is advanced by an accused as negating intent, or as showing him to have acted without any volition, the onus is no more than to provide some evidence upon which a finding of automatism could be based... Once that is done, there comes into operation the overall onus upon the prosecution... to prove the guilt of the accused..." His Lordship agreed with Devlin, J., that there would be great practical advantage if the burden of proof in cases of automatism was the same as in the case of insanity, although he added the possible qualification that this should only be true when the case of automatism approximates to insanity. In the course of both judgments it was confirmed that as the law now stands insanity is the only matter of defence in which the burden of proof has been held to be completely shifted.—S.J.

UNQUALIFIED MIDWIVES

CHILDREN do not always select the most convenient time or place to be born and it is not uncommon to read of the attendance of an unqualified person upon a woman in childbirth on a train or a bus, or even in an aeroplane. It is unusual, however, to learn of the prosecution of a person without qualifications in this field for helping a woman to deliver her child, yet the Court at Bury St. Edmunds was recently confronted with such a case. A wife decided to dispense with medical attention and to rely on her husband as a midwife. It appears that she adopted this course because the family doctor objected to her husband being present at the birth of her child and there was, therefore, no question of the husband having rendered assistance to his wife in an emergency, although he maintained subsequently that his wife's decision "forced" him to assume responsibility for the delivery. We assume that the prosecution was brought under s. 9 of the Midwives Act, 1951, which provides: "If a person, being either a male person or a woman who is not a certified midwife, attends a woman in childbirth otherwise than under the direction and personal supervision of a duly qualified medical practitioner, that person shall, unless he or she satisfies the Court that the attention was given in a case of sudden or urgent necessity, be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £10." The section stipulates that its provisions are not to apply to persons who, while undergoing training with a view to becoming a duly qualified medical practitioner or certified midwife, attend a woman in childbirth as part of a course of practical instruction in midwifery recognised by the General Medical Council or the Central Midwives Board, and s. 35 safeguards duly qualified medical practitioners. In the case in question the husband pleaded guilty to the offence but was conditionally discharged.—S.J.

NULLITY: APPROBATION

It may be an answer to a suit for nullity of marriage that the marriage has been approbated, with full knowledge of the facts and of the law, by the party seeking relief. As Lord Watson found in G. v. M., (1885) 10 App. Cas. 171, there is a "rule in the law of England that in a suit for nullity of marriage there may be facts and circumstances proved which so plainly imply, on the part of the complaining spouse, a recognition of the existence and validity of the marriage, as to render it most inequitable and contrary to public policy that he or she should be permitted to go on to challenge it with effect." In Copham (otherwise Dobbin) v. Copham, (1959) The Times, January 15, a husband maintained that his wife had approbated the marriage and therefore that she should be denied a decree of nullity on the ground that the marriage had never been consummated. He based this contention on two grounds, firstly, that the wife had taken out a summons under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, after presenting her petition, and secondly, that from 1948 to 1956 she had continued to live with him, to all outward appearances, as a wife. However, Davies, J., could not accept the husband's submissions and held that the wife's action in taking proceedings under s. 17 was not inconsistent with her seeking a decree of nullity. As far as the second argument was concerned, his Lordship found that throughout the eight years the wife had remained in protest against the situation and there was evidence, which the Court accepted, that she had been positively misinformed by a Roman Catholic priest as to the legal remedy available to her.—S.J.

The Three New Taxes. By A. C. SAMPATH IYENGER, B.A., B.L. CALCUTTA: Eastern Law House Private Ltd., 54, Ganesh Chunder Avenue. 1959. Roy. 8vo. Pages LXXVII + 668. Price: Rs. 27.50.

THIS is a commentary on the three new taxation statutes recently enacted, namely, (1) The Wealth-tax Act, (2) The Expenditure-tax Act, and (3) The Gift-tax Act. India is the only country in the world in which the expenditure-tax prevails. Gift-tax exists in a number of countries. In no country in the world all these three taxes are simultaneously operating. The learned author has incorporated in the commentary all relevant case-law upto the end of 1958. He has taken pains to explain some of the abstruse provisions of these Acts in simple language and pointed out the lack of clarity due to infelicitous draftsmanship. Departmental circulars and Administrative Instructions under several sections have been clearly set out. In the Appendices to these Acts, Notifications of Central Revenue Board are embodied. Of all the commentaries published on these three Acts this is the most exhaustive work.

Commentaries on the Evidence Act, 1872. Vol. I. By V. B. RAJU, M.A., I.C.S. LUCKNOW: Eastern Book Company, Lalbagh Road. Second Edition. 1959. Roy. 8vo. Pages viii + 656. Price: Rs. 45 for three Volumes.

WE welcome the second edition of this important work. The rapid sale of the first edition fully justifies the utility and popularity of this work. In the commentary the object of each section has been clearly explained and the annotations are critical, analytical and explanatory. The comments are grouped in a logical order under several headings. The first volume contains commentary on sections 1-78 of the Act. The profession will surely find the volume very useful for purposes of reference.

Fundamental Rights and Constitutional Remedies. By V. G. RAMACHANDRAN, M.A., B.L. LUCKNOW: Eastern Book Company, 34, Lalbagh Road. 1959. Roy. 8vo. Pages XL + 572. Price: Rs. 20.

THE learned author has presented to the reader a detailed and elaborate analysis of Fundamental Rights emerging from the Constitution. Constitutional remedies available to the citizen have been carefully discussed. The work has been divided into two volumes. The first Volume comprises Articles 12 to 19. The second Volume will deal with Articles 20 to 51. Various standard works on Constitutional law and Comparative law in England and America have been freely referred to. The Indian case-law bearing on the subject has been brought up-to-date. The whole topic has been dealt with exhaustively.

Principles of Equity. By G. P. SINGH, B.Sc., LL.M. LUCKNOW: Eastern Book Company, Lalbagh Road. 2nd Edition. 1959. Demi 8vo. Pages xvii + 482. Price: Rs. 8.50.

THE present edition has been completely revised and the case-law has been brought up-to-date. Some of the topics in the first edition have been rewritten and some have been rearranged. Substantial additions have been made which go to clarify the subject. Students who have to study the principles of Equity will find the book serviceable.

Law of Torts. By BALBIR SAHAI SINHA, LL.M. LUCKNOW: Eastern Book Company, Lalbagh Road. 1959. Demi 8vo. Pages 25 + 375. Price: Rs. 7.

THIS book is written primarily for students of law. Leading cases have been discussed in detail and cases which have been prescribed by different Indian Universities for law examinations have been vividly described. The growth and evolution of specific wrongs are fully explained.

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND ROMAN LAW.*

"We cannot possibly overstate the value of Roman Jurisprudence as a key to International Law, and particularly to its most important department. Knowledge of the system and knowledge of the history of the system are equally essential to the comprehension of the Public Law of Nations. It is true that inadequate views of the relation in which Roman law stands to the International scheme are not confined to Englishmen. Many contemporary publicists, writing in languages other than ours, have neglected to place themselves at the point of view from which the originators of Public Law regarded it; and to this omission we must attribute much of the arbitrary assertion and of the fallacious reasoning with which the modern literature of the Law of Nations is unfortunately rife. If International Law be not studied historically—if we fail to comprehend, first, the influence of certain theories of the Roman jurisconsults on the mind of Hugo Grotius, and, next, the influence of the great book of Grotius on International Jurisprudence,—we lose at once all chance of comprehending that body of rules which alone protects the European commonwealth from permanent anarchy, we blind ourselves to the principles by conforming to which it coheres, we can understand neither its strength nor its weakness, nor can we separate these arrangements which can safely be modified from those which cannot be touched without shaking the whole fabric to pieces."

—Sir Henry Maine: Village-Communities in the East and West.

I

THE term 'International Law' was coined by Jeremy Bentham. Till then the term most commonly used for the subject of our discussion was 'the law of nations' with its equivalents in the other European languages. This term is used even to this day as the title to a number of books on the subject. Brierly's book is only one of many examples. The French equivalent 'le droit des gens' has been commonly used throughout Europe for many centuries. Klüber, Laurent and Martens and a host of others have used it for the title to their works. Niemeyer uses the German word "Völkerrecht". The term 'law of nations' and similar other terms have been used on the basis of the popular expression of Roman Law—jus gentium. Attempts were sometimes made by some writers to distinguish the law of nations from the Roman jus gentium. Zouche used the term 'the law among nations'—'jus inter gentes'—as more appropriately conveying the meaning of the subject, for the Roman jus gentium was, strictly speaking, the private law generally of the Empire as contrasted with the 'jus civile', the private law which applied only when both the litigants were Romans and which in the later years of Rome was, as we shall see below, in part absorbed and in part ousted by jus gentium. This term jus gentium further became mixed up, even to the extent of being identified, with the term 'jus naturale', the law of nature, and so jus gentium in its wide sense, both because of its intrinsic merit as comprising the very best of Roman Law and because of such virtual identification with this supposed universal law, became the very foundation of the Law of Nations or, as we now call it, International Law.

The interesting history of the great debt that modern International Law owes to the laws of Rome becomes clearer when the history of Europe and of law connected with these terms is fully understood. We therefore propose here, first, to deal with some of the ways in which jus gentium became identified with jus naturale and ultimately came to be regarded by the time of Gaius^{*} as the law for all Rome and how, further, in mediæval and early modern Europe, this jus naturale or the Law of Nature acquiring for certain interesting reasons even greater strength than before raised the importance of the jus gentium in the eyes of Europe, particularly in countries like Germany where the reception of Roman Law was the greatest, so that not only was Roman Law accepted as a part of municipal or State law in many European countries, but even the principles of the jus gentium in this very wide sense came to be regarded as the best principles to govern the relations between States and therefore the very basis of jus gentium in its widest sense as the law of nations, i.e., what we now call international law.

Secondly, we propose to give a detailed treatment of a number of cases that illustrate the magnitude of this debt of international law to Roman Law.

II

We therefore consider first the development in Roman times of jus gentium (and of necessity the development of jus civile and its partial absorption and partial ouster by jus gentium and also the development of jus naturale and its virtual identification with jus gentium which identification further strengthened the respect for jus gentium).¹ Right from 753 B.C. which is believed to be the year of the foundation of Rome to about the third century before the Christian era, Rome recognised only the law applicable and acceptable to its own nationals—the jus civile, based on the customs and religion of the cives—the Roman citizens or nationals. Early law being the result of custom, the term 'jus civile' generally was at first applied only to these legal customs of the cives and later was extended to include the legislation that began to supplement the customs as the needs of social development increased the ambit of law. To these were added later the edicts of the Praetor as such early legislation also was not sufficient to cover the needs of social development.²

The non-Roman, who came to Rome either to settle there or to trade or to do some other work of his and return to his native land, could not have the benefit of jus civile, for early law in its application was national rather than territorial. Where, however, the Praetor Urbanus (who began his work in 367 B.C.) did try to give the non-Roman the benefit of Roman Law, he found that any attempt to administer justice according to the jus civile which alone was really Roman Law at the time but which was based on the peculiar customs of the Roman nationals would hardly give satisfaction to the non-Roman whom, to make matters worse, the Roman civis looked down upon as hostis, and who in turn disliked the idea of justice according to the law of the cives. These aliens or peregrini, as they came to be called, continued to increase in number with the increase of the wealth and power and commerce of Rome and a sepa-

1. For about four hundred years after the foundation of Rome, she continued to regard herself as a city-state and had, even vis-à-vis her Latin allies, her own rights and responsibilities on much the same lines as the Greek city-states. When her Empire spread, she regarded the states under her domination as provinces and a kind of Inter-Provincial law as distinguished from inter-municipal law evolved. Some writers have compared this organisation with the formation of quasi-federal states like

Canada and India, but the comparison does not hold good as there were many points of distinction between Provincial law and civil law in the Roman Empire, e.g., in the methods of transfer of ownership of land in Rome and of land in the provinces.

2. This produced the 'jus honorarium' or the 'jus praetorium' and in course of time became a skilful combination of this jus civile with the jus gentium which developed later.

rate body of rules slowly evolved out of a desire to do justice among the increasing peregrini. These peregrini, however, came from such a large number of nations, each with its own laws, that the Praetor could only accept those rules which were common to the various nations in their dealings with one another. A separate officer called the Praetor Peregrinus was therefore appointed for the first time (in 242 B.C.) to deal with cases concerning the peregrini and this law which was intended to consist of rules common to various nations and therefore generally acceptable to the peregrini who came from various nations was called the jus gentium—the law of the various gentes or tribes or nations. The Praetor Peregrinus, however great his learning or ability, could not be expected (except perhaps in mere theory) to know all the laws or even the principal laws of all the nations. Starting therefore with the assumption that what would appeal as just and fair to one's sense of what we would now call natural justice would normally be found in the laws of most nations, including, of course, Rome itself, he drew on a supposed Law of Nature or jus naturale for guidance wherever the jus gentium or rather his own knowledge of the laws of other nations failed him. This Law of Nature he sometimes tried to base on the philosophy of the Stoics, with their slightly misunderstood tenet of 'live according to Nature'.

III

The gradual identification of the Roman jus gentium with jus naturale began slowly with the efforts of the Praetor Peregrinus to do justice among people of various nations in ancient Rome and culminated in Gaius. In mediaeval and modern Europe a variety of causes further strengthened this identification. We shall, therefore, examine the history of this identification.

This idea of a Law of Nature was accepted in Rome with considerable enthusiasm by some of the greatest Romans. The enormous respect paid to it even at a fairly early stage in Roman history is reflected in the writings of men like Cicero. In a famous passage in his De Republica, he observes as follows:

"True law is right reason in agreement with Nature; it is of universal application, unchanging and everlasting; it summons to duty by its commands, and averts from wrong-doing by its prohibitions. And it does not lay its commands or prohibitions upon good men in vain, though neither have any effect on the wicked. It is a sin to try to alter this law, nor is it allowable to attempt to repeal any part of it, and it is impossible to abolish it entirely. We cannot be freed from its obligations by Senate or People, and we need not look outside ourselves for an expounder or interpreter of it. And there will not be different laws at Rome and at Athens, or different laws now and in the future, but one eternal and unchangeable law will be valid for all nations and for all times, and there will be one Master and one ruler, that is God, over us all, for He is the author of this law, its promulgator, and its enforcing judge." (De Republica—III, XXII, 33).

Jus gentium therefore drew largely on the jus naturale by reason of such great respect paid to it. Jus gentium even absorbed some of the rules of mercantile custom, particularly as the peregrini had generally settled in Rome for the purposes of commerce.³ To some extent it also seems true that some of these rules of the jus gentium were only adaptations of the rules of the jus civile to suit the situation created by the increasing trade and commerce of the peregrini. There is no doubt, however, that jus gentium gained considerably in strength from its identification or close relationship with the Law of Nature. At last through the great jurists, the jus civile and the jus gentium mingled together into the Roman Law of Gaius and of Justinian—ancient Roman Law as we know it now. The term jus gentium signifying the actual shape the law took and the term jus naturale signifying the ideal towards which the effort was made in order to do justice to men who came from nations with different legal traditions appeared to the Roman so near each other in meaning that he came to regard the two as very much the same if not identical. Gaius in his Institute says,

"The law that natural reason has appointed among all mankind is followed by all peoples alike and is called jus gentium...being the law observed by all mankind" (Gaius Institutes I).

These words mark the culmination of the identification in Gaius, though Justinian is careful enough to point out one matter in which they differed, viz., that slavery which was sanctioned by jus gentium was opposed to jus naturale—the law of nature. (Justinian: Institutes, I). In the Institutes are quoted the following words of Gaius:

"The Roman people apply a law which is partly its own and partly is common to all men."

The very definition of jus gentium given therein and in the Digest provides the explanation of the cosmopolitan character of Roman Law. This claim to universal validity by Justinian for Roman Law constituted for posterity the greatest appeal of Justinian's law-books. The foundation of this universal validity purported to be a rational foundation which could be provided only by an absolute standard of justice. This standard is jus naturale. Its existence is attributed to a will superior to that of any law-giver.

"The laws of nature which are most equally observed by all nations remain always stable and inscrutable, enacted as they are by some kind of divine providence." (Inst. I, ii, II).

The influence of the belief that Roman Law—jus gentium—was the embodiment of natural justice was so great that the Roman system of laws continued for centuries to be regarded as universally valid because of its coincidence with the law of nature. This belief has remained in some measure to this day. Its strength continued to be so great that Leibnitz writing in 1670 to Hobbes said that in attempting to reduce Roman Law to its general elements he found that at least one half of it consisted of "pure natural law."⁴

Whatever the cause of this complete or almost complete identification of jus gentium with jus naturale, what is relevant for our purpose is that this jus gentium, mostly because it was for various reasons over a number of centuries (as seen above) identified with jus naturale came to be regarded as most conducive to the dispensation of justice everywhere, and not only absorbed and fully replaced the jus civile in Rome but was adopted in modern Europe as the basis for modern international law. Whatever criticism Pollock and others may offer of Maine's theories the following sentences of Maine in our opinion hold good to this day:

"Setting aside the Conventional or Treaty Law of Nations it is surprising how large a part of the system of International Law is made up of Roman Law. Wherever there is a doctrine of the jurists affirmed by them to be in harmony with the jus gentium, the Publicists have found a reason for borrowing it, however plainly it may bear the mark of a distinctly Roman origin."⁵

We would here add that even the International law relating to treaties in medieval and modern Europe reminds us somewhat of certain Roman rules concerning contracts (vide infra). It is also of interest to note that the parties to treaties even in this century are referred to as the 'High Contracting Parties'. In fact, the Covenant of the League of Nations begins with this very expression. Even Grotius while he distinguished treaties from contracts subordinated them to a broad concept of contract.

The French version of the term 'le droit des gens' and the word 'gens' in French get identified with the Latin 'gens' and 'gentes'. Even in first naming modern international law 'the law of nations,' the Publicists treated the Roman jus gentium as something so close to if not identical with the Law of Nature (jus naturale) that they considered that the rules of such jus gentium with its foundations in natural law and natural justice were the best rules on which jus gentium in the wide sense of the law of nations could draw especially when the rules of custom either coincided with the rules of jus gentium or supplied no positive help in providing for certain situations for which rules had to be formed.

⁴ A.P.D'Antreves: Natural Law.

Further, this jus naturale became mixed up with Canon Law and thus attracted even greater respect in Europe. The medieval and modern European development of the law of nature gave it further strength.

An interesting development was that in the twelfth century Gratian in the Decretum took the extremely bold step of stating at the very head of the body of Canon Law as we now have it that the law of Nature is

"...nothing else than the golden rule comprised in the law and the Gospel which bids us do as we would be done by."⁶

St. Thomas defined the relation more fully by saying⁷ that they are not substantially different, but that natural law is divine law so far as revealed through the medium of natural reason. This identification was further carried over by the glossators into the teaching of Civil as well as of Canon Law. Azo even went so far as to explain Ulpian's natura by saying in effect that it is God Himself.⁸ The great strength this Law of Nature thus developed and with it the jus gentium by virtue of the above identification requires a fuller treatment than is possible here. One indication of how jus gentium and jus naturale together gained in strength in medieval and early modern Europe is seen in the peculiar fact that though some of the European jurists were aware of the points of distinction they used the verbal ambiguity of such terms to support their drawing on the jus gentium of Rome for the rules of the law of nations (International Law). Further, not only did Gratian, St. Thomas, Azo and others in Europe strengthen this law of nature, but as the Protestant writers did not accept the authority of the Church of the Canon Law and of Aristotle and the Roman disputants of the counter-Reformation were anxious to confute the Protestants on their own ground, the tendency of sixteenth century controversy as well as of Renaissance learning in general was to bring the texts of classical Roman Law into greater prominence. Thus a more definitely secular and legal cast was given to the whole treatment of the Law of Nature and the way was prepared for the great construction of Grotius.⁹

The process that followed has been briefly but effectively described by Maine in the following words:

"Having adopted from the Antonine jurists the position that jus gentium and jus naturae (sic) were identical, Grotius, with his immediate predecessors and his immediate successors, attributed to the Law of Nature an authority which would never perhaps have been claimed for it, if 'Law of Nations' had not in that age been an ambiguous expression."

Pollock is of the opinion that though Grotius did not suppose the modern rules of conduct between sovereign States to be contained in the classical jus gentium, yet as he set out to conciliate princes and their advisers, he did not refuse the help of a verbal ambiguity about the term jus gentium.¹⁰ Whatever the extent to which Grotius relied on Roman Law for the development of the theories of International Law, it is clear that Grotius like Gentilis took jus gentium as the rule of natural reason attested by general agreement. Suarez and Hooker had also used jus gentium in the sense of the law of nations (international law), though Suarez did recognise the two meanings of jus gentium. As throughout Western Europe (except in England), Roman Law was received as a kind of universal law, and as modern international law began to be rapidly developed at about this time, it is obvious that it incorporated some purely Roman legal conceptions. We are not sure that it is truly of as great importance for our purposes to consider here whether "Grotius and his contemporaries misunderstood the classical jus gentium or supposed the modern rules of conduct between sovereign States to be contained in it," as Maine would seem to suggest. Pollock is right in refusing to believe that Grotius could have been ignorant of the exact implication of the Latin expression jus gentium and in suggesting that Grotius took advantage of a verbal ambiguity to advance his own cause, but even Pollock admits that Maine's

"observations as to the application of Roman ideas in the modern law of nations and especially the treatment of every independent State, with regard to its territory as if it were an owner or claimant of ownership under Roman Law and the relatively modern character of purely territorial dominion show the author at his best."

We would therefore consider now some of the instances that show the indebtedness of International Law to Roman Law either direct as in Germany and other countries or by what Maine calls 'an irregular filiation' (when referring to the misconception of the term jus gentium).

IV

Before considering the broad principles of Roman Law (jus gentium and jus naturale) that underlie the foundations of International Law we think it necessary to consider briefly some interesting developments.

(A) A factor which increased the strength of this basis of modern international law is that in England many of the questions of International Law often arise in the Admiralty Jurisdiction and, as can be seen from the classical judgments of the great Lord Stowell, some of the most important questions arose from the exercise of belligerent rights at sea in the war against the French Republic and Empire. Lord Stowell in his judgments administered what was really jus gentium in the fullest sense. He regarded the Court of Admiralty as a Court of the law of nations. As he observed in his judgment in *The Maria*¹¹

"...the seat of judicial authority is locally here, in the belligerent country, according to the known law and practice of nations but the law itself has no locality."¹²

Lord Stowell seems to have treated with something like contempt the suggestion that nations are bound by the law of treaty only and that there is no other law of nations than that which is derived from positive compact and convention.¹³ He thus foreshadowed the increasing strength of the general principles of jus gentium in the broad sense of the law of nations.

(B) En passant, we may note another indication of the strength of this basis in the fact that the authority of Private International Law (though, contrary to what laymen believe, it is not really a part of International Law as generally understood among lawyers) was originally founded on considerations of natural justice. Though it is not jus inter gentes yet it has been sometimes regarded as a part of jus gentium.

(C) Yet another interesting development to note is that of the law merchant, which claimed authority independent of any particular State as being founded on general reason and on usage which had been approved as reasonable. This law merchant was adopted in England in the time of Lord Mansfield as part of the Common Law of England, and is itself a branch of the Law of Nature. It was accepted into the jus gentium as a part of jus naturale. Through the revival of the study in Europe as well as through the reception of Roman Law into Germany and other places in Europe, this law merchant influenced profoundly the Publicists and their writings on International Law. What is not often recognised, however, is the fact that while Roman Law served as a common standard for land commerce, the law for sea commerce had its birth in the code of the Phœnicians especially of the State of Rhodes—The Lex Rhodia.¹⁴ Rome, however, by widening constantly the scope of her jus gentium and often identifying it with jus naturale seems to us to have absorbed a few of these rules which ultimately found their way into modern International Law.

Having thus traced the history of the great hold the Roman jus gentium acquired through the centuries over Europe and its laws particularly the law of nations for which jus gentium was sometimes claimed as an equivalent, we consider the broad principles of jus gentium and jus naturale that formed the basis of our law of nations or international law.

The process referred to above and summarized by Maine as resulting from the Antonine position that jus gentium and jus naturale were identical culminated in the hands of Grotius and his immediate predecessors and successors into a doctrine of the Law of Nature being accepted as a fundamental doctrine of the Law of Nations, viz., that just as all men according to the Law of Nature are equal so all independent communities or States, however great or small in size or power, have full and equal rights in the absence of any definite reason for inequality. It is true that even in modern international law superior force furnishes cynical reasons for such inequality as in the case of the veto in the UN (Security Council) and the permanent membership granted to the powerful nations.¹⁵ Nevertheless, this principle of the equality of nations as a principle cannot now be openly criticized by any nation.

The concept of 'tribal sovereignty' of the Middle Ages as exemplified in early titles like King of the Franks (instead of King of France) owes to a great extent its slow disappearance to feudalism which linked personal duties and therefore personal rights to ownership of land. Feudalism, however, fell into disrepute; but when before a Europe reeling under the horrors of the Thirty Years War Grotius's "De Jure Belli ac Pacis" came out, the views of a State system to which the Roman juriseconsults with their foundations in jus gentium and jus naturale were believed to have given their blessings and which was based on the analogy of the Roman law of property (title to a part of the surface of the earth) were readily accepted and State Sovereignty replaced tribal sovereignty and after the Treaty of Westphalia (the first piece of what may now be called "international legislation") the State System of Europe emerged in its full strength.¹⁶ An essential part of the State System is the above concept of the equality of States and these concepts of equality and of territorial sovereignty have in this manner been therefore based on the jus naturale with which the jus gentium of the Romans had become identified. These doctrines constitute two of the very foundations of modern international law.

VI

Having dealt with the evolution of territorial sovereignty from the doctrines of jus gentium, we consider the principles governing the acquisition of territory which International Law has derived from jus gentium. As Maine puts it:

"The rules which govern this acquisition together with the rules which moderate the wars in which it too frequently results are merely transcribed from the part of the Roman Law which treats of the modes of acquiring property jure gentium."

The methods of acquiring property which was res singulae as distinguished from acquiring property by universal succession were (a) civiles modi, the methods peculiar to Rome and to its jus civile, and (b) naturales modi, the methods common to all nations under the jus gentium. These latter got so mixed or identified with the jus naturale that Justinian himself was misled

15 Oppenheim I §168c.

16 Pollock is somewhat critical of some parts of this theory of Maine.

(Institutes ii I ii) into calling them by far the oldest. The very expression naturales modi is tell-tale. These methods we consider below:

(i) Occupatio i.e. taking effective possession with intent to become owner and exclude every one else from the enjoyment of a res that belongs at the moment to nobody, e.g., res nullius or, if the res has been abandoned, res derelicta. A relevant case is that of insula nata, an island formed in the sea (J. ii I 22). In International Law occupatio takes the form of establishing sovereignty over territory over which no other State has exercised authority or which has been abandoned by the State formerly in occupation. As in jus gentium so too in International Law, the test is effectiveness of exclusion of others from control, i.e., the occupation should not be fictitious but real and should therefore be backed up by possession and administration. In the Eastern Greenland Case between Norway and Denmark¹⁷, the Permanent Court of International Justice held that occupation was effective if the claimant State displayed the will to exclude others and the intention to exercise sovereignty. What weighed with the Court was the fact that upto 1931 no State except Denmark had laid any claim to the territory. Similarly, in the recent *Minguiers and Ecrehos Case*¹⁸ where Britain and France both claimed certain islets in the Channel, the Court held in favour of Britain who proved the actual exercise by her of "State functions", i.e., acts of administration, sovereignty and exercise of jurisdiction.¹⁹

A further extension of this Roman doctrine of occupatio is seen in the decision of M. Huber as Arbitrator in the *Island of Palmas Arbitration*²⁰ where it was held that a mere act of discovery by a State is not enough to confer sovereignty, but that such inchoate title must within a reasonable time be completed by effective occupatio. The island was, therefore, adjudged to the Netherlands with their long continuous exercise of effective authority though the United States claimed the island as successor to Spain, the original discoverer.

(ii) The Roman method of accessio as a means of acquisition of territory both in our private law (vide the extended case of accession in our Transfer of Property Act, s. 63) and in International Law either of a res nullius, as in alluvion, or of a res aliena has received almost universal recognition. Lord Stowell's judgment in *The Anna*²¹ is in this respect remarkable. In 1805, during the war between Great Britain and Spain, the British ship Minerva captured the Spanish ship Anna near the mouth of the Mississippi. The United States claimed the Anna saying she was captured within the American three-mile limit. The claim was allowed on the ground that though the place of capture was more than three miles from the United States coast yet it was within three miles of some small mud islands composed of earth and trees which had drifted into the sea.

It is clear that the rules of Roman Law regarding the division of ownership over alluvial deposits in streams or rivers between the riparian owners are by analogy also applied in International Law. Any large international river, e.g., the Danube, would supply us with illustrations subject, of course, to special rules like those of the Danube Commission.

(iii) Though Grotius rejected for the purposes of International Law the Roman civil method of usucapio which applied to land in Rome, yet he accepted immemorial prescription. River and G. F. Martens have rejected this. Vattel, Wheaton, Hall and others, however, take the opposite view and do not even insist on prescription being immemorial. This seems to be an approximation not towards the jus civile method of usucapio but towards its jus gentium analogue of praescriptio longi temporis originally framed for land in the provinces and later after the abolition by Justinian of usucapio (in the case of land) enacted for all land whether a fundus italicus or a fundus provincialis.

In International Law, however, no definite period of time even as in præscriptio longi temporis can be laid down. Further, bona fides which, except to some extent in the three cases mentioned by Gaius of usucapio lucrativa, was regarded as essential in Roman law was not regarded as essential in International Law. This is perhaps in the very nature of things, for the result of superior force especially if acquiesced in by the other State over a long period of time is sometimes accepted in International Law as being in conformity with international order. The decision in The Island of Palmas case is, however, quoted as a precedent for the acceptance of præscriptio in International Law. The award itself is not based on præscriptio but Johnson in his 'Acquisitive prescription in International Law'²² does make out a case for title by prescription in International Law where possession is under a claim of sovereignty for a considerable length of time, publicly, peacefully and without interruption. He even extends this doctrine to what he calls consolidation—acquiring title by repeated acts of authority over a long period even over res nullius.²³

(iv) The concept of territorial sovereignty in international law and its relation to absolute title to property in Roman Law has already been referred to above.

(v) In one respect, however, viz., the acquisition of jura in re aliena, the influence of Roman Law has been regarded as tending to 'confusion' in International Law, viz., the doctrine of international servitudes. The attempt to rely on this doctrine in *The Wimbledon*²⁴ and in The North Atlantic Coast Fisheries Arbitration (1910)²⁵ did not succeed. The doctrine, however, of 'acquired rights' of non-coastal States, e.g., long established practices of fishing in the areas over which new sovereign rights are now claimed was expressly recognized by the International Law Commission in its final Draft of 1956.

Having dealt with the acquisition of res singulae in Rome and the way the principles have been almost bodily taken up in international law, we deal with the acquisition not of one res but of an aggregate of rights, i.e., juris universitas, viz., what in Roman Law is called Universal Succession. The idea of State succession is built up by Grotius into International Law in his De Jure Belli ac Pacis, II, XIV, 1, by analogy from this Roman Law of universal succession, viz., the substitution of the heir for a deceased person and the clothing of that heir with the rights and obligations of the deceased. This analogy holds good generally in the Law of State Succession.²⁶ As a result of the peculiar circumstances arising from the corporate personality of the State, however, the rules framed by Grotius cannot all be applied strictly.²⁷ For instance, after the Third Partition of Poland in 1795, the rights and duties to which Austria, Prussia and Russia succeeded varied with the different persons to or by whom they were owed before the partition. The matter is generally therefore determined by treaties. Oppenheim²⁸ does not accept fully the doctrine of general succession but accepts the operation of the doctrine of succession in specific cases. Brierly²⁹ seems to think that the theory does not give much help. It seems to us, however, that the rules based by Grotius on the Roman doctrine are of help at least in cases of universal succession.

VII

We may now refer briefly to treaties and the Roman Law of Contracts. To some extent the way in which the law relating to treaties was developed reminds us of the Roman Law of Contracts.³⁰

(i) As observed above, though Grotius distinguished treaties from contracts, yet he did subordinate his theory of treaties to a broad concept of contract.

Except for allowing resort in some cases to the doctrine of rebus sic stantibus, he emphasized the importance of keeping faith and of respecting treaties. This would appear to be based on the conception of pacta sunt servanda.

(ii) Dolus (fraud), (iii) metus (threat of harm or coercion) and (iv) fundamental mistake were cases where the Roman Praetor granted relief from the performance of contracts. Fraud, error and duress have generally been recognized in international law as grounds for avoiding treaties.

Though no clear case of fraud has been reported, yet something like it was alleged in the case of the settlement of the status of Batum at the Congress of Berlin when it was suggested that Prince Gortchakoff employed a map with a boundary altered and different from that earlier agreed to between him and Beaconsfield (Cecil's Life of Lord Salisbury). The matter was ultimately compromised.

A case of duress has been clearly made out in the forced establishment of the German protectorate over Bohemia by the German-Czech Treaty of March, 1939. There a distinction is sought to be made between duress against the negotiators on behalf of a State and duress against the State itself.³¹ We are of the opinion that while such a distinction might be sound in law, it would not secure international justice.

VIII

It will have been noticed above that Maine regards international law as being as much based on the Roman rules which moderate the wars as on the rules which govern the acquisition of property. We turn, therefore, to another foundation of International Law in the law of ancient Rome—the Law of War. The Romans gave to modern Europe the example of a State with legal rules for its foreign relations. The modern doctrine of justum bellum may be compared to the jus fetiale doctrine of conducting wars in a just cause. The concept of a just war as developed by Roman Publicists sought to distinguish lawful wars by their causes.³² Roman Law recognized four different just reasons for war.³³ These have all passed into modern International Law: violation of Roman territory, violation of the protection Rome insisted on her ambassadors being given (see the modern doctrine of immunity of envoys); violation of treaties; help given to a country at war with Rome (see the modern doctrine of an unneutral act.)

This concept of a just war was later developed by Western theologians.³⁴ These revived the bellum justum theory. The legal obligation to negotiate before using force was recognised by Roman Law. The College of Fetiales of Rome (a special group of twenty priests) presented Roman demands through ambassadors or heralds and asked for redress before Rome resorted to force. The prior demand for reparation, rerum repetitio, was necessary. If redress was in spite of such prior demand not forthcoming and if the fetiales gave a verdict that the foreign nation had violated its duties, war could be declared and it could in law be a just war. The prosperity and increasing power of Rome stunted, however, the further growth of the law of war. The growth of such an international law of war to regulate relations with peoples already brought under her sway became feeble, as Rome with her increasing might also began to regard those outside her vast empire as nations either to be conquered or to be held at bay (though even in this latter objective she sometimes did not succeed as in the case of the defeat and capture of the Emperor Valerian by the Iranian Emperor Shahpur or Sapor). Grotius basing his enunciations on Roman Law was emphatically of the opinion that a declaration of war was necessary, though some wars in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries began without a formal declaration. The necessity of an ultimatum, however, was recognized by the nineteenth century. It speaks ill of our twentieth century civilization, however, that an international rule, recognized by a chivalrous power like Ancient Iran and by the laws of Rome (till the latter becoming too powerful looked down upon the rest of the nations) and recognized in the time of Grotius even in spite of the barbarities that otherwise marked the wars of those ages, should have been so cynically violated in this century on several occasions, e.g., Pearl Harbour.

IX

The Roman *doctrine of postliminium*³⁵ which applied both in private law and in public law has been adopted in various forms by modern law notably in the rule of modern International Law under which acts which the invader was not competent to perform under international law are rendered invalid. For instance, public or private property illegitimately appropriated and sold may afterwards be claimed from a purchaser without payment of compensation.³⁶

We now deal with the influence of Roman Law on other parts of International Law governing the foreign relations of States:

(i) Grotius, who made the first effective plea for a larger freedom of the seas than certain naval powers were willing to concede, based his argument on principles derived from Roman Law, viz., that the Roman principle of occupatio governing ownership of land be applied by analogy to the open sea which just could not be occupied like land and therefore must have been intended by nature to be free to all. He further argued in his Mare Liberum, when defending the right of the Dutch to navigate the Indian Ocean to which Portugal laid exclusive claim, that the sea being inexhaustible in use was not susceptible of occupatio which was necessary in the case of things the utility of which could only be conserved for a particular State or person if they became its or his private property. It is to the credit both of Grotius and of Roman Law on which he drew so largely for his arguments that his view has succeeded while international law has not accepted the opposing views expressed in famous works like the posthumously published Notes of Gentilis in defence of Spanish claims or the work of Paolo Sarpi in defence of the claims of Venice in 1676 or the pleas in defence of English claims by John Selden in his Mare Clausum in 1618 or by Sir John Burroughs in his 'Sovereignty of the British Seas' in 1653. Till Bynkershoek published his De dominio maris in 1702 (when conceding effective occupation within the three-mile cannon-shot limit from the shore) and Vattel supported Grotius repeating his very arguments more than a century later in Droit des Gens (1758), Grotius was almost unsupported, but his effective use of the arguments based mainly on the Roman occupatio coupled with the force of events in later history, when the necessity of vast facilities for quick navigation and increasing commerce made itself felt, enabled his view to prevail in the end.³⁷

(ii) Legation as an institution for communication and negotiation with foreign Governments is traceable to (among other nations) Rome.³⁸ The protection and privileges afforded to legations rested, however, more on religion than on civil law. (Some fine examples of the influence of religion are seen in the Shahnameh, a subject which may be treated elsewhere.)

XI

The influence of Roman Law on the way in which matters of international law and relations are dealt with is greatest in the case of countries where the reception of Roman Law has been complete or almost complete.³⁹ The example of extradition matters is very much in point. Extradition is based on treaties, not on custom. A number of Roman Law countries such as France and Germany refuse extradition of their own citizens and prefer that they be tried by their own Courts for grave crimes committed abroad. The Constitution of Yugoslavia of September 1931 contains an express provision forbidding the extradition of nationals. Article 112 of the Weimar Constitution also prevented such extradition. Great Britain does not accept this view. (See the case of Tourville). A consideration of the cases like extradition and State succession makes us, however, realize that international law is always in danger of being moulded by powerful nations to a shape that merely satisfies their self-interests rather than justice alone.

This is sometimes seen in a conflict between Roman Law and Common Law which extends sometimes to the field of International Law. Two examples will suffice. In Hooper v. United States,⁴⁰ the Court of Claims employing a Common Law doctrine stated that a treaty might become invalid for want of consideration, despite the fact that international law is acknowledged to be generally based on Roman Law which requires no consideration for contracts.

In the case of retaliation in the form of unrestricted submarine warfare by Germany, the United States opposed it on the Common Law reasoning by which the United States sought to extend to submarines the prohibition applicable to surface vessels. The German view was that International Law not being based on Anglo-Saxon Common Law but on modern Roman Law the maxim "what is not prohibited is permitted" applied in view of the invalidity of the Declaration of London as a result of Britain's failure to ratify it.

Another instance of the divergence of outlook is seen in the Common Law attitude of Lord Sumner in The Kron Prinsessin Margareta.⁴¹

"Valuable as the opinions of learned and distinguished writers must always be as aids to a full and exact comprehension of a systematic law of nations, Prize Courts must always attach chief importance to the current of decisions and the more the field is covered by decided cases the less becomes the authority of commentators and jurists."

To these words which embody even in such matters the Common Law attitude of the rule of stare decisis stand in some contrast two of the articles of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, the Court that deals with International Law, showing how International Law is based on Roman Law: Article 38:

The Court, whose function is to decide in accordance with international law such disputes as are submitted to it, shall apply:

- (a) International conventions...
- (b) International custom...
- (c) the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations,
- (d) subject to the provisions of Article 59, judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law.

Article 59 says tersely:

"The decision of the Court has no binding force except between the parties and in respect of that particular case."

XII

Rome conquered many lands and nations with the power of her arms, but the Roman Empire could not last for ever. What the power of her arms failed to achieve, however, her laws have more than achieved. She has conquered a greater part of the world by her laws than by her arms and for a much longer duration of time. The influence of her laws on International Law will be permanently felt.

GLEANINGS.

WINTLE v. NYE

IF regard is had to Lord Justice MacKinnon's warning to law reporters, which we quoted in "Judgments as Literature" last week, CIX L.J. 7, it seems probable that the case of Wintle v. Nye will not be reported. It established no new principle of law, nor modified nor negated any existing principle. Yet when a layman, having conducted his own case throughout the Courts, succeeds in the House of Lords after he has failed in both the High Court and the Court of Appeal, and succeeds on what was a question of fact, the case is sufficiently remarkable to repay examination. Colonel Wintle claimed as assignee of one of the next of kin of a Miss Wintle, who was born in 1871, made her will in 1937, made a codicil to it in 1939, and died in December, 1947. He maintained that when she executed her will and the codicil she did not know and approve their contents. There was no question of her testamentary capacity, but the issue was whether she understood what gifts she was making. In March, 1948, probate of the will and codicil was granted to the respondent, her solicitor and executor. In the action Colonel Wintle claimed that the Court should revoke the probate and should grant letters of administration to him and his co-plaintiff. The respondent counterclaimed for probate in solemn form. Thus the burden of proving that the testatrix understood and approved the will and codicil was on the respondent, Mr. Nye.

The burden of proof that the testatrix knew and approved the contents of her will and codicil was, we repeat, on Mr. Nye. He was admitted as solicitor in 1906 and he, and his father before him, had been solicitors to the testatrix and to her father and mother. In 1936, on the death of the testatrix' brother, Mr. Nye had been given a power of attorney over her affairs and managed her property for her. In 1937 the testatrix was considering making her will, which Mr. Nye, as her solicitor, would prepare. The net value of her estate was estimated at this time at £38,000. Her solicitor and a bank were to be executors and the residue was, according to a first draft, to go to eight hospitals. Various changes were made over quite a long period and in the result the bank was not appointed executor, her solicitor was sole executor, and the residue was left to him. The testatrix did not have separate advice, but her solicitor deposed that he had told her that she should consult another solicitor and that she had said that she did not wish to do so. Subsequently, in the early days of the war, a codicil was executed which cut out three reversionary legacies to charity which were contained in the will; this alteration was made allegedly, it appeared, for the benefit of the annuitant on whose death the legacies would be payable, but the result in fact would be that the residuary legatee would benefit.

The testatrix, we repeat, did not have independent advice and the burden of establishing her knowledge and approval of the will and codicil lay on the respondent, her solicitor and residuary legatee. In the House of Lords Viscounts Simonds said that the law was not in doubt and had been stated correctly by the Judge at first instance. The fact that a solicitor or other person who has prepared a will for a testatrix took a benefit under it created a suspicion that the person propounding the will had to remove. It might be a suspicion that was easily dispelled or it might be so grave that it could hardly be removed. In the present case the circumstances had been such as to impose on the respondent, who was seeking to propound the will, as heavy a burden as could well be imagined. In the summing-up in the Court of first instance the law had been correctly stated, but the Court had not been vigilant in scrutinising the evidence before the jury. The jury had had a general direction to regard with suspicion evidence given by the author of the will, but the Judge had neglected his own advice and had turned an indulgent eye on the facts proved in evidence; he had not examined them with the vigilant scrutiny that the law required. So the appeal was allowed and the will and codicil were declared invalid in respect of the beneficial gifts to the respondent. The respondent was allowed his costs in the High Court out of the estate but bore his own costs in the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords. Much has appeared in the public press on the success of the appellant before the House of Lords, and, indeed, he deserves congratulation and the reward of his tenacity. The essential facts seem, however, to point fairly clearly towards the ultimate conclusion; and perhaps the true moral to be drawn from the course of the proceedings is that much depends on the way in which matters are presented before a jury of laymen.—L.J.

NO DAMAGES FOR PERJURY

IN giving judgment for the defendant on a preliminary point of law, that an action for damages will not lie at the suit of a person alleged to have been damaged by false evidence given against him, the Lord Chief Justice to a large extent relied on Watson v. M'Ewan [1905] A.C. 480, where (at p. 486) Lord Halsbury said: "It is settled law and cannot be doubted that the remedy against a witness who has given evidence which is false and injurious to another is to indict him for perjury; but for very obvious reasons the conduct of legal procedure by Courts of Justice, with the necessity of compelling witnesses to attend, involves as one of the necessities of the administration of justice the immunity of witnesses from actions being brought against them in respect of the evidence they have given. So far, the matter, I think, is too plain for argument" (The Times, July 24, 1958).

Is it then the position that the law bargains with the compulsive witness and says in effect: we compel you to come but because you come against your will no one can make a claim against you in respect of the evidence? If so, it is not a bargain to be proud of notwithstanding that there is a proviso to the effect that he may be indicted for perjury. It seems odd that a man can be made liable civilly for negligence and criminally, too, if the negligence is gross, yet for a deliberate act of falsehood in a Court of law he is relieved of civil liability as the price of getting his false and misleading statements on oath.

In practice indictments for perjury are rare mainly because of the difficulty of proving that a particular statement made by a witness was to his knowledge false. From this it is reasonable to assume that if perjury were civilly actionable it would not cause an appreciable lengthening of the civil cause list.

Apart from the quoted authority, arguments based on the fact that this type of action had been tried out centuries ago unsuccessfully, and that since then no action had been allowed, were advanced. A case of Dampart v. Sympson (1596), Cro. Eliz. 520, records that the Court refused an action for want of a precedent. The Lord Chief Justice interposed at the citation of this case (as reported) pointing out that prior to that time perjury had not been an offence: that it was the Star Chamber that took it upon itself to punish perjury—one of the few good things that it did.

For the plaintiff it was pointed out that in Coke's Institutes, Pt. III, c. 74, it was stated that a civil action could have been brought in the Star Chamber for damages; other authorities were quoted including Skelhorn v. Harrison (1597), Cro. Eliz. 714, which was an action on the case relating to bailors. At the mention of these bailors the Lord Chief Justice quoted from the "Pickwick Papers" referring to the incidents when Mr. Pickwick was arrested on a warrant after losing the action brought against him by Mrs. Bardell. He chose to go to the Fleet Prison after his attorney had described the attractions of the various prisons from which he might make his selection and after further arranging the proper timing so that a habeas corpus could be applied for when there was a Judge in chambers; and after Mr. Pickwick had arranged to have a chop before leaving.

There is a description of his arrival at Serjeant's Inn when he sees what turn out to be two "men of straw" (as the Lord Chief Justice describes them, though Dickens does not mention this description nor that they usually had straws in their mouths). One of them followed Pickwick and in due course Perker, his attorney, explains that the man was "a bail".

"Yes, my dear sir, half a dozen of 'em here. Bail you to any amount, and only charge half a crown. Curious trade, isn't it?" said Perker, regaling himself with a pinch of snuff.

• 'What! Am I to understand that these men earn a livelihood by waiting about here to perjure themselves before the judges of the land at the rate of half-a-crown a crime?' exclaimed Mr. Pickwick, quite aghast at the disclosure.

'Why, I don't exactly know about the perjury, my dear sir,' replied the little gentleman. 'Harsh word, my dear sir, very harsh word indeed. It's a legal fiction, my dear sir, nothing more.' Saying which, the attorney shrugged his shoulders, smiled, took a second pinch of snuff, and led the way into the office of the judge's clerk."

Harsh word indeed, and yet no civil action by way of remedy in cases which are in no sense concerned with legal fictions!

Novelty is not normally a defence and it would be wrong to say that there were no grounds of justice as a basis for the action. Lord Halsbury's remarks quoted above if closely examined will be seen to be in somewhat loose language; the "immunity of witnesses from actions being brought against them in respect of the evidence they have given" could well apply on the basis that the evidence must have been believed by the witness to be the truth and an exception could well be carved out for perjurers. But the defence was not purely based on novelty: it was based on the proposition that this type of action had been tried out before (albeit so long ago as not to be necessarily a guide to modern thought on the problem) and those old actions had failed.

And so it is that one of the very foundations of the judicial and other processes—the oath, a vital matter in Anglo-Saxon procedure; an essential everyday authentication of declarations, affidavits and the like—may be broken without incurring any civil liability. Is the law not sometimes tied too close to history?—S.J.

GREEN FOR DANGER!

IN a recent case in the Queen's Bench Division, McNair J. expressed the view that it was regrettable if it was thought today that a driver crossing traffic lights at green was entitled to proceed "without taking any heed at all" of the possibility that other drivers might be breaking the law by crossing other lights at the same road junction while they were at red. It would seem, therefore, that his Lordship has cast at least a shadow of doubt over the decision of the Court of Appeal in Joseph Eva, Ltd. v. Reeves [1938] 2 K.B. 393, which has been recognised as authority for saying that a driver of a motor vehicle who enters a cross-road when the lights are in his favour is not under any obligation to assume that the driver of another vehicle may enter the cross-roads against the lights. It is true that a reasonable man must not expect that others will always observe due care in their conduct and, as Lord du Parcq found in Grant v. Sun Shipping Co., Ltd. [1948] A.C. 549, "a prudent man will guard against the possible negligence of others, when experience shows such negligence to be common," but in Joseph Eva, Ltd. v. Reeves, supra, their Lordships went no further than to allow that a person who notices a vehicle on a crossing in disobedience to a red light is bound to take "all reasonably possible steps to avoid coming into collision with it" (per Sir Wilfrid Greene, M.R.). The Court of Appeal could not accept that the driver of a motor car properly on a crossing is obliged to assume that another vehicle might have started to cross in disobedience to a red light. We would not have thought that it was sufficiently "common" for motorists to ignore traffic lights to require a prudent man to guard against such a possibility.—S.J.

REVIEWS.

Criminal Trial. By Y. H. RAO, Advocate. AGRA: Wadhwa & Co., 45 Civil Lines. 1959. Roy. 8vo. Pages xxvii + 356. Price: Rs. 18.

THIS is the last volume in the scheme of the Criminal Law Series of six monographs relating to evidence in criminal cases. The learned author has been moved to publish this volume owing to the fundamental differences between the duties and powers of the criminal and civil Courts, between the rights and duties of Public Prosecutors and private counsel, between the degrees of proof necessary in criminal and civil cases, between the respective burdens of proof to be discharged by the parties in both proceedings, and between the lines of approach to and the standards of appreciation of the different kinds of evidence generally obtainable in the two classes of cases. The element of surprise is an inherent feature of a criminal trial. In a sessions trial in spite of the notice of prior committal proceedings, there is hardly breathing time to meet this disturbing element of surprise. This volume is specially designed to meet various forms of such surprise. The recent amendments to the procedural law have wholly changed the complexion of some of the fundamental features of a criminal trial. The learned author has clearly explained the changes thus made.

The Central Sales Tax Act, 1956. By K. V. TAMHANE, B.A., F.C.A. BOMBAY: Current Book House. 1959. Crown 8vo. Pages viii + 282. Price: Rs. 8.50.

THE Central Sales Tax Act came into force from July 1, 1957. It consists of only sixteen sections but they are somewhat of a complicated character. This Act is already amended by Act 16 of 1957, Act 5 of 1958, and Act 31 of 1958. The amendments made by Act 31 of 1958 have completely changed the nature of the incidence and overhauled the scheme of the Central Sales Tax levy. In this book the learned author has fully explained every section of the Act, and has quoted extensively from the decisions bearing on the Act. The sections are explained in a simple and clear language, so that the business community may fully understand the provisions and find the book useful.

The Cattle Trespass Act, 1871. By Y. H. RAO, Advocate. AGRA: Wadhwa and Company, 45 Civil Lines. 1958. Roy. 8vo. Pages viii + 80. Price: Rs. 5.

THE Cattle Trespass Act is a minor enactment of the Central Legislature. Offences under the Act rarely come up before Courts. Certain obscure provisions in the Act has been clearly explained, and a critical survey of cases bearing on the Act has been given. The commentary has been arranged under proper headings, and references to decided cases have been fully set out. Those who have to refer to this Act will find this book useful.

The Central Sales Tax Act, 1956. By R. V. PATEL, B.COM., LL.B., BOMBAY: N. M. Tripathi Private Ltd., Princess Street. 1959. Demi 8vo. Pages 165. Price: Rs. 5.

THIS book can be usefully read with the earlier book of the learned author entitled The Central Sales Tax Act, 1956. Full text of the Act, as amended up-to-date, has been given. Each of the amended section is carefully commented on. Important circular letters issued by the Collector of Sales Tax, Bombay State Notifications of the Central Government, rules published by the Union Government, and the Rules of the State of Bombay are incorporated. As an up-to-date book of reference on a complicated piece of legislation its utility cannot be gainsaid.

NULLITY OF MARRIAGE AND ADVERSE POSSESSION BY A FEMALE*

DURING the past year two decisions on Hindu law were given which are bound to have repercussions throughout India. Since there are few topics on the personal law of the Hindus which are not of wide importance, affecting the happiness of many thousands of families, the above claim for the two cases referred to in this article will at first sight appear somewhat vapid. The reader may judge for himself, from his knowledge of local usage and from the relative frequency of disputes affecting the matters in question, whether or not they are of such importance as to warrant close attention from the Bar in every State, and perhaps from the Legislature. Both cases appear to be sound on principle, so far as they go, and, with respect, disclose on the faces of the reports as recently published no patent grounds for doubting their having been correctly decided on their respective facts: but there is a great deal to be said about each of them. The first, *Bimla Bai v. Shankarlal*¹, will have a special interest for Bombay readers who recollect the cause celebre, A. v. B.,² decided to very general satisfaction (but for a small slip of the pen)³ by the late Mr. Justice Tendolkar. It deals with the vexed subject of nullity of marriage, and is the judgment of a single Judge of the High Court of Madhya Pradesh, Mr. Justice T. P. Naik, whose treatment of the case cannot but be admired in view of the total lack of authority and pitiful want of principle in the books upon which he was forced to rely. It is not a less outstanding judgment for its emanating from a single Judge, for in the opinion of many much respected Judges the judgment even of a single Judge should be followed in all coordinate jurisdictions, unless it is overruled, disapproved, or shown to be unsound. For the present Bimla Bai's case stands alone and is authoritative. The second case, opposite in several respects to the first, is a decision based upon the answer of a Full Bench. In *M. Saiyanarayana v. J. Veerajulu*⁴ the Andhra High Court overruled a celebrated Full Bench decision of the former Hyderabad High Court,⁵ on a subject which arises so constantly that the bulk of judicial authority already accumulated is crushing. There is much in this answer of the Full Bench which is most satisfactory: it disposes, once for all, of an anomalous and embarrassing decision of the Privy Council which had bedevilled Hindu law for nearly thirty-five years, and it brings the law into accord with logic. Our rejoicings at this admirable development are the greater for the fact that now in all States, particularly in Northern India and in Bombay, the unsatisfactory decisions which emerged in obedience to *Lajwanti v. Safa Chand*⁶, despite repeated efforts on the part of the Bar, are bound to terminate. The development in Andhra is certain to recommend itself throughout India.

render the marriage void whereas it was only voidable. See 54 Bom. L.R., J. 115f., also Malla Reddy v. Subbanna [1958] A.I.R. Andhra 237, s.c. [1958] Andhra W.R. 590.

Yet it requires explanation. The rule laid down there cannot stand unqualified for there is a most important and very common class of cases in which it can be misleading; indeed, if it were to be applied to that class as well as to another class, to which it may safely be applied, we should at once be in conflict with an established line of authorities laid down in the Supreme Court. This article is intended, therefore, to investigate two prima facie welcome decisions.

1. NULLITY OF MARRIAGE FOR FRAUD.

Every textbook on Hindu law tells us,^{6a} in words that vary slightly, no doubt, but without substantial variation of meaning, that a marriage at Hindu law is voidable for force or fraud, whether the force be applied to the minds or persons of the spouses themselves, or either of them, or the fraud be used to deceive the spouses, or either of them, or their respective guardians, so that the latter enter into the marriage or betrothal arrangements and/or celebrate the marriage substantially by reason of the false impressions created by the deceit, and as a result of the inducement so created. But there is not a single authority in our books which directly supports the assertion. On the contrary all our authorities, from *Aunjona Dasi v. Prahlad Chandra Ghose*⁷ onwards, actually tend to establish in what circumstances a marriage brought about by deception, or accompanied by deception, may nevertheless be perfectly good in law, whether under the rule of *Factum Valet*⁸ or otherwise. Dicta, no doubt, abound, and the point seems to have been taken very much for granted. Norman J. in the case cited above says:⁹

"I think that the Court must have jurisdiction in such suit to declare the marriage void if procured by fraud or force, and celebrated without the consent of the necessary parties, or without the formalities necessary to render it a binding marriage according to Hindu law."

Once the problem of jurisdiction was solved in that early case no one has doubted but that fraud may, in some circumstances, avoid the marriage; but not a single instance has come to light (so far as the present writer knows) to guide us in respect of the most important question, what sort of fraud or misrepresentation will suffice to entitle the deceived spouse to petition for a decree of nullity, and in what circumstances he or she may lose the right to present the petition. The dharmashastra leaves us with the impression that once the marriage has been solemnized duly, it cannot be set aside for force or fraud. MM. Dr. P. V. Kane puts the matter succinctly¹⁰:

"...From this it appears that if the marriage rites (like saptapadi) have been performed, the ancient law-givers would not have declared the marriage null and void even if the girl had been carried away by force or married by fraud. In modern works on Hindu Law the proposition is stated that 'a marriage though performed with the necessary ceremonies, may be set aside by the court, if it was brought about by force or fraud.' This opinion is based on what was said in some decided cases e.g. Aunjona Dasi. . . 6 Bengal L.R. 243 at p. 254, Venkatacharyulu v. Rangacharyulu, I.L.R. 14 Mad. 316 at p. 320, Mulchand v. Bhudhta, I.L.R. 22 Bom. 812. But in none of these cases was a marriage, duly solemnized by the performance of the rites of panigrahana, going round the fire and saptapadi, set aside. There are mere obiter dicta in these cases to the effect that a marriage may be set aside by the court for force or fraud."

This is a very strange state of affairs. How could the dharmashastra have tolerated such a position, as it undoubtedly did! There can be only one answer, which has been constantly present to the minds of modern Judges. Once a girl has been deprived of her virginity she is not a fit object of normal matrimonial negotiations and to annul her marriage might place her in a very much worse position than to leave her to the mercy of the family which has acquired her by such dubious methods—a position which we happily note is very gradually disappearing with the growth of education, later marriages, and the freer atmosphere created by the 'new look' of codified Hindu law.

Since MM. Kane wrote, however, authority on the subject of force has been forthcoming. Characteristically in that case also, namely *Ankamma v. Bama-nappa*¹¹, the marriage would not have been set aside, notwithstanding the force applied to the bridegroom at the ceremony itself, had the pretended marriage been consummated by intercourse afterwards. Fortunately for the parties they separated immediately after the ceremony, which was itself a sad reminder of the persistence of mediaeval habits amongst our contemporaries. However, we are in a position to know that the dharmashastra has been fundamentally modified by the Anglo-Hindu law, and we must presently see upon what basis this has taken place. Since force and fraud stand (apart from the *voidness*¹² of the forcible marriage) upon similar footings, what applies to the one will be helpful in relation to the other.

But at this point the reader will be restless: surely, he asks, this matter has been dealt with finally in our Hindu Marriage Act, 1955? The Act to amend and codify the law relating to marriage among Hindus¹² states plainly in s. 12:—

"12. Voidable marriages.—(1) Any marriage solemnized, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, shall be voidable; and may be annulled by a decree of nullity on any of the following grounds, namely:—...

(c) that the consent of the petitioner, or where the consent of the guardian in marriage of the petitioner is required under section 5, the consent of such guardian was obtained by force or fraud;...

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1), no petition for annulling a marriage—

(a) on the ground specified in clause (c) of sub-section (1) shall be entertained if—

(i) the petition is presented more than one year after the force had ceased to operate or, as the case may be, the fraud had been discovered; or

(ii) the petitioner has, with his or her full consent, lived with the other party to the marriage as husband or wife after the force had ceased to operate or, as the case may be, the fraud had been discovered;..."

This purports to state the law relating to our subject both in respect of marriages solemnized before the Act as well as those solemnized after it. If it is applied to marriages solemnized before the Act, and it is alleged that the consent of the guardian was obtained by fraud, a difficulty arises since the identity of the guardian and the age from which that guardian exercises his authority would seem to be determined with reference to the Act itself, which differs in some particulars from the Anglo-Hindu law on the subject. The respondent may show that the guardian in the instant case was not the guardian indicated by the Act, and that, therefore, the case does not fall within the Act. In those circumstances we must fall back upon the Anglo-Hindu law, which is reserved by the provisions of s. 4 of the Act for just such lacunae. The matter is hardly of much importance, since the Act itself prescribes, as we have seen, that the petition must be presented within one year of the fraud ceasing to operate, even in the case of marriages solemnized before the Act, so that as time goes on such cases are likely to become rarer. But there is something to be said for the view that the provisions of the Anglo-Hindu law and the statutory law should be harmonised by Parliament, to avoid anomalous decisions, such as may be foreshadowed by the judgment of Naik J. which we are about to discuss. In the meanwhile it is to be noted that Factum Valet is abolished in respect of marriages brought about by fraud on the petitioner or the guardian in marriage, both where the petitioner is the bride and where he is the bride-

11a. Void in English law and probably Anglo-Hindu law but not under the Hindu Marriage Act.

13 It is to be noted that no such provisions existed at ecclesiastical law, and therefore at English or Anglo-Hindu law of nullity. From where did this innovation come?

groom. But force and fraud are not defined, and we are thrown back upon the Anglo-Hindu law, which, as we have seen, gives us little assistance. Under the Hindu Marriage Act, it will have been noticed, force does not make a marriage void as it does at English law and, semble, Anglo-Hindu law but merely voidable.

The facts of Bimla Bai v. Shankerlal were simple. Bimla and her parents were told that Shankerlal was Kundanlal's son. So he was, but he was a dasiputra, son of Kundanlal by his shudra mistress, and therefore a shudra by caste. Bimla and her parents were Brahmans, and they would not have consented to the marriage if they had known that Shankerlal was a shudra by caste. The misrepresentation brought about the consent both of the petitioner and her guardian in marriage. The respondent argued that the statement that he was Kundanlal's son was literally true, and that if Bimla's guardian was deceived it was his own fault for not making sufficient independent enquiries. The learned Judge, citing English authorities,¹⁴ disposed of these points, for plainly a half-truth is no better than a lie in circumstances like these, and the lack of energy shown by the deceived guardian could not excuse the deception on the part of Shankerlal's father. 'Son', it was held, means aurasa or dattaka, and certainly not dasiputra.¹⁵ This is, with respect, absolutely incontestable. But we must note certain facts evident from the judgment, and also note the absence of reference to other relevant facts. The Hindu Marriage Act was not mentioned, although the appeal was heard in February 1958. The marriage took place in February 1952, and the Court below gave its decree in January 1957, so that it would appear that the spouses lived together for about four years before proceedings were commenced. This has a suspicious air, particularly since evidence was led to show that Shankerlal was excluded from the caste activities in which Kundanlal participated, a striking fact which must have become evident within a year of the marriage. Moreover, nothing is said in the judgment, and apparently nothing appeared in the pleadings, about the pretended spouses' conduct towards one another after the 'discovery' of the husband's caste. Did Bimla Bai leave his house immediately? If she stayed with him for more than a day or two her right to petition was cut off by s. 12(2) (a) (ii), unless she was kept in that house by force, which is nowhere suggested, or the remedy of nullity was available irrespective of the codifying statute.

Reading this extraordinarily interesting judgment one cannot escape the feeling that here was a case like A. v. B.,¹⁶ where the marriage might have been dissolved, instead of being annulled (though we are here in the dark as to whether Bimla had any grounds for divorce up her sleeve). The Court was petitioned in A. v. B. for nullity because, as the law then stood, no order for maintenance (alimony) could have been passed in the petitioner's favour. The right to alimony, coupled with the right to apply for variation in the amount awarded according to any change in the circumstances of the parties, is a decided embarrassment to the husband, and there are obvious attractions in nullity as opposed to divorce, particularly if the effect of nullity is to terminate the spouse's rights against each other. If Bimla's motives in applying for nullity were influenced by what Shankerlal's family were prepared to offer her in return for this method of approach, a question at once arises. Under the Anglo-Hindu law nullity could not give rise to alimony, but under the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, it can. Section 25 is explicit:

"25. Permanent alimony and maintenance.—(1) Any court exercising jurisdiction under this Act may. . . on application made to it for the purpose by either the wife or the husband, as the case may be, order that the respondent shall, while the applicant remains unmarried, pay to the applicant for her or his maintenance and support such gross sum or such monthly or periodical sum. . . as, having regard to the respondent's own income and other property, if any, the income and other property of the applicant and the conduct of the parties, it may seem to the court to be just, and any such payment may be secured, if necessary, by a charge on the immovable property of the respondent."

Thus where a spouse entitled to petition for nullity does not agree to the terms offered by the other side she can still insist upon alimony even where she has no grounds for petitioning for divorce. The peculiar attractions of nullity are somewhat diminished. But why after all was the Hindu Marriage Act not referred to in this case? The fact that the marriage took place before the Act is, of course, immaterial. We have no reason to believe that the guardian was other than that prescribed by the Act, and indeed the petitioner deposed to her having been deceived herself. Does the right to petition under the Anglo-Hindu law survive notwithstanding the codification carried through by the Hindu Marriage Act? This judgment seems to suggest that it may, and if this is correct, the limitations prescribed by s. 12(2) may be evaded.

The Anglo-Hindu law relating to fraud being, as we have seen, a modification of the dharmaśāstra, which, until this case, was never consulted in any judicial authority, we must look to the English ecclesiastical law which is its real source. Once the problem was solved whether such law could be applied in cases emanating from beyond the presidency towns the door was open for the introduction of English divorce and nullity law, which has in fact inspired many provisions in the Hindu Marriage Act and its State predecessors. We may confine ourselves for the present to fraud, and the authorities are to be found conveniently in J. Jackson's Law relating to the Formation and Annulment of Marriage (London 1951).¹⁷ Some of the authorities apply to an age which is past and to circumstances, such as the publication of banns, which do not directly relate to Indian conditions. But there is a large residue of authority showing that marriages may be annulled for fraud under circumstances as likely in India as in contemporary England. Jackson says (on p. 186) that where a marriage is annulled through lack of the consent necessary to create a marriage at ecclesiastical law, very clear and cogent evidence must be given to rebut the presumption that it has not in fact been given. The categories of subjective consent he subdivides. The first, the "non-existent mind", does not concern us. The second is "abuse of, or mistake as to the nature of the ceremony", again subdivided into "sham marriage", "mistake as to nature", "mistake as to effect"; the third is "mistake or error as to the person". He comments:

"Not all writers are agreed on the effect of fraud in relation to a ceremony of marriage induced thereby: this is because fraud, while sometimes talked of as an independent ground of annulment, in practice is a species of the genus mistake, in so far as mistake itself is a ground of annulment. The notions of the validation of void and the ratification of voidable marriages, and of the creation of marriages by estoppel, intrude into these cases."

In ecclesiastical law whereas force makes the ceremony ipso jure void (a proposition to which exception has been taken in isolated cases), the effect of fraud is not necessarily the same (and neither is the same under the Hindu Marriage Act), and Jackson convincingly contends that fraud makes it voidable only. The question of "sham marriages" need not detain us, but the law relating to a mistake as to the nature of the ceremony is best illustrated from Mehta v. Mehta,¹⁸ where a marriage was annulled which had taken place in Bombay and which had been represented to the petitioner as a ceremony of conversion to Hinduism. There are instances where a marriage has been annulled for mistake of the other party's identity, his status in life, his "quality" or "fortune", and these authorities are directly applicable to Indian circumstances.¹⁹ The qualification upon the general propositions are at least as important as the latter. The representation by a person of low birth that he was a substantial landed proprietor served to annul the marriage²⁰, so also an impersonation of a person of a known family by a complete stranger to it, when the bride would not have consented had she known his identity.²¹ But a marriage is not voidable because the bridegroom thought that the bride was wealthy and she turned out not to be so, or believed her to be a virgin and she was not. If however consent is induced by representations to those effects, which, in some Indian situations, might be implied rather than expressed verbally, and if these are reduced virtually to conditions, then the ecclesiastical lawyers were prepared to annul the marriage for breach of the condition, though in the case of virginity the matter seems not to have been beyond doubt.²² The case of concealed pregnancy is now dealt with by statute both in England and at Hindu law in India.

We may return to Naik J.'s judgment. Assuming that the Anglo-Hindu law was applicable, he found that the misrepresentation by Kundanlal took place not only before but actually at the ceremony itself. Everyone knows that at marriages between Brahmans the officiating Brahman recites Sanskrit texts which formally declare the subject matter of the transaction, the place and date, the identity of the donor of the virgin, his father's and grandfather's name, their caste, gotra, pravara, Vedic Shakha, and other relevant particulars. These recitations are made on behalf of the donor, and he adopts them, and they are supposed to be heard and acknowledged by the bridegroom, whose own identity, lineage, gotra and the rest are explicitly declared on his behalf, likewise in Sanskrit. Then the kanya danam takes place, and the virgin is transferred to her husband, the marriage being completed by ceremonies indicating the husband's acceptance of his wife and her accompanying him thenceforward. Everyone knows that these Sanskrit texts, which are memorised by the officiants from manuals compiled for the purpose from more or less ancient authorities,²³ are chanted or muttered, as the case may be, in a tone which does not encourage attentive listening, and that in four marriages out of five the very parties to the transaction themselves pay little attention, let alone the assembled company, who, if the priest chants loudly, usually drown his voice in conversation. But Naik J. holds that the Sanskrit verses are an express representation of the identity and caste of the intended spouses, and that mistakes in the prayoga as uttered may be evidence of fraud such as will go to the root of a marriage.

This is a very serious and novel development. That such dharmashastric material should be cited in a judgment at all is of great interest. The present writer has not come across another instance, for the only occasion when a High Court relied upon prayogas for deciding a point of law that comes to mind is that in Venkatiah v. Kalyanamma,²⁴ in which the Mysore High Court determined that an adoption does not relate back to the death of the adoptive father (a rule now no longer good law) because the texts recited at the gift of the boy implied the commencement of reciprocal duties from the moment of the gift and not earlier. But this novelty differs from the Mysore instance, because Naik J. is concerned with the evidential value of the prayogas in establishing the bridegroom's father's fraudulent intent, and not their usefulness in indicating the effect of the transaction itself. A more important implication is that the formulae recited at weddings must be listened to more carefully, and checked beforehand to eliminate any possible misrepresentations, lest it turn out that a disappointed spouse may urge that the marriage ceremony was completed by reason of reliance upon express undertakings by the other parties as to their caste, their ancestors' identities, their gotra and pravara, their Vedic shakha, and the rest, and an apparently irrelevant detail, mistakenly uttered, might serve as a ground for nullity petition. Of course in Bimla Bai's case the misrepresentation was not in respect of a detail, and the bride's mistake induced by a fraudulent misdescription of the bridegroom, was undoubtedly sufficient to annul the marriage if she had not afterwards approved it, and if the Court had jurisdiction, as the learned Judge assumed, to annul it. The provisions of the Hindu Marriage Act may (for all we know to the contrary) have been complied with, but the matter is left obscure by the reported judgment.

* The implications may now be considered from another angle. Which of the following misrepresentations will go to the root of the marriage, and serve to annul the marriage for fraud?

1. A writes, "I have a beautiful virgin daughter D, who is sixteen years old, a matriculate, and owns Rs. 2,000. Her photograph is enclosed." The photograph is of E. D turns out not to be a virgin. She is not a matriculate. She has no property. The bridegroom and his guardian consent to the marriage on the faith of all these misrepresentations. As for her age, she is actually 13, or it may be, 18. Is either discrepancy material?

2. B says, "My son S is in perfect health; he is just returned from America with a Ph.D. in nuclear physics; he is certain to get a high government post." In fact S, who is known to the bride's family, is dying of tuberculosis; he has returned without a degree from a country other than America; and there is no prospect of his obtaining a government, or indeed any other, post. The marriage takes place.

3. A boy, X, meets a girl, Y, at college. He represents himself as the son of a wealthy and high caste businessman, whereas in fact he is the son of a struggling member of a scheduled caste. Y agrees to X's proposal of marriage, and the marriage is celebrated despite the objections of Y's parents, who do not discover the deception until afterwards. Y tires of X but cannot prove any matrimonial offence against him. Is the marriage voidable for fraud?

All these problems may be said to be unassisted by really substantial authority. But the general proposition, that, when the parties truly consent to marry each other, though they are under certain accidental misapprehensions as to each other's qualifications, etc., the consent is binding and the marriage valid, is almost certainly applicable here, and the present writer would tentatively suggest that nullity is more readily available in case 1 than in either case 2 or 3. But the law of nullity for fraud has to be built up in India upon somewhat uncertain and unexplored foundations, and the case of Bimla Bai serves to point out how little we know.

II. *M. Satyanarayana v. J. Veerajulu*²⁵ poses a problem of quite a different kind. The Full Bench, consisting of the Chief Justice P. Chandra Reddy and Kumarayya and Munikanniah, JJ., investigated the much discussed question whether a Hindu female can prescribe for an absolute estate in cases where she has not openly asserted an absolute title adversely to all the world.

The position when the question was referred to them was that some Judges were of the opinion that a widow could not acquire an absolute estate by adverse possession in any circumstances, while many more took the view, apparently more rational, that she could acquire by adverse possession an estate which would descend after her death, forfeiture, or surrender to the next heir of her husband etc., (the doubts that arises at this point must be postponed for the present), unless she asserted her title against the reversioner, manifesting the animus possidendi in such a way as to exclude the reversion entirely, when she might be able to turn the improperly acquired property into her absolute property. This anomalous position would not have been reached but for the Privy Council decision in Lajwanti v. Safa Chand,²⁶ which depended upon very special facts. An incautious dictum in their Lordships' judgment led directly to a train of decisions in India, attempting to show²⁷ that females could not take advantage of the law of limitation of actions to the same extent as males—a proposition which naturally aroused indignation. There is no need to repeat here the present writer's objections to the dictum in Lajwanti's case. These were set out at length in an article in All India Reporter about four years ago,²⁸ and the case has been explained in the Full Bench case discussed here.²⁹

The Full Bench's answer is as follows:

In the case where a Hindu woman not entitled to inherit an estate asserts her title as absolute owner, her title to the property is absolute. But where she does not assert her absolute title, still the nature of the title is the same, in the absence of evidence that she stepped into possession of the property in her right as heir of the last male holder or under an arrangement or an agreement.

This disposes finally of the eccentric notion that not only could a widow not acquire adversely to her deceased husband's or son's reversioners, etc., which is obvious if one is concerned with the estate itself in respect of which reversionary rights exist, but that she could not acquire an estate adversely to the same persons in property to which no reversionary rights had ever attached, unless (as some believed) she asserted manifestly that whether or not she was not entitled to the property in question she was acquiring it by adverse possession against all the world. Such assertions are bound to be rare in the nature of things, and it was evident that the reversioners of the deceased husband, or of the deceased son, or other deceased male relative whose property she had inherited, could have no claim to property which was not owned by their last male owner, unless the female voluntarily merged it with such property to which they did in fact have reversionary rights. And what of the case where there are several sets of reversioners, where she survived first her husband and then her son; or of the case where she is a married woman and holds no limited estate at all? Should there be a discrimination between the powers of a widow who has inherited, and one who has not? Fortunately all this is set at rest by the Full Bench, and other High Courts will no doubt gladly follow their example.

It may be objected that all this is of little importance, in view of the Hindu Succession Act, s. 14, which converted into an absolute estate any property possessed by a woman subject to a limited estate. But we now know that where a female entitled on June 17, 1956, to property for the limited estate known as the Hindu woman's estate, was "possessed" of that property, either because she retained the equity of redemption in respect of it, or was its lessor, or was entitled to recover possession of it from a licensee or, semble, trespasser, it is her absolute property.³⁰ It is, therefore, important to know whether property occupied and dealt with by a trespasser or adverse possessor is or is not converted into absolute property by the section; so that a female reversioner, Ramchandra Dangit*, [1957] A.I.R.M.P. 238, still stands, likewise Sitaram v. Gampal, [1958] A.I.R. Bom. 140. The Supreme Court in Mt. Kirpal Kuar v. Bachan Singh, (1958) 21 S.C.J. 438, distinguish Lajwanti neatly, thus indirectly lending great weight to the Andhra Full Bench decision which was nearly contemporary. Lajwanti is now as good as dead, an event anticipated by all textbook writers.

That an adverse possessor holding for 12 years before June 17, 1956, takes the property out of s. 14 is asserted in P. Elliah v. P. Gangamma, [1957] A.I.R. Andhra p. 778.

whose reversionary rights ripened into a title before the commencement of the Act, may know whether or not she now has absolute rights in respect of that property. We suspect that where the female limited owner was not "possessed" of the property when the Act came into force, because title had been acquired, by an adverse possessor prior to the commencement of the Act, the Act does not avail her, though it does not disturb her reversioner's rights. It is, therefore, important to know whether her rights, if, for example, she were herself a reversioner, have been extinguished by the adverse possession of (in our problem) another female. The view that reversioners are out of the picture since the commencement of the Act, attractive as it is on many grounds, does not seem to coincide with the law in Bombay State, is not the law in most States, and is probably wrongly stated as the law in a minority of States.³¹ We must consider, then, what effect this answer of the Andhra Full Bench will have upon reversioners, male and female, under the law as now constituted.

The new rule is that which was asserted by Indian High Courts before Lajwanti's case and occasionally afterwards,³² namely that a Hindu woman may by adverse possession acquire property which is her stridhana, and that only where she enters as a limited owner, as for example by right of heirship under the Anglo-Hindu law, does she acquire an estate which descends to the heirs of the last owner (male or female) and which cannot be alienated to the prejudice of such heirs.

But their Lordships do not advert to an important distinction. The facts of their case did not require them to do so, not those in the nearly contemporaneous and somewhat similar case in the Supreme Court^{32a}. The period of limitation was not in issue. There were in fact two possible classes of cases. In the first the true owner who was excluded by the adverse possession was himself an absolute owner. In the second he or rather she was a limited owner. It sometimes happened that property passed to reversioners twice or more in succession, because the actual reversioners who took after the end of the limited estate were themselves not fresh stocks of descent, and were themselves bound by the limitations of the limited estate, until, that is to say, the coming into force of the Hindu Succession Act. Let us compare the cases diagrammatically.

(I)

Here P dies before 1956, leaving, a mother (M), a son (S) and a daughter (D). Prior to 1956 a mother was not a heiress along with a son. In our illustration she occupies P's property and excludes S without any expression of intention as to the nature of her tenure. After 12 years, the Andhra Full Bench correctly asserts, the property is M's, assuming that S was not a minor while time was running against him. If she disposes of that property after the 12 years are completed S and D can take no action, even if the Hindu Succession Act happened to be passed before the 12 years were up.

31 The matter is dealt with at length in Anomalous Decisions from Patna on the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, (1958) 21 S.C. J. J., 259, 264f. It is submitted that Ramchandra Sitaram v. Sakharam Mahadu, (1957) 60 Bom. L.R. 82, was correctly decided, and that the present writer's views on this point expressed at (1957) 59 Bom. L.R. Journal, 49f were wrong.

(II)

But in this case, again supposing a death before 1956, the mother holding adversely to the true heiress, W, will, it is submitted, not have obtained an absolute title against DS after 12 years. Nothing said by the Andhra Full Bench or by the former Hyderabad Full Bench, or in any of the earlier cases, authorises an adverse possessor to acquire, at the expense of a female limited heir, a title good against the reversion. W in our imaginary case suffered (but did not authorise or permit) her mother-in-law to treat P's property as her own. In failing to take steps to challenge M's position she was potentially injuring the reversion. The reversioners included her own daughters and her elder daughter's son. It is an established principle of law that a reversioner can recover from a trespasser property which he or she had acquired by adverse possession against the female limited owner.³³ No matter how many years the trespasser has been in possession, the reversioner can recover the property within a fresh period of limitation running after the limited owner's death. But if the actual reversioner turns out to be a female, her own neglect to recover the property is a further potential injury to the reversion, and the trespasser or his transferees are holding adverse merely to her. For the same reason as before they cannot protect themselves against a suit for ejectment from the next reversioner after this female owner's title has ceased. Thus, in our illustration, we may assume a course of events as follows: P died in 1940, leaving his widow, his two daughters, D1 and D2, D1's son, DS, and his own mother, M. M took control of the estate. In 1953 W died. D1 and D2 took no action against M before they died in 1955. The ultimate reversioner, DS, will not be debarred from recovering the property from M and/or her alienees until 1967 or after the expiry of 12 years from the commencement of his title on the death of the previous female owners, his mother and aunt. Thus it is incorrect, it is submitted, to say that a female can perfect her title to land by 12 years' adverse possession against anyone. M did not become the owner of P's property in 1952, and nothing but the inaction of a male reversioner for 12 years can perfect her title. This is because the true owners for so many years were themselves limited owners, and because, as the Supreme Court made clear in *Natvarlal Punjabhai v. Dadubhai*³⁴ in 1953, the reversioners cannot be prejudiced by the limited owner's permitting adverse possession to be acquired against themselves. Thus although W was debarred from recovering the property in 1953, DS, though he previously had no interest in the property, was not barred in 1955.

We may now consider the difficult position where a female reversioner was inactive in 1956 when the Hindu Succession Act came into force.

³³ See next note.

Here P died in 1940 and M took possession of his estate. W died in 1953 and D was then the reversionary heir, entitled to P's estate in 1956 when the Act began. D was, ex hypothesi, out of possession. Was she "possessed"? She had a right to eject M, for M's perfect title against W did not avail her against the reversioners, including D, and time began to run again in 1953 only. Is this right to eject sufficient to found a claim to be "possessed" within the meaning of s. 14, in which case, if she succeeded in recovering the property she would be an absolute owner, and could ignore the claims of DS? It is submitted that until authority is obtained we may suggest tentatively that she is not "possessed", for the adverse possession of M, although not so hostile to D's title as would have been D's own sale to a purchaser and his subsequent possession, is still hostile enough to make her chances of recovery depend upon chances such as Parliament may have had in mind when it chose the word "possessed". If this is correct DS is still a reversioner and, no matter what action D fails to take, on D's death DS obtains the right to divest M and M's alienees. If the other view is right and D is "possessed" it follows that by 1965 (and not earlier) M and her alienees are protected and cannot be disturbed.

In conclusion it seems that clarification of the position of the female owner whose title was limited when the Hindu Succession Act came into force is long overdue, and that to the now familiar problems of the woman who alienated improperly before the Act came into force³⁵ we must add the case of the female reversioner whose possession of the property is prevented by adverse possession on the part of a trespasser. Whether this trespasser is male or female, as we have seen, now makes no difference, but it is imperative that reversioners should know whether their rights in such cases survive or not.

Alike in the difficulties which they raise in practice, though very different in context, these two problems seem to demand attention from Parliament. Neither seems indeed to be a situation where rapid legislation is needed to give ex post facto jurisdiction and the like, as happened in the Bombay Hindu Divorce (Decrees Validation) Act, 1958 (Act 88 of 1958), but a careful review of the entire contexts, of nullity of marriage at Hindu law, and of the position of alienees from and adverse possessors against female Hindus whose titles arose before the Act of 1956, would be of no little benefit to the community.

INDECENT ACTIVITIES WITH CHILDREN

MR. BUTLER has asked the newly formed Criminal Law Revision Committee, under its chairman, Sellers, L.J., to consider how best to fill the gap in the law disclosed by the cases of Fairclough v. Whipp [1951] 2 All. E.R. 834 and D.P.P. v. Rogers [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1017, which established that a man who persuades a child to handle him indecently does not commit indecent assault. It has occurred to us that a possible solution would be to make it an offence for an adult to engage in any indecent activity or behaviour with or in the company of any child. There can be little doubt that the accused in the cases to which the Home Secretary has made specific reference would have been found guilty of such an offence, and it would seem that the same could be said of the prisoner in R. v. Lawson [1959] Crim. L.R. 134. In that case there was evidence that on two occasions the accused approached a boy of ten years of age and had a conversation with him about sex matters. He was indicted with having attempted to procure an act of gross indecency with a male person, but it was held that on these facts there was no case which could properly be left to the jury. R. v. Miskell [1954] 1 W.L.R. 438 was distinguished as, in 35 As in Ramchandra Sitaram, alt sup.

R. v. Lawson, there was no evidence of an unveiled or undisguised intention manifested by overt acts. Nevertheless, in such a case, the prisoner might have been guilty of the suggested offence of engaging in indecent activity or behaviour with or in the company of any child and we see no reason why this should not be so as he would then be punished "for doing an act which deserves the reprobation of every decent man" (per Lord Goddard, C.J., in D.P.P. v. Rogers, supra). It is, of course, already necessary in the case of any sexual offence to warn the jury against the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated testimony of the complainant (see, e.g., R. v. Mitchell [1952] 36 Cr. App. R. 79), but this requirement could well assume even greater significance if an offence similar to that suggested was brought into being.—S.J.

DAMAGES AND TAX

As the law stands at present, in assessing damages for loss of earnings through personal injury there must be taken into account the liability to tax which the injured party would have incurred if he had received the lost earnings. The fons et origo of that rule is Gourley's case ([1955] 3 All E.R. 796), and the principle there laid down has since spread to damages for trespass, for breach of a service agreement and for wrongful dismissal, as well as to compensation for compulsory acquisition, in so far as it is attributable to loss of profits. Few decisions in recent times have caused so much controversy; in fewer still has the theoretical soundness of the law been allowed to outweigh all other considerations—including justice. The problems set by the decision have been considered by two Law Reform Committees, those for England and Scotland, who, as Lord Denning remarked acidly in a recent debate in the House of Lords (213 Hansard H.O.L. 989), instead of finding a solution for the difficulties found a difficulty for every solution. It is, no doubt, true to say that the law as it stood prior to Gourley's case was over-generous to the injured person in giving him damages without deduction of tax, but normally, when a man, crippled for life in an accident, received a substantial sum he would invest it and thus pay tax on the interest or dividends which the investment brought in. This generosity to the injured person has been done away with since Gourley's case: the tax element is taken into account with the consequence that the wrongdoer is being treated over-generously, for the Inland Revenue are precluded from recovering the amount of tax which they could have claimed if the victim had not lost his earning capacity, and the burden of the resultant tax loss falls upon the general body of taxpayers who may, therefore, question the wisdom and justice of a principle that benefits only wrongdoers or, ultimately, their insurers.

Apart from general considerations, however, the application of the rule in Gourley's case may cause a host of difficulties in practice, of which Phipps v. Orthodox Unit Trust, Ltd. ([1957] 3 All E.R. 305) is as good an example as any, for it shows with what ease obstacles may be placed in the plaintiff's way. To advise a prospective plaintiff on the amount of damages he might be likely to recover in an action for personal injury has never been an easy task; now, there must be taken into account present and future rates of income-tax and surtax and, as Beach v. Reed Corrugated Cases, Ltd. ([1956] 2 All E.R. 652) shows, there is room for much refinement, such as calculating in advance the amount of covenanted annual payments out of unearned income so as to diminish the tax liability. The Scottish Law Reform Committee in their Report (Cmd. 635) drew attention to another little problem, raised in Spencer v. Macmillan's Trustees ([1958] S.L.T. 41), where the person claiming damages was an agent for principals whose identity was undisclosed and whose tax position may accordingly be unascertainable. It does not require much imagination to think of a foreign visitor to our shores who is unfortunate enough to suffer personal injuries here: will the Courts in that event have to go into the niceties of foreign systems of taxation so that the rule in Gourley's case can be kept sacrosanct? It is true that, as a result of the debate in the House of Lords, the promise has been given that "this important subject will be constantly considered by the Lord Chancellor's Department", and we would respectfully express the hope that we misunderstood the position if we detected in that promise a faint echo of a famous statement once made by the Duke of Wellington in the House of Lords: "The problem bristles with difficulties. Let us look it squarely in the face, and pass on". Perhaps it is not too late to ask what objections there can be to the scheme put forward by the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland under which damages for personal injuries are to be awarded gross, and then paid into Court to be applied in the purchase of an annuity which would be subject to special fiscal provisions.—LJ.

A NEW PLAN FOR STUDYING THE LAW

OVER two hundred years ago a man of wit and fashion, writing in The Connoisseur (August 12, 1756, No. 133), suggested a new plan for studying the law. He said that if we look into the "several Inns of Court, the professed students of the law compose a very numerous body; but if we afterwards turn our eyes on those few, who are employed in exercising their talents in Westminster Hall, this prodigious army of lawyers shrinks to a very thin and inconsiderable corps". Thousands, he said, are disgusted with the way the study of the law is now managed and "conceive an unconquerable aversion to the white leaves and the old black letters". It is quite impossible to be at once a lawyer and a fine gentleman. And so he gave us the outlines of a treatise which he said he had written called The Complete Barrister or A New Institute of the Laws of England.

First, he recalled the advice given to students by Coke—six hours' sleep, six for study, four for prayer, two for meals and the rest to the Muses. This he considered both absurd and unfashionable. There is no mention of Vauxhall or Ranelagh, and who but a methodist would ever think of praying for four hours a day? So, knowing the "volatile dispositions of the young gentlemen of the present age" he has tried to square his precepts to their lives and "so contrived the matter, that amidst the keenest pursuit of their pleasures, they shall be engaged in the most improving course of the law".

Since laws are principally rules of action, why coop up a brisk young man to learn in his chambers? Let him venture abroad into the world. That is not only the best method, but it is the only one which "several inhabitants of the Inns of Court would ever follow". So he will tell us how one such spends his time; "and I cannot but congratulate the Bar, that so many young men, instead of blinding their eyes and bewildering their understandings with Coke, Plowden, Salkeld, etc., have sense enough to follow the same course of study".

He called his hero Tom Riot, sent to the Temple merely because, for a few years, his father did not know what to do with him. But "so unwearied has been his application to the new method" that his father and the rest of his friends will be surprised at his wonderful proficiency. Since a ready elocution is a prerequisite of a good counsel he advised a diligent attendance at the theatres. And in inns and coffee houses he has imbibed much rhetorical argument beside the more usual fare. Lord Coke himself calls conference the life of study, and so Tom Riot has put in a "frequent attendance at George's and the other coffee houses about the Temple, where every student has so many opportunities of benefiting himself by daily conversation with counsellors, attornies, clerks to attornies, and other sages of the law". He has a first-hand knowledge of the procedure in magistrates' Courts since he has so frequently been employed in "beating the rounds" and has in consequence been "taken into custody by the magistrate of the night". Furthermore; "certain impertinences of his tailor and other tradesmen have given him a very clear notion of the laws of arrest"; and the several sums of money he has borrowed at different times, repayable on his father's death, "have opened to him some difficult points in conveyancing, by teaching him the nature of bonds and deeds", and unravelled to him "the intricate doctrines of reversion and remainder as well as the general nature of estates. Thus, he is continually improving; and whenever he shall happen to commit a rape, or a genteel murder, it will serve him for matter of instruction, as well as any history of the pleas of the Crown, and give him an insight into the nature of the practice and extent of the jurisdiction of our courts of justice".

By shooting he becomes conversant with the laws relating to the preservation of game; by dancing at the balls held during assizes he picks up all the learning of the circuit; and as his father is a Member of Parliament he gets to know, by canvassing for votes during elections, all about the law relating to elections—and to bribery.

Thus, by regarding his own life as a commentary on the law, the student learns by example and will improve "according to the eagerness with which he engages in his pleasures". What, he asked, could be more delightful?

He concluded with a word of advice applicable as much to the busy practitioner as to the student in chambers: "It is recorded of an eminent counsellor, of the North family, who, being one of the ablest practitioners at the Bar, was overloaded with business, that sometimes choosing to retire a while from hurry and perplexity, he would say to his clerk: 'Tell the people I do not practise this term'. This proper relaxation I always recommend to my pupils, and have some reason to think they are prudent enough to embrace it; for, as I am acquainted with several students on the new plan, and do not remember to have seen them doing any business in the Courts for some time, I suppose they had given notice to their clerks to tell the people that they did not practise in those terms".—L.J.

WHAT IS EFFICIENCY?

THOSE who follow the fortunes of the Law Society—they must be a large proportion of its 16,000 members—may well give a new twist to Pliny's aphorism "Ex Africa semper aliquid novi." By them it could now be translated "There's always something new from the annual conference." For a number of years the discussions at the annual conferences have provided flocks of new ideas and observations on the legal profession. This year's conference at Eastbourne was no exception. Is it the sea air which stimulates thought and speculation, or mere absence from the daily grind of the office and the burden of a responsible practice? Whatever may be the cause (and one suspects that the annual conference is only the occasion for expressing opinions which have been germinating throughout the year), the new president fired off volleys at Eastbourne in his inaugural address and winged quite a number of the flock of ideas which were flying round.

His address covered a wide field. He touched upon the responsibilities and the aims of a practising solicitor: he threw out hints that each solicitor in active practice today should try his best to keep himself up to date—no easy thing in a profession where practitioners tend to move in some degree of isolation and where the tradition of conservative thought and conduct is so very strong. "Let us see to it," he said, "that we are not justifiably to be looked upon as dry-as-dust theorists. Let us keep as far as we can up to date and abreast of current thought and modern methods." He postulated this eagerness to keep up to date as the first requirement of an efficient solicitor, and after that discussed some means of keeping up to date. The real purpose of a solicitor, he said, was to be found "in providing sound, sensible and practical advice and suggestions on the many facets of the problems to which modern life gives rise." One could hardly have a better yardstick to measure a solicitor's efficiency than that. One is quite sure that the president would not claim that assertion as being deeply original: nevertheless, although it may be fairly obvious, it needs stating and restating. Every solicitor should have a goal and a well marked course to it.

These desiderata in the make-up of a solicitor presuppose another quality which has no mention, namely absolute and unswerving integrity. The fair name of the law—and it has a fair name in this country and is the envy of the rest of the world—is in the hands of the law's practitioners and the benches of varying authority up and down the land. The average man has little contact with the law save with his own solicitor, and it is by that solicitor's conduct that the average man judges the law. All the other qualities so necessary for success are as nothing compared with the most vital of all, integrity of the highest type.

* Secondly, the solicitor should give sound advice. One takes that to mean that the advice is primarily sound in law. So your solicitor must study his law and note its developments through the decisions of the Superior Courts and the changes in practice. The need to study throws a heavy burden on a solicitor, for he cannot hope to know all the law; so he must specialise to some extent and leave what he cannot cover to his partners. He has a tremendous amount of administrative work to do and long periods of uninterrupted study are quite impossible except in bed from midnight onwards! To help him in the discharge of this function he knows the advantage of taking his points to counsel for advice, a course which is comparatively cheap still and which gives him a certain amount of protection from any possible charge of negligence.

Further, the advice must not only be sound—it must be sensible and practical. One takes those last two adjectives as directed towards the same end, namely, giving the client a clear-cut course of conduct to follow. For the client wants a practical solution to what is after all to him a very practical problem. He is not interested in the theory of the law except as to how it affects his rights and (more often than not) his pocket. It is sometimes difficult for a lawyer who is interested in the principles of law to remember that his client does not share that interest and that he would rather, as it were, win on a bad point than lose on a good one—which is more than can be said for theorists pure and simple. The client never sees himself as being an instrument for carrying out the law. He looks upon the law as something which he can use and behind which he can shelter. Bearing that in mind, the solicitor should shape his advice accordingly upon the most practical possible lines. His advice will be useless unless it is a workable proposition.

Whether or not the client accepts that advice is quite another matter. It may be the best advice in the world from the point of view of both law and practicality: but no matter. There is no guarantee that it will be followed. It has its best chance of success if the client really trusts the judgment of the solicitor tendering it. And in order to win that trust and to keep it the solicitor must keep himself up to date. In other words, he must be efficient.

Now efficiency is measured according to the resources available. You could not expect to have, say, a company prospectus drawn with the same degree of efficiency by a couple of elderly solicitors in partnership in the country as by a firm of City solicitors with a dozen partners. Conversely, the City firm might not show up half so well as the elderly couple where the sale of a farm with live and dead stock was concerned. It is a question of resources and experience, and that leads to some degree of specialisation. But in their respective fields the two firms may be equally efficient, though there is a tendency to regard large firms as more efficient than small. This arises possibly because the larger firms have great capital resources and can occupy larger and more impressive looking premises with bigger staffs and more modern equipment for coping with the office side of the work.

The President of the Law Society cited two descriptions of solicitors' offices from Dickens and said that they almost fitted some solicitors' offices visited in recent years. Lawyers in this country tend to cling to old-fashioned methods because, as has already been hinted, the cast of their mind is conservative, as is natural in a profession where the appeal is so often exclusively to precedent.

The client is not necessarily very much impressed by an old world atmosphere, nor, conversely, is he necessarily inspired by the use of mechanical gadgets. But he will tend to warm more to the firm which has an up to date system of filing the myriad documents which a lawyer must keep (in spite of what the public may think is the effect of the Cheques Act, 1957, his duty over receipts alone is heavy) than to the one which just keeps dusty bundles of papers tied up with tape under the vague superintendence of "old—who can put his finger on everything."

So far as the mechanisation of offices is concerned, it is remarkable what effect the war has had. Where offices were blitzed, firms had to move to other premises and this has led to a healthy sorting out in the process, with perhaps more up-to-date furniture and equipment. Take an example from those two strongholds of the law, the Temple and Lincoln's Inn. The former was badly hit: the new buildings, housing mainly counsel but with many solicitors as well, are light, spacious, dignified and with all modern conveniences, such as proper plumbing and lifts. But Lincoln's Inn, having escaped the war, remains very much what it has always been: the rooms are gloriously spacious and dignified but few modern conveniences such as lifts have yet been installed, though what aids to efficiency can be installed have been. No lawyer (for he is a member of a profession which lives by thinking for itself) is so foolish as to think that mere gadgets will guarantee efficiency. Nor will the client be so persuaded. What the client looks at is the "end-product", and the wrapping is neither here nor there. He would rather have good advice scribbled on the back of an envelope than bad advice presented in perfect type. The legal profession can be trusted to strike the proper medium between these two extremes, always remembering that the efficiency of a firm is measured against its resources and the reward which is asked for the work in hand. Young men starting small practices of their own may find abundant modern conveniences (especially a highly trained staff) beyond their means: they can, within their own spheres, be efficient nevertheless.

There is a complaint which one hears constantly levied against solicitors. It is this: "My lawyer is an awfully good chap. I trust him absolutely and respect his judgment. But oh, the delays! You put a matter into his hands and never hear another word for months." Now, one knows that the lawyer is himself subject to constant frustration in getting his information or authority from someone with whom he is negotiating (government departments are no exception) and that the delay is not his fault. Could not a lot of anxiety be allayed if solicitors were to send out to their clients so affected by delay short notes every so often (nothing elaborate is called for) to explain the situation—a kind of system of "sit-reps" such as was used in intelligence in the war? One feels that this would go a long way towards upholding the good name of solicitors where their reputation for vigour and despatch are involved.

In their efforts to be and to remain efficient in the light of modern requirements, firms of solicitors must always try to see to it that the partners have a fair balance of work distributed between the working members. Nothing discourages a young partner so much as to have to bear a disproportionate amount of work whilst the senior partners have an easy time. Exactly when elderly partners shall retire is, of course, a pure matter of private arrangement. But the senior partners who insist on staying on beyond their useful working lives should remember that often by doing so they upset the balance of the whole firm and endanger the efficiency of the partnership.

And so, as another year has come to its close and solicitors pause to consider their work, let them bear the address of the president in mind and turn their thoughts inwards with the question: "Am I efficient, and do I help to make my firm efficient?" The legal profession is not having an easy time in these modern, competitive days. Do not let it ever be said that lawyers are not up-to-date and efficient. Lawyers must see to it that they are both.—L.T.

IS THE CONSTITUTION OF INDIA FEDERAL?*

THE Constitution of India is on the pattern of a Federal Democratic Republic. The three major characteristics of a federal system are: (1) supremacy of the Constitution, (2) distribution of powers and (3) authority of Courts. Thus under the first category all the three powers of the state, executive, legislative or judicial, are subordinate to the Constitution both at the Federal and State level. The second category entails a division of authority between the federal government and the States which are its constituents. Under the third caption the supremacy of the Courts as interpreter of the Constitution is essential to nullify any action of the federal or state Governments or their respective organs whenever such action runs counter to the mandatory provisions of the Constitution. A federal Constitution is clearly an attempt to reconcile the apparently irreconcilable claims of national sovereignty and state sovereignty. The constituent states of a federation may be the creator of the central government by agreeing to part with already existing sovereign power to the central agency; or the converse may be the case where the Central Government, which was priorly unitary, is rendered by the new federal Constitution formulated by the people or their representatives, to the position of a central federal government sharing its sovereign powers with the component administrative units.

Judged broadly under the above categories the Constitution of India is certainly federal. There are various types of federations such as found in India, America, Canada, Australia and Switzerland.

We are particularly concerned now with a controversy that has been raised recently by the opinions of Prof. K. C. Wheare¹, endorsed by Mr. N. Arunachalam², and that of Prof. C. H. Alexandrowicz³. Prof. K. C. Wheare has coined a phrase 'quasi federation' as applicable to India, but has not anywhere defined what a 'quasi federation' is. If it is said to be analogous to such terms as 'quasi judicial' or 'quasi legislative', the jurist has to pose the query, is 'quasi federation' derived from any source which was truly federal. We know judicial functions devolving by statute and quasi (though not fully judicial) functions delegated to certain bodies or tribunals by statute; similarly delegated legislation either by a statute or by the parent legislative body itself, under some power vested in it by law, can create quasi legislative organs. But what is the term 'quasi federal'? There is no legislative sanction for such a terminology at all in any of the Constitutions of the world. As Prof. Alexandrowicz states the term 'quasi federal' should only mean 'virtually federal'. But it does not take us farther than in a negative way stating 'India is not federal but quasi federal'. Is the latter capable of any decisive definition? It appears to be a 'loose' connotation taking us nowhere but landing us in a quagmire. We can understand terms such as 'federal', 'more federal' or 'less federal' as indicative of the degree of federalism exhibited in a Constitution. But to say 'quasi' imports an underlying idea that it is not federal. Ordinarily the tussle is between 'unitary' and 'federal'. In such an event either a Constitution is unitary or federal. Federalism cent. per cent. or diluted federalism of a lesser degree, one can understand. Can diluted federalism be unitary? It cannot. On that account can it be called 'quasi federal' as if there is an intermediate stage. A Constitution is either federal or not federal. The minimum requisites for federalism should alone be looked into for the purpose of classification. If quasi federation is to be in vogue, is it to be applied to all federations which are not 100 per cent. federal or is the nomenclature restricted to any country with less than 50 per cent. federalism and further, is any percentage fixable at all for introducing such a terminology. Wheare appears to feel America is the truly federal type. He says:⁴

"Among examples of a Federal Constitution there may be mentioned those of United States, Switzerland and Australia. In each case the Constitution sets out the matters upto which the Legislature of the whole country may make laws and it reserves to the States or cantons a sphere in which their Legislatures may operate, in legal independence of the Central Legislature and of each other."

Later, while dealing with Canada, the Professor feels a great difficulty and comes to a halting view that the Canadian Constitution may be called 'quasi federal'. The word 'may' has to be noted. It is only another way of saying 'Canada is not as federal as America.' Quoting the Professor's own words:

"The Constitution of Canada is more difficult to classify. It establishes an independent government for the whole Government, but it permits that government to exercise certain limited powers of control over the government of the ten provinces. Although there is a list of subjects enumerated in the Constitution over which the provincial Legislatures have exclusive authority and upon which the Parliament of Canada is unable to legislate, yet it is provided that the executive Government of Canada may veto provincial bills or disallow provincial acts. Moreover provincial judges are appointed by the Government of Canada and the formal head of the provincial Government—the Lieutenant Governor—is also appointed by the Government of Canada. These qualifications upon the strict Federal principle of independent and co-ordinate status between the general and provincial governments may lead us to regard the Canadian Constitution as not strictly Federal. It may be called Quasi Federal."

With all respect to Prof. Wheare, we can only say that Canada presents a less federal structure in its Constitution than America, but nevertheless it does not thereby become 'quasi federal' i.e., that which is not really federal. In reality in Canada the present Constitution dates from 1867 when the British North America Act was passed, uniting the then existing four provinces into a federation entitled the Dominion of Canada which later on increased to ten provinces.

The essentials of a federal type are there in the Canadian Constitution. There are (1) the units of the federation, (2) the power to amend the Constitution by the King or Parliament of Britain by an address presented by both Houses of the Dominion Parliament. This has to be backed by substantial public opinion in Canada. If the consent of the one or more of the provincial Legislatures is lacking, the convention appears to be that amendment be refused by the Parliament. (3) There is a definite division of powers between the dominion and the units, the opposite of the U.S.A. model i.e., the powers of the provinces are enumerated and the residue is left with the dominion. There is a definite State List on which the provinces could legislate. (4) The executive power enables the Government to be carried on in the name of the King through his Governor General who acts on the advice of the Dominion Cabinet Ministers, elected and responsible to the House of Parliament. (5) The legislative power is centred in the Dominion Parliament which consists of the King, the Governor General, the nominated Senate and the elected House of Commons.

4 Modern Constitutions by Prof. K. C. Wheare p. 27.

(6) The judicial power is vested in the Supreme Court of Canada. The two Federal Courts are the Supreme Court and the Court of Exchequer and Admiralty, the Judges of the superior Courts being appointed by the Governor General to hold office during 'good behaviour' and removable by an address by the Senate and the House of Commons. May be the Supreme Court of Canada is less powerful than that of America as its power to interpret the Constitution is reduced by the Governor General's power of disallowing provincial bills. But in another way it is more powerful than the American Supreme Court as it can hear appeals from provincial Courts on purely provincial law.

We have outlined the above broad features of the Canadian Constitution to indicate its federal nature. It may be clearly understood that the nature of federalism is more one of historical growth and based on a nation's necessity. To expect the same pattern of federalism in all countries is well-nigh impossible.

It is the fashion to regard America as the mother of federal Constitutions. But even there, there are certain features which are the antithesis of true and unalloyed federalism. We shall detail a few aspects of the same. It is argued that in America as the Congress has only enumerated powers, the residual powers are vested in the states or the people, thus making it appear that there is a very real division of powers, the states being as sovereign as, if not more powerful than, the centre. Unlike India or Australia there are no concurrent legislative lists in the U.S.A. But in actual practice this seemingly strong federal feature has been abused. During the national emergencies or when national interests required a broader concept of federal power, the Supreme Court of America was called in to rescue in its interpretative jurisdiction to invoke the doctrine of implied powers, the doctrine of immunity of instrumentalities and the doctrine of implied prohibition.

Thus in *McCulloch v. Maryland*⁵ the Court allowed the Congress to assume control over 'banking' in national interests though banking was not a listed federal item. The implied powers ferretted out the listed item 'coinage' to suit the occasion and this was deemed to comprise 'banking' also. Again in *United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Association*⁶ the commerce clause was invoked as a positive power to bring in a non-federal item as 'insurance' under the implied federal power. This tendency to assume federal powers through the interpretative jurisdiction of the Supreme Court compelled Mr. Dodd, an American writer, to state—

"the scope of national authority has become a question of Government Policy and has substantially ceased to be one of constitutional law."

Under the doctrine of 'immunity of instrumentalities' the Supreme Court of America propounded in McCulloch v. Maryland that the power to tax involves the power to destroy. Ergo a state cannot tax the agencies or instrumentalities of a federal government as that would cripple the function of the federal government.

Under the third doctrine of implied prohibition the American Supreme Court held in *U.S. v. De Will*⁷ that the Congress power to regulate trade among states implies prohibitions regarding internal trade by state except indeed as a necessary and proper means of carrying into execution some other power expressly granted or vested.

Thus while we exalt the American Constitution as highly federal giving real autonomy to States, yet, in actual practice, this latter autonomy appears to be a mere smoke screen. The centre is given more power by invoking the above doctrines for the Supreme Court to interpret the Constitution in such a way as to yield more power to the Centre than what is contained in the Constitution. Shall we then call America as cent. per cent. federal? Assuredly not. It is very nearly on a par with Canada and India in the above matters. For the doctrine of implied power is thoroughly unnecessary for the federal systems of Canada and India where, besides the residuary powers being vested in the Centre, there are double enumeration of powers such as federal and state items. India has another string in its bow in the long list of concurrent powers on the analogy of Australia.

The doctrine of immunity of instrumentalities is not wanted in India as the exemption of mutual taxation is specifically provided under arts. 285 and 289. Canada has rejected the doctrine on the ground that the validity of each legislation has to be tested intrinsically and not whether it would hamper the functions of another Government as interpreted in America (vide *John Deere Plow Company, Limited v. Wharton*⁸). Canada and India also do not need the doctrine of implied prohibition on account of the respective double and triple enumeration of powers.

In America though the States are vested with all reserve powers yet in practice they are so used as not to conflict with the needs of national government at the centre. Again in the Australian Constitution there is no treaty making power and this power is derived through judicial interpretation (vide *The King v. Burges: Ex Parte Henry*⁹ where it was possible to find the power to enforce international agreements despite its effect on state legislation). The same difficulty was felt in America though Art. VI gave adequate powers. In the Indian Constitution the Centre can legislate for the states during emergencies. There is no such specific provision in the American Constitution. But the Supreme Court of America came to its rescue to assure such power during war. The verdict of competency thus lay with the Court and not with the federal Legislature. The 'emergency' powers of Parliaments of India visualised in arts. 249 and 250, power to legislate for the State; art. 356, which enables the President to take over if the Constitutional machinery breaks down, are all absent in America. But this is circumvented thus. If there is resistance by a state to the execution of any law by the Congress or if federal authority is questioned by state government, the national government may exercise its military forces to compel the state to obey its laws, so as to maintain the indestructible union.¹⁰ Instead of this armed forces' invasion of a state we have in the Indian Constitution powers to suspend state rights and assumption of powers by the President during emergencies.

Now certain factors emerge from the above discussion. In America as the power of constitutional amendment is very rigid the Supreme Court is utilised to so interpret the Constitution as to meet any new national emergency. In India the amending process is not so rigid and so the Supreme Court of India has restricted powers of interpretation. In America though the Constitution apparently restricts the power of the centre, yet, in actual practice, it wields more power than the units. Ergo the criticism, that in Canada or India what is yielded by the letter of the Constitution to the state is far less than what is its due, falls to the ground, since in America, the resultant is the same in the actual working of the Constitution. What is directly set out in the Indian Constitution is indirectly practised in America. If so, what is the use of dubbing India and Canada as 'quasi federal' while America and Australia are termed as 'federal'. It all bespeaks of a lack of perspective and lack of decision. The term 'quasi' is a camouflage and a veritable conundrum leading the jurist into a needless hairsplitting mirage of 'words, mere words.'

It will be more appropriate to fall in with the reasoning of Mr. C. F. Strong who dealt on variations of the federal type thus:

"In the completely Federalised State, of which the United States is the most perfect example, the Court is absolutely supreme in its power to decide in cases of conflict between the Federal authority and the State authorities. In other cases the powers of Court are limited by rights granted to other authorities. Of this Switzerland affords the best example. For her not the Federal Court but the Federal Assembly is the final arbiter on all conflicts between the State and Federal authority...between these two ex-traces the several examples of variation in the matter of deciding conflicts between Federal and State authorities. In the Australian Constitution certain clauses exist which may be altered by the Commonwealth Parliament without reference to any other authority. In such cases there can be no question of infringing the rights of States."

Mr. C. F. Strong thus calls America as most federal and refers to Canada as 'less federal' than America,¹¹ Australia or Switzerland. He further speaks of Canada as a 'modified example' of a federal state.¹² He never uses the term 'quasi'. Again referring to the U.S.S.R. Mr. C. F. Strong said that it is nonetheless a federal state though it repudiated the methods of western constitutionalism. The U.S.S.R. as under the Stalin Constitution of 1936 in its federal aspects bears on paper at least a striking resemblance to some of those we have so far examined.¹³ Mr. Strong was uttering the bare truth when he said federalism varies in form from place to place and from time to time depending on so many factors, historical, geographical, economic and political.¹⁴ Thus the historical background of Soviet Russia necessitated a new philosophy of the political life, a regimented socialistic republic where the individual got submerged in the state's needs. The way of life was totalitarian and regimented to a pattern which clearly is antidemocratic. An alternate Government was impossible with only one recognised monolithic political party as the communist party. This is also the antithesis of democracy. But on paper the U.S.S.R. was a federal state with sixteen soviet socialist republics. There is an enumeration of powers on the U.S.A. model enumerated so far as the centre is concerned, the residue being relegated to the states. The executive power was vested with the council of ministers while the legislative power vested in the Supreme Soviet which consisted of two Houses, the Soviet Council of the Union and the Soviet Council of Nationalists.

Thus on paper the U.S.S.R. is a Federal Constitution, but in actual practice, it is antidemocratic and totalitarian. Shall we call U.S.S.R. as 'quasi' federal or the least federal indicating that the powers are not really shared between the units and the centre. It is a one party monolithic state though outwardly federal. It is best to call the U.S.S.R. as the 'least federal'.

The conditions for establishing federalism are (a) a desire for union, (b) the desire for local independence, (c) the absence of marked inequalities among the component units, (d) political education and legislation. It must be noted that three factors were present in varying degrees and forms before the Federal Constitution of America, Australia, Canada or India were ushered in. The problems of federal government were generally met by (a) satisfactory division of powers, (b) protection of the smaller units against dominance by the larger, (c) organisation of the relation among the units and (d) a satisfactory method of constitutional amendment.

As Mr. C. F. Strong says

"the greater the reserve powers with the Units, the more markedly Federal is the State whose Constitution permits such reserve to them."

The word used is 'more markedly.' So it is all a question of more federal or less federal and never was there any yardstick under the connotation of 'quasi federal.'

It may be apposite to recall what Prof. K. C. Wheare himself says as to the divergence of the law of the Constitution and the practice of it.

"Although the power of veto and disallowance have been exercised by the Government of Canada over Provincial legislation they have been used sparingly and they have done little to contradict in practice the independent status of the province. In Australia on the other hand where the law of the Constitution safeguards the independence of the States more strictly, the control of the Government of the Commonwealth of Australia over the Governments of the States has become so great that some observers would say that in practice the States of Australia are little more than the administrative agencies of the Commonwealth. This control has come chiefly from the greater financial resources

11 Vide Modern Constitutions.

12 Ibid p. 115.

13 Ibid p. 122.

of the Commonwealth and has shown itself particularly in the increased reliance of the States upon grants from the Commonwealth for the performance of most of their important functions. It may be said therefore that the Australian Constitution embodies a considerable measure of decentralisation or devolution, although in law it remains Federal. In Canada on the other hand though the Constitution in law is 'quasi federal' it is in practice nearer to Federalism than the Australian. In the class of quasi Federal Constitution it is probably proper to include the Indian Constitution of 1950, the Constitution of the West German Republic of 1949 and also that of the German (Weimer) Republic from 1918 to 1933; and the Constitution of the U.S.S.R. of 1936."

✓ We must note that Prof. K. C. Wheare was halting and rather indecisive in his phraseology. He says Canada may be called 'quasi federal'. He felt it probably proper to include India in the category. He also admits that countries which are more federal on paper are less or least federal in practice and vice versa. In such a context we feel that there is no background or justification for coining a new word 'quasi' federation to add to the confusion. Mr. Arunachalam quotes Prof. K. C. Wheare as saying

"If there is no sphere of activity reserved for the constituent communities and forbidden to the Central Government, the Union is not Federal, but legislative, or incorporative, as the Scots called it in 1707."

But this is not the case at all in India. The two basic requisites for a federation are stated to be (i) two separate governmental organisation for the centre as well as the state with its duplication of institutions, legislative, executive and judicial, (2) the respective spheres of the centre and the state in the above should be in writing.

Does not India answer to these basic standards of federation? Is there not separation of powers and two governments, the Union and the State in India? In the sphere of the Union Government arts. 52 to 78 deal with the powers of the executive while arts. 79 to 122 deal with the legislative aspect. The judiciary are referred to in arts. 124 to 147. In the sphere of the state government the executive (arts. 153 to 167), the legislative (arts. 168 to 212) and the judicial (arts. 214 to 237) aspects are detailed. The distribution of legislative powers are covered by arts. 245 to 255, administrative relations of states with the Union by arts. 256 to 263 and the emergency provisions by arts. 352 to 360. The three enumerated lists are given in sch. VII.

Are all these division of powers unreal? Does it all lead to such a vanishing point of federalism as to invoke Mr. Arunachalam's term 'quasi federal', or 'legislative or incorporative' etc. Mr. Arunachalam argues that "When these very important aspects of a federal structure are noticed, any structure that may possess the trappings of a federal structure, where the autonomy that is assured to the units therein is precarious or at the pleasure of the centre, will not in any sense be entitled to the status of a Federal Structure, contractual, administrative or otherwise. Such a structure can only be quasi federal or legislative or incorporative as the Scots called it in 1707."

We may say this is bad logic and worse law. At any rate Mr. K. C. Wheare referred to cases where there is no power at all for the unit whatsoever, as legislative or incorporative. In that sense India cannot be assailed for the states have substantial though limited power. Mr. Arunachalam characterising that arts. 257 and 365 of the Indian Constitution reduce the federal character to a vanishing point, is indeed fallacious. It is merely a 'vanishing argument', for such emergency powers have been usurped by the American Congress under its police powers so as to safeguard the so-called indestructible Union by marching its military forces and the President exercising his supreme powers over the state concerned. We have already adverted to this aspect before. So Mr. Arunachalam appears to feel satisfied with the legal aspect on paper though the practice may be contra and most ugly. In the wake of this specious reasoning Mr. Arunachalam declares that Indian Federalism 'vanishes'. Did not American Federation vanish equally under those circumstances? Why this discrimination and causistry in reasoning? He excels in this direction when he says "After all quasi institutions have come to stay in every branch of law". If the reference is to 'quasi judicial' or 'quasi legislative' they are derived under law by delegation, or directly by statute. He further adds 'Quasi means not exactly'. This is again a most imperfect way of describing the structure of a federation. Prof. Alexandrowicz rightly called this as too vague a term, and added:

"The use of 'Quasi' in legal terminology proved meaningful in exceptional cases only. For instance in the expression 'Quasi Judicial' the addition of 'quasi' serves the purpose of indicating the application of approximately judicial methods in administrative proceedings. It might also be conceded that in term 'Quasi legislative powers' the term 'quasi' proved helpful to justify and explain delegation of powers to the Executive. But in the expression 'Quasi Federation' the word quasi hints at a deviation from the Federal principle without indicating what kind of special position a particular quasi Federation occupies between a unitary State and a Federation Proper."

The Professor further suggests to Mr. Arunachalam to rather consider India as a 'federation with a vertically divided sovereignty' than as an administrative federation. It must be clearly understood that:

"Sovereignty is a unit and cannot be divided and what is divided in a Federal government is nothing more than powers of the Government. Thus Sovereignty is in the Federation itself and that is in the States formed by the Union and what is retained by the component members is merely local autonomy in respect of certain matters."

Prof. J. W. Garner¹⁵ refers to perfect and imperfect federal unions, the difference being only in the degree of federalism. This appears to be a better classification than 'quasi federal'. But we believe the better term to be used should be 'federal', 'more federal' or 'less federal' to indicate the degree of the federal structure in an approximate manner.

The opinion of Mr. Arunachalam that "the Constitutions of India and Canada share alike many common features that really cut across the essential principles of Federalism" is incorrect. What can be really asserted is that while there are certain basic features of federalism in India such as supremacy of the Constitution, division of powers and authority of Courts, yet there are certain unique features in the Indian Constitution peculiar to itself, some of which tend to suggest a leaning away from federal and towards centralisation of power in the Union Government. Federalism varies from place to place and from time to time in the history of the world. A country takes unto itself such a federal pattern as it could assimilate or find it necessary in its historical evolution. We shall now study the cases of America, India, Australia and Canada in their Federal characteristics. In the mode of formation a federal union may be formed by a voluntary agreement between a number of sovereign independent states for the administration of certain affairs of general concern such as in the U.S.A. or Australia. It may also be a unitary state transformed into a federal union as in Canada. In India even under the Government of India Act, 1935, the provinces could not be said to be in any sense sovereign like the states of the American Union. After the political awakening in the Canadian era and the British quitting India in 1947 the Constitution has been framed by the people of India assembled in the Constituent Assembly. The people of India wrought for themselves as set out in the preamble to the Constitution a Sovereign Democratic Republic to secure (a) justice, social, economic and political, (b) liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship, (c) equality of status and opportunity, (d) fraternity assuring the dignity of the individual and unity of India. Just as the indestructible union of America was carved out by the Americans, the vision in India was for a United India for all time with no option to the component states to secede. With Pakistan out, the intensity of the peoples' wish was for ever preserving the unity of the rest of India.

The Constitution of India envisaged division of powers between the Union and the States. The old Indian States were also brought under the federal system. It was Sardar Patel's monumental effort that welded the princely India and the rest of India into one. The stress and strain of what were the old Native States, B-States when it had to be associated into a federal pattern with A-States (the old British provinces), C-States (the Chief Commissioner centrally administered areas) and D-States such as Andaman and Nicobar islands, all these required a constitutional set up of a federal type but giving sufficient power to the Centre, sufficient to pull together all these centrifugal and centripetal forces. The hegemony or multiple character of the people of India in their linguistic and religious differences called for a strong centre with defined enumerated powers. The States also were to be given autonomous powers limited by an enumerated States list. There were besides the Concurrent List which enabled both the Centre and the States to legislate, the former having precedence. The residuary powers were necessarily left to the Centre though in effect after such elaboration of three lists there can be hardly anything residuary.

While in America the state territory was unalterable, in India though the unity of India is assured, Parliament can re-organise the states or alter their boundaries (art. 4). This is not at all unfederal. The history and political reasons in India necessitated such a pattern. Linguistic agitation and the old princely states being allowed to be gradually drawn into the federal structure all necessitated such provisions. Now the task of princely states being absorbed is over and even the concept of B-States has vanished with the first constitutional amendment of 1951, Part A and B States now having same characteristics and federal governance. The linguistic urge had been subsequently nearly satiated with the reorganisation of states on a linguistic basis consequent on the States of fourteen States, the classification of States Parts A and B and C disappearing, the old C-States merging into the neighbouring States and States B receiving an equal status with States A. All the states of India are having as their head only Governors appointed by the President of India, the institution of Raja Pramuks being now obsolete. Despite the power to tax, the states have necessarily to look up to the Centre for financial help. In the legislative sphere the Centre has the supremacy particularly during national emergencies. Nevertheless the states are autonomous with their own government, its law-making Legislatures and its own judiciary headed by the High Court; all this is sufficiently federal and if the units have to lean on the centre on certain given occasions, it cannot make the Constitution unitary. In fact, in normal times the Government is federal, while in emergencies, there is a sort of unitary control by the centre.

This is indeed the unique and peculiar feature of Indian Federalism so as to weld together a variety of peoples and keeping intact the Union of India as the paramount objective. A federal pattern as that of America may create a lot of shocks and counter-shocks dissipating the country and the indestructible unity of India into warring units leading to the gradual disintegration of India into weak totalitarian principalities. In underdeveloped countries as India, the American pattern is most unsuitable and we must needs have checks and counter-checks on the federal growth of the Indian people. That is why the Constitution reserves all power to the Parliament to effect territorial changes in the unit. There is, therefore, nothing in vogue in India as the American equality of the states irrespective of their sizes or population. Under the Indian Constitution there is no equality of representation of the States in the Council of States since the creation of the Federal Union was not brought about by any agreement between the component states. The number of members to the Council of States varies from 1 to 31 for the various component States. This is intended to be so since in the political growth States A were more mature than the old States B, C and D. It was for the benefit of the federal union if more representation was given to the former states in the Council of States.

Again on account of the historic origin America yields to the component units the right to determine their own Constitution. For the Constitution of the United States (1787) simply drew up the Constitution of the national government leaving it in the main to the states to continue to preserve their original Constitution, or in the case of new admissions, to draw up their own Constitution or to amend them. But in India we had no such sovereign states to begin with when the Constitution of India was forged. The states were then mere administrative units and so in India as in Canada the Constitution embraces both the Union and the States.

*Again legislation by a state in India is subject to disallowance by the President when reserved by the Governor (art. 201). This is intended to have a sort of control by the federal chief, the President of the Indian Republic. It is with this view that the Governor of a state is appointed by the Union President to hold office during his pleasure (arts. 155-6). These provisions are absent in the U.S.A. or Australia but present in Canada. But this cannot efface the basic federalism of India or Canada. Only the Federation of the latter are more controlled and regulated.

In America national unity with state rights was reconciled by a logical division of everything essential to sovereignty. A dual polity was thus put in vogue such as dual citizenship, duality of officers and a double system of Courts at the federal and state level. But this was not possible in India which was a federal baby with divergent forces pulling and obstructing its future. So, as in Canada, India has only one union citizenship. Though the Union and States have their own public servants there is no clear cut division, one complementing the other in all necessary spheres of work. In the sphere of administration of justice, in India there is but one integrated system for administration of both the Union and State law. This unified system has stood the test of time during the 150 years of British regime and no case was made to bifurcate the Courts into Federal and State. Too much of such division will affect the essential unity of India which is but a hegemony of divergent castes and creeds. A centripetal force was needed to bind together these antifederal phenomena. In America, it was all one people and who were habituated to state sovereignty prior to the forging of the Constitution in 1857.

So the degree of federalism is more of historical growth. What is good for America is not necessarily good for India. A set rigid pattern of federalism will not generally help in the growth of true federalism. The peoples of a country can take in only the required dosage of federalism as is suitable to their growth. Overdosage may stunt or destroy their growth. Federalism is not like the set pattern of coats to wear. It is a cloak of varying organised patterns befitting each wearer and helping him to the next and superior status of federalism. As we analysed earlier even in America we find the centre more powerful than the states. Thus there can be practical difficulty in evolving a truly federal democracy (cent. per cent. and unalloyed). So long as the political consciousness, added by the economic and social factors, is not at a high ebb in the mass of the people, you cannot expect, a truly cent. per cent. federal type of government. Our imperfections are to be cured by a sort of direct or indirect unitary control even in a federal democracy.

Thus the Indian system which in the main presents a federal system for normal times has also the unique achievement of imparting to the federal system the strength of a unitary system in emergencies. As we stated elsewhere what we do directly in India is achieved in America by an indirect dubious method of judicial interpretation during national emergencies.

* As Mr. Durga Das Basu in his commentary on the Constitution of India says:

"But with all the above exceptions our Constitution with its distribution of powers and the duty of Courts to guard that remains normally and basically a Federal Constitution subject to specified exceptions. The exceptions are unique; but in cases where the exceptions are not attached the Federal provisions are to be applied without being influenced by the existence of the exceptions."

In a way Indian federalism enshrines a principle of reconciling federation with nationalism. It is also a compromise between judicial supremacy and parliamentary sovereignty.

Mr. Justice William O. Douglas of America in his 1955 Tagore Law Lectures recognises the clear trend even in America towards "a strong and powerful national government." The impetus for that growth has in part been decisions of the Supreme Court from the time of Chief Justice Marshall to this date. It has in part been the increased use by Congress of the great arsenal of power contained in the Constitution. Powers long neglected e.g. power over inter-state commerce, have been increasingly used by the Congress since the turn of the twentieth century. The increased complexities of American life, the growth of industrialism, the disappearance of the frontier, the increase in population, the growing dependance of one part of the nation on the others—these were all powerful pressures creating the need and demand for federal regulations in fields where previously only the States regulated. The depression of the year 1930 emphasised the need for planning by the Central Government. The advent of two world wars made necessary the close integration of the national economy under the national government and the war powers of the Congress and the President, already mentioned, were ample for that purpose.

Thus we find an admission that modern life necessitated in America a swing back to the unitary pattern as a necessary emergent of federalism in national interests. In India we have a similar problem if not worse—what with its very huge population, want of monetary resources necessitating pooling at the Centre, the dependance of one State on another for its economic growth, the divergent linguistic and parochial forces which create obstacles to federal progress—all these necessitated a strong federal centre. Mr. Justice Douglas pithily adds:

"But India has launched on a vast programme of planning. The blueprints for the New India emanate from Delhi; and they embrace comprehensive programme of reconstruction, rehabilitation and industrialization. The Central Planning may produce in India problems of centralisation that parallel America's. If it does, it will affect the measure of Federalism actually existing. What is written in the constitution and in the reports is not always an accurate reflection of the Society covered by that legal system."

Mr. Justice Douglas has thus admitted that American centralism is high shadowing its federalism in national interests. India should copy America. This is his wish. But Mr. Justice Douglas adds:

"But as the trend towards centralisation continues, the need for safeguarding the rights and opportunities for home rule increases. America cannot be run and managed from Washington D. C. alone. And if experience is a teacher, India too will flourish only if local Governments are strong and independent."

So it is necessary to yield a great measure of local autonomy to the states though the central federal power is made strong in national interests. This is what the Indian Constitution does. It is possible that the states can be given more power by conventions and non-interference by the centre. The latter's powers should be used only when national interests and emergencies necessitate the same.

On the question of dual system of Courts, Mr. Justice Douglas says:

"The Dual system is in many respects cumbersome, expensive and productive of delay in the administration of justice. The Australian and Indian systems have much to be said for them. But the American system is part of the price we pay for federalism. That Federalism is quite different constitutionally from either Australia's or India's. It has presented difficulties and perplexities that the other Federal systems have not experienced."

These are indeed pregnant words, which the 'quasi federal' protagonists may ponder over. India's federalism is unique and good for itself. It is sufficiently federal. America's federalism is not so perfect as it is stated to be. It has got its own drawbacks.

The interpretative role of a Judge in America whether he is a federalist or a staunch states' fighter, is paramount. The judicial trend of interpretation in America has always leaned towards federal and national interests.

So we may conclude that the Indian Constitution is mainly federal with unique safeguards for enforcing national unity and growth. It is no less federal basically than America. America's federalism, while on paper is of a higher degree, in actual practice the leaning is towards centralisation in national interests. So the legal quibble for such a term as 'quasi federal' has no justification at all. The term 'quasi' is a misnomer. India is federal and America more federal in the outlines of the Constitution. That is all that could be said. In practice there is not much difference between any two sets of federal countries, except that which is unique to her constitutional and historical growth. America while more federal on paper, in practice it conserves and assumes all the power for the centre. India has a clean cut outline with no such doubtful moorings. She possesses a unique federal Constitution. Federal in normal times and tending to be unitary in emergencies, it is by no means unfederal or quasi federal, if the latter term implies something not federal or not nearly federal. You may call it if you want 'federal convertible'.

NEGLIGENT INJURY TO DOMESTIC RELATIONS

It is a fine tribute to the adaptability of our legal system that the principles of the law relating to the granting of damages for negligent interference with domestic relations should have been reconsidered a good half-dozen times since they were "settled" by the House of Lords in Best v. Samuel Fox & Co. Ltd. ([1952] 2 All E.R. 394). In the most recent of these reconsiderations, McNeill v. Johnstone, ([1958] 3 All E.R. 16), Devlin J., showed the ease with which the Courts can recompense "sympathetic" claims and still draw the lines of remoteness clearly in the individual case. In assessing this case, the present writer will survey a number of developments in this field and consider the position which the Courts have now reached.

The facts of McNeill v. Johnstone present no unusual difficulty but one or two points of novelty. The plaintiffs, husband and wife, were a United States Air Force officer and his French wife who had been injured by the defendant's negligence in a road accident in this country. To save hospital expenses, the husband sent his wife to a U.S. military hospital over 150 miles from their home (and the husband's base) at the time. Obtaining a month's leave without pay, he then visited his wife in the hospital, sometimes staying in an hotel in the vicinity, occupying bachelor's quarters attached to the hospital or returning home on other business. Their claim for special damages (the wife's general damages being admitted)—one month's salary, travelling expenses and hotel bills—the learned Judge allowed by half, ascribing the other half of the expenses incurred to the husband's business trips. These, he pointed out, were not sufficiently connected with the defendant's negligence to be within the bounds of compensation.

It is now clear that the Courts will not normally grant damages merely for the loss of the "companionship" attributes of consortium. The House of Lords made this clear in Best v. Samuel Fox & Co., Ltd. where, as a result of the defendants' negligence, the sexual capacity of the plaintiff's husband was destroyed and their Lordships refused to grant damages for such loss as this caused the wife. Similarly, in Lampert v. Eastern National Omnibus Co. Ltd., ([1954] 2 All E.R. 719), Hilbery J., refused a wife's action on the ground that the defendants' negligence in injuring her and her husband's subsequent withdrawal from the home were not causally connected. In such cases, only the medical expenses directly incurred and such outgoings as the cost of temporary domestic help will be recoverable (see Best v. Samuel Fox & Co., Ltd. per Lord Goddard, C.J., at p. 399, per Lord Porter, at p. 396; Kirkham v. Boughey, [1957] 3 All E.R. 153, 156, per Diplock J.).

Both these cases involved actions by wives, of course, but even had the plaintiffs been husbands, the observable policy is still away from granting damages for other than actual economic loss (cf. the writer's article "Injuries to Consortium in Modern Anglo-American Law" (1958) 7 I.C.L.Q. 417, at pp. 430-436).

Where the companionship element in consortium has some exceptional importance in the particular case, however, the Courts have been only too willing to recognise that it can have some financial counterpart. In cases such as the three most recent on this subject, the particular problem has been one of whether a husband can be compensated when he has stayed away from his employment until his wife has recovered from her injuries. In Behrens v. Bertram Mills Circus, Ltd. ([1957] 1 All E.R. 583), the plaintiff was a circus midget whose wife, also a midget and in fact his stage-partner, had been injured as a result of the defendants' failure to keep a performing elephant under control. Devlin, J., held that it would have been unreasonable for the husband to have gone on tour while his wife was unable to accompany him in view of their peculiar physical interdependence. When, as a result, he stayed in their caravan-home to enjoy her company until she had fully recovered, the Court reimbursed him his lost potential earnings for this period. So, in McNeill v. Johnstone, the fact that the plaintiff-wife was French and had only been in England for some two months gave her husband greater occasion to be constantly with her. Where the bounds of "peculiar dependence" will be drawn, of course, we do not know: it could well cover every variety of emotional relationship known to husband and wife and lead away from the 1952 refusal to assess consortium in terms of pounds and shillings. (Had the damage been purely to business interests, rather than domestic, the husbands would not have been able to recover either as partners (Burgess v. Florence Nightingale Hospital for Gentlewomen [1955] 1 All E.R. 511), or as employers (Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Hambrook [1956] All E.R. 338).

Later in 1957 came Kirkham v. Boughey, in which the fact-situation closely resembled that of McNeill v. Johnstone. There, the husband refused to return to his position in Nigeria but insisted on staying in this country to be near his injured wife. As a result, he was compelled to take employment at a substantially lower salary but Diplock, J. refused to allow him his lost earnings as special damages. His claim, the learned Judge pointed out, was not based on loss of consortium, on the expenditure of money as part of the duty of maintenance (hospital expenses and visits) or on any hypothetical duty of care owed to the husband qua husband. It was, in fact, damnum absque injuria. Diplock, J., distinguished Behrens v. Bertram Mills Circus, Ltd. by pointing out that the sum there claimed (£170 after deductions for other items) was so small that had the husband actually gone on tour, the cost of hiring domestic help together with the damages for loss of consortium would have exceeded the earnings lost by staying at home. If so, he concluded, the proper step to take was to mitigate damages by staying away from work.

In McNeill v. Johnstone, however, on a basically similar set of facts, Devlin, J., found himself compelled to explain a point of difference between his reasoning and that of Diplock, J.—a difference which really goes to the ultimate object of the law of torts. Liability having been established or admitted, the assessment of damages must be on the basis that the plaintiff is to be "put in the same position, so far as money can do it, as if the wrong had not been done to him" ([1958] 3 All E.R., at p. 19). Starting from this obligation to compensate, therefore, Devlin, J., examined the alternatives: the plaintiff (i) could have had his wife treated nearer their home and then claimed the hospital fees from the defendant, or (ii) he could have had her treated in the U.S.A.F. hospital, not travelled to see her and claimed damages for the loss of her consortium, or (iii) he could have behaved as in fact he did and claimed his lost earnings, and the expenses of hospital visits. In all the circumstances, the third course of action was no more unreasonable than either of the other two and since they would have yielded compensation, the third should do the same.

- A number of points arise from a comparison of these two cases. In both of them, different criteria are used to measure the remoteness of the loss incurred and it is interesting to note that, had the McNeill criterion been applied to Kirkham's case, the plaintiff may well have recovered his lost earnings as an alternative to his potential claim for lost consortium, despite Devlin, J.'s claims to the contrary. The point is that neither test—the “least-financial-loss” standard by which Diplock, J. explained Behrens v. Bertram Mills Circus, Ltd., or the “alternative-to-consortium” suggestion of Devlin, J.—can be adequate by themselves. First, if we are to ask simply which course of action cuts down the expenses incurred, we will be using an ex post facto criterion—completely disregarding the unpredictability of potential losses and the impossibility of making an accurate choice of the most mitigating course of action. Just as important, this test can take no account of the human desirability of the alternative actions or of the peculiar situations of dependence which may arise (see above). In cases like this, perhaps a bald financial determination of which was the wiser course to take may do no justice at all to the relative emotional conflicts involved.

Secondly, though, the “recompense-at-all-costs” attitude of McNeill cannot be fitted into the general legal picture very satisfactorily. Although in that particular case all alternative courses would have yielded comparable amounts, there will often be no factual relation between the size of the earnings forgone and potential damages for lost consortium. So although the claims may be alternatives by coincidence in some cases, in many instances (see, e.g., Behrens v. Bertram Mills Circus, Ltd.; Kirkham v. Boughey) they will be completely unconnected.

The writer would suggest instead a rephrasing of the test in terms common to the whole law of torts—whether or not the plaintiff's mitigation of his losses by temporarily giving up work was reasonable in the circumstances. Then, although a comparison of actual cash values would play an important part in assessing “reasonableness” retrospectively, the Courts would always have to consider the extent of the plaintiff's knowledge of the situation at the time he acted: peculiar need of husband for wife (or vice versa), the frequency of visits as related to the seriousness of the injury, the most suitable time to recommence work (remembering that the health of the patient rather than the pleasure of the visitor should be the primary concern: see [1957] 3 All E.R., at pp. 156-157). In no case need there be any estimate of the value of the consortium for purposes of comparison or otherwise but the simple consideration of the subjective reasonableness of the husband's intervention. Even the hypothetical possibility of total resignation in order to comfort an ailing wife will, of course, have to be weighed in the same scales: those of reasonableness. Which, of course, may perhaps lead to fairness—but not to predictability!—L.J.

PERJURY: CIVIL LIABILITY

At the end of the Trinity term Lord Goddard, C.J., held in Hargreaves v. Bretherton ([1958] 3 All E.R. 122) that an action for damages for perjury will not lie at the suit of a person alleged to have been damnified by false evidence given against him. Much old authority was quoted for the proposition that perjury did not provide a cause of action for damages; thus, in Damport v. Sympson ([1596] 2 Cro. Eliz. 520) the Court said that, there being no precedent, it was good argument that the action would not lie, and in Eyres v. Sedgewicks ([1620] 2 Cro. Jac. 601) the Court put the matter on the ground of public convenience and policy. To come to more modern times, in Watson v. McEwan ([1905] A.C., at p. 486) Lord Halsbury, L.C., stated it to be settled law that "the remedy against a witness who had given evidence which is false and injurious to another is to indict him for perjury", and his Lordship went on to say that the conduct of legal procedure by the Courts involved, of necessity, the immunity of witnesses from actions being brought against them in respect of the evidence they had given. The plaintiff in the case here under review relied on equally respectable authority showing (Coke's Inst. III c. 74) that an action could have been brought in the Star Chamber by way of civil remedy for damages, and that in Lord Ellenborough's view in Amey v. Long ([1807] 1 Camp. 14) an action for damages would lie collaterally with a prosecution. Lord Goddard, C.J., in his judgment conceded that the passage in Coke's Institutes had given rise to argument, but there was no point in going into the history of the legislation since there was modern authority on the matter and although the point had been raised as long ago as the reign of Elizabeth I there was no case in which the action had been held to lie. As Jarvis, C.J., had pointed out in Revis v. Smith ([1856] 18 C.B. 126), it would be most inconvenient if an action for damages for alleged perjury, could be brought, when no one had been convicted of perjury, merely on the allegation of a person who said that perjury had been committed by which he had been damnified. Whether it is really desirable that a person who commits a deliberate act of falsehood in the course of legal proceedings should be exempted from any civil liability is a question which is, perhaps, not easy to answer; but whatever view is taken, the old authorities should not, we think, stand in the way of a fresh assessment of the problem.—L.J.

"HOUSEHOLD"

THIS word is important in many different connections. An obvious example is a gift in a will to the testator's "household servant," but its interpretation is of consequence in other ways and s. 269(5) of the Public Health Act, 1936, may be referred to by way of illustration. Section 269 empowers local authorities to control the use of movable dwellings, but sub-s. (5) provides that it shall not apply to a case where the movable dwelling is kept by its owner on land which he occupies in connection with his dwelling-house and is used for habitation by "members of his household." Who are the "members of his household"?

Re Draz; Savile v. Yeatman (1887), 57 L.T. 475, may supply an answer to this question. A testator bequeathed six months' wages to each of his "household servants" who should have been in his service for one year previously to his death. The problem arose as to the meaning of the words "household servants" and Kay, J., found that they meant "the testator's servants who formed part of his household—that is to say, who boarded in the mansion house and took their meals there at the expense of the testator." His Lordship concluded that the testator's coachmen and grooms, who did not board in the house, were not included in the gift as they were not members of his "household."

It seems that the term "household" may only apply to an establishment of which the person in question is the head. This follows from English v. Western [1940] 2 K.B. 156 where a policy of motor insurance excluded inability in the event, inter alia, of injury to any member of "the assured's household." The assured, a boy of seventeen, caused injury to his sister (they both lived with their father) in an accident and the clause referred to, which was found to be ambiguous, was construed contra proferentes as meaning any member of the household of which he (the assured) was head. The sister was not, therefore, a member of "the assured's household." Wawanssea Mutual Insurance Co. v. Bell [1957] S.O.B. 581 was a very similar case. The Supreme Court of Canada was asked to interpret a policy of motor insurance which expressly excluded liability in respect of the driving by the insured of any automobile owned by "any person or persons of the household of which the insured is a member." The insured lived with an elder brother and while he was driving his brother's car he caused injury to another. Evidence established that the insured paid board to his brother, that his stay with him was of a temporary character, that he was not under the control of his brother and that it could not be said that he shared any responsibility of a householder. The Court decided that the insured was not a member of his brother's household and for that reason the policy extended to the risk.

In the course of his judgment Rand, J., distinguished between a person "of" a household and a person "in" a household. Although the insured was not a member "of" his brother's household, like the uncle in Home Insurance Co. v. Pettit (1932), 143 S. 839, who was temporarily a guest in the home of the insured's father, he may well have been "in" it during the period of his stay.

The word "household" is also important when used in a rather different sense. The meaning of the word "furniture" was considered at 102 Sol. J. 767, but what passes under a gift of "household furniture" or "household goods" (terms which appear to be synonymous) or "household effects"? Household furniture or goods would seem to include all personal chattels which contribute to the use or convenience of the householder in the house (Nicholls v. Osborn [1727], 2 P. Wms. 419) or to the ornament of the dwelling (Field v. Peckett (No. 2) [1861], 30 L.J. Ch. 813) but not such things as victuals, guns and pistols used in riding or shooting game. The clock of the house falls within the expression "household goods" if it is not a fixture (Slanning v. Style [1734], 3 P. Wms. 334).

The term "household effects" receives a much wider interpretation. For example, in Re Wavertree; Rutherford v. Hall-Walker [1933] 1 Ch. 837 a bequest of "household effects" was held to pass motor cars, consumable stores, garden implements and tools and movable plants and in Johnston v. Doak [1953] V.L.R. 678 it was decided that a similar gift included a motor car. In that case Lowe, A.-C.J., found that "the natural meaning of household effects confirms, that without more all household property used or intended to be used in the ordinary operation of her home is included in the expression used by the deceased."

A bequest of "all my household and personal furniture and effects" may also pass a motor car. This was decided in Re Liverton [1954] N.Z.L.R. 612 but, as Gresson, J., remarked, "every case must be considered upon the facts and circumstances of the case; no two are identical."—S.J.

NEW MILK AND DAIRIES REGULATIONS

THE Milk and Dairies (General) Regulations, S.I. 1959 No. 277, which came into operation on March 8, bring the former regulations up to date in the light of modern methods of milk production. Much of the existing procedure is simplified, so facilitating the production, handling and distribution of milk in up-to-date hygienic conditions. The changes made by the new regulations include modification of the registration required of a milk distributor who now has to be registered only with the local authority in whose area the premises from which the milk is distributed are situated: provision for payment of compensation by a local authority to a person sustaining damage or loss through being debarred from certain employment connected with milk because he is or has been in contact with a sufferer from a disease liable to cause infection of milk: widening of conditions for payment of compensation to farmers in connection with the serving of an infected milk notice, such a notice concerning tuberculosis now remaining in force until withdrawn instead of requiring renewal every twenty-four hours: when engaged in milking cows or in handling milk in open containers persons are now required to wear clean and washable overalls and head covering: open cuts and abrasions must be covered with a waterproof dressing and spitting and use of tobacco are prohibited: milk vessels and appliances must be cleansed in a place where they are not liable to become contaminated and certain exemptions are granted in respect of bottles effectively cleansed in a bottle-washing machine: in certain circumstances suitable and properly trapped internal drains are permitted in a milking house not used for the housing of cows, and the Minister may permit milk to be cooled in a closed container in a milking house not used for the housing of cows which are machine-milked and where the milk passes direct to the churn in which it will be cooled.—S.J.

The Trial of August Sangret. By MACDONALD CRITCHLEY, M.D. LONDON: William Hodge & Co. Ltd. 1959. Demi 8vo. Pages xxxiv+233. Price: 18s.

THIS is an account of the murder trial of one August Sangret, a Canadian soldier of mixed blood. He murdered a girl of nineteen years of age who had drifted from one job to another. She was of a remarkable character, for although loose in morals, she was comparatively well-read and of considerable religious convictions. Sangret killed the girl stabbing her with a knife and smashing her head with a birch stake. This trial is of considerable medical interest, especially in the reconstruction of the skull from many small fragments of bones. It draws attention to the illiteracy of many of the troops, and portrays a vivid picture of camp followers and their strange life. Sangret was convicted and duly hanged. The characters of the chief actors hold attention of the reader throughout.

Supreme Court Digest of Labour Law Cases. By V. B. KHER. BOMBAY: Thacker & Company Limited, Rampart Row, Fort. 1959. Demi 8vo. Pages xv+259. Price: Rs. 12.

THIS is a digest of Labour Law Cases decided by the Supreme Court of India. The Supreme Court does not seat as a regular Court of Appeal over Industrial Tribunals, but it has extraordinary powers to grant to aggrieved parties special leave to appeal from the decision of any inferior Tribunal. Parties aggrieved by the decisions of Industrial Tribunals approach the Supreme Court and this has resulted in developing the case law on the subject. The decisions embodied in this volume enunciate principles and lay down norms by which all sections of the industry must govern themselves. They also serve as useful pointers for guidance to the adjudicators. Copious extracts from judgments have been given. The subject head notes have been alphabetically arranged so that on a given point it is possible to know what the Court has said. Decisions reported upto January, 1959, have been included in the body of the book. This book is sure to prove useful to those who have to deal with labour legislation in any capacity.

The Sale of Flats. By EDWARD F. GEORGE, LL.B. LONDON: Sweet & Maxwell Limited, 2 & 3 Chancery Lane. Second Edition. 1959. Demi 8vo. Pages xxiv+222. Price: 27s. 6d.

IN this book, which is first of its kind, the learned author deals with all aspects of flat sales. A new edition of this book became necessary owing to changes in the law. Several statutes made changes which necessitated the entire revision of the first edition. A fresh chapter dealing with co-operative flat scheme has been newly added. The utility of a work of this kind cannot be gainsaid.

DOCTRINE OF DUAL OWNERSHIP OF BUILDING LEASES UNDER THE 'BOMBAY RENTS ACT OF 1947.*

RECENTLY, interesting controversies regarding the right of the occupant of the building owned by the tenants and constructed on the plots of the landlords have led to the discussion of recognition of the Doctrine of Dual Ownership of property under the Act. The Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, does not directly deal with it. We have s. 5(8) defining "premises" as meaning, amongst others, any land not being used for agricultural purposes and Part II, dealing with the applicability of the Act to "premises" let out for residence etc. Section 15 of the Act prohibits transfer or assignment or sub-letting, except to the extent to which the transfer etc., is saved by the Notifications issued by the Government, under the proviso of the section. None of the Notifications issued so far, deals with a normal case of a tenant taking a plot on lease for building purposes and constructing a building and letting out the same to other tenants.

The first occasion for deciding a case, not covered by the Notifications under s. 15, arose in Vinayak Gopal v. Laxman Kashinath,¹ in which it was held that the mere fact that the plot cannot be used for residence, unless it is built upon, is no ground for excluding the plot out of s. 6(1) of the Rent Act. At page 596 his Lordship, Gajendragadkar J. observed

"...Prima facie, it appears to be reasonable that, just as the building constructed by the lessee, when let for residence, attracts the provisions of the Act, the open plot on which the building is erected for the purpose of letting it out for residence according to the terms of the original lease should also be regarded as constituting premises let out for residence. The right of residence is exercised both in regard to building and with regard to the open plot on which the building stands. In a sense, the open plot and the building constructed on it are so inextricably joined together that it would be idle to contend that it is only the building which is used for residence and not the open plot. The premises which are let for residence to the actual occupants would, therefore, include, not only the building, but also the land on which the building stands;..."

It is interesting to note that in this case it was also held that the occupant of the building would not become a sub-tenant and s. 15 would not be violated; the reasoning was (p. 597):

"...When a builder lets out a building to his tenants, technically he is not leasing out the open plot which has been let to him by the lessor, but he is letting out the structure built by him. If it is permissible to draw a distinction between the open plot which is the subject-matter of the first lease and the building which is the subject-matter of the second lease, then s. 15 may not affect the rights of actual occupants let in by the builder of the building. No doubt, this distinction may appear to be technical and notional; but...some of the unusual features which building leases of this kind disclose are inevitable result of the doctrine of dual ownership recognised under the Indian Law."

This doctrine of dual ownership has no room for operation, it appears, in a case where under an agreement between the lessor and the lessee, the lessee constructs the building at his own costs but agrees that the ownership of the building shall vest in the lessor. In Bhatia Co-operative Society v. Patel,² the Supreme Court had an occasion to consider the applicability of the Rent Act to the plot or premises. In this case, the plot belonged to the Local Authority and was exempt from the operation of the Act, under s. 41(1) of the Act. It was leased out for constructing a building under an agreement that the building on completion would belong to the Local Authority. The building was constructed by the lessee at his own costs, as per terms of the agreement, and a portion of it was leased out to a tenant. In a suit for ejectment filed by the original lessee against the occupants of the building, the question arose, whether the building was exempt from the Rent Act and it was held that it was, because it belonged to the Local Authority i.e. original lessor of the plot. This decision of the Supreme Court was cited before their Lordships in Vinayak Gopal's case cited above and an argument was raised that in a case like this, where the plot and the building both vest in the lessor, the occupants of the premises let in by the lessee would fall within the mischief of s. 15; but it was rejected in the following terms (p. 597):

"...It would be noticed that this is a special type of case where the duality of ownership can have no play...and perhaps the question as to whether s. 15 would apply to the leases executed in favour of the occupants may have to be considered when it arises. But if it is held that the rights of the occupants... are hit by s. 15, it would not be difficult for the State Government to protect the tenants' rights by issuing appropriate notification under the relevant provisions of ss. 2 and 6 of the Act."

So far, no notification covering a case like this appears to have been issued by the Government. But a more interesting situation arose in a very recent pronouncement of the Supreme Court in Dr. K. A. Dhairyan v. J. R. Thakur.³ In this case, a parcel of land was leased out by the lessor to the lessee for twenty-one years, under an agreement that the lessee should construct a building on the land at the cost of Rs. 10,000 or more, within six months from the date of lease, and on the termination of the lease, either at the end of twenty-one years or earlier, the lessee had to surrender the possession including the building to lessor, without any compensation. The lessee constructed the building and let out the same to tenants. On the expiry of the term of the lease, the original lessor sued for a declaration against his lessee that he was entitled to the building, possession of the same, and receive rent of the same. The lessee's defence was that the lessor was not entitled to the declaration sought, but only to the rent of the land as per original lease to which the Rent Act applied. It was common ground that the land on which the building stood was protected by the Rent Act. Upon the construction of the terms of the lease, it was found that what was demised was only the land to the lessee and not the building. It was also found that none of the clauses of the lease positively stated that the building to be erected on the demised land would be of the ownership of the lessor and that the building would be deemed to have been leased to the lessee along with the demised land. It was found that on a proper construction of the lease, the ownership of the building was with the lessee, in which the lessor had no right while the lease subsisted. But it was held that it was open to the lessee by a special contract to hand over the building to the lessor without any compensation at the end of the term of the lease. Since the term of the lease had expired the Supreme Court granted the declaration in favour of the lessor as prayed for. It is rather interesting to note the arguments put forward against the lessor. Firstly, it was urged that even if there had been no demise of the building, possession of it could not be awarded to the lessor until the lease had been determined, which in law, it was argued, could not be determined so long as the lessee could not be evicted from the demised land of which he was a tenant within the meaning of the Rent Act and of which he became a statutory tenant. But this argument was rejected in the following terms:

"The Rent Act does not provide for the continuation of the lease beyond the specified period stated therein and all that the Act does is to give to the person, who continues to remain in possession, although the period of the lease has come to an end, the status of a statutory tenant."

In passing, it may be observed, that for all practical purposes, however, when a tenant becomes a statutory tenant, he holds on the same terms as before, and the Rent Act superimposes a disability on the landlord to claim possession, except on the grounds enumerated in the Act. The main difficulty was that the lessee was the statutory tenant of the land and the building, which was not demised, was on the very land. To recall the observations of his Lordship, Gajendragadkar J., in Vinayak's case, cited above, the open plot and the building constructed on it, are so inextricably joined together, that it would be idle to contend that it is only the building which is used for residence and not the land. If so, here was a case, where so far as the land was concerned, admittedly, the tenant enjoyed the protection of the Rent Act. But it was held that the defence did not hold good against the lessor, although the enjoyment of the building cannot be conceived apart from the enjoyment of the land beneath.

The second argument put forward against the lessor was that he could not get the declaration because he could not realise the rent, without entering upon the land on which the building had been constructed. It was rejected on a short ground that the lessor had not claimed a declaration to that effect. It is significant to note that their Lordships have nowhere suggested in this case that on account of specific agreement by the lessee to hand over the building to the lessor, the statutory right of the lessee in respect of the land beneath, had become extinct. On the contrary, the case is decided on the admitted basis, that the tenant continued to enjoy the protection of the Rent Act, in respect of the land. If so, can we dismiss the query of the tenant as unjust or irrelevant, if he were to say,

"while on the one hand, you have conceded my right to the land as a statutory tenant you have rendered it ineffective or illusory, by granting a declaration to the lessor that he is entitled to the rent of the building, on the other, although the enjoyment of the building cannot be conceived independent of the enjoyment of the land."

This indeed is a troublesome question difficult to answer in theory. There is no room for the operation of the doctrine of merger either in such a case.

It is respectfully submitted that in view of the present case law suitable amendments in s. 4, s. 15 and the introduction of an additional section by the Legislature, with a view to precisely regulate the rights of the parties in such cases, may be useful.

SECTION 113 OF THE BOMBAY LOCAL BOARDS ACT, 1923, AND CIVIL REVISION APPLICATIONS.*

In various Acts concerning local bodies remedy against the quantum of taxation is provided by way of an appeal to a Magistrate. In the Bombay Local Boards Act, 1923, that provision is made in s. 113. In the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, that provision is made at s. 110⁽¹⁾ and in the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, that is provided at s. 86⁽²⁾. These provisions in different Acts are very similar to each other and eventually some times they lead to an erroneous impression in respect of further remedies against the decision of the Magistrate. The subject of the present article is the remedy allowed at the High Court of Bombay of Civil Revision Application as directed against the decision of a Magistrate acting under s. 113 of the Bombay Local Boards Act.

* By Kusumkant D. Bhate.

Firstly, it may be mentioned that a Magistrate sitting as an appeal authority under s. 113 of the Local Boards Act, though a Judicial Magistrate, is not an inferior Criminal Court for the purposes of ss. 435, 438 and 439 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and it has been held¹ that no remedy by way of a criminal revision application is available against his decision. Further it may be noted that proceedings before a Magistrate in general under the local bodies Acts in a taxation appeal are in the nature of a civil proceeding. But it has been held² that a Magistrate acting under the provisions of s. 86 of the District Municipal Act (before amendment and addition of s. 86(2) and 86(A)) is not a civil Court but is a persona designata and as such no civil revision application lies against his decision to the High Court under the provisions of s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code.

A change in law has been effected especially in respect of Municipal Acts by addition of s. 110(3) and 111(1) to the Municipal Boroughs Act, and s. 86(2) and 86(A) to the District Municipal Act whereby a special remedy of revision is provided to the District Court against the decision of the Magistrate who is acting respectively under the provisions of s. 110(1) and s. 86(2) of the said Acts. By course of judicial decisions it has been held³ and the ratio decidendi of these decisions is that the District Court acting as a revisional authority over the decision of the Magistrate is a Civil Court and hence the High Court has jurisdiction to interfere with his decision under the provisions of s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code. Consequently, revision applications against the decision of the District Court in this behalf are proceeded with as civil revision applications and as this remedy under s. 115 is available there has been no occasion under the said Municipal Acts to invoke the provisions of arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India and no special civil applications are filed in this behalf. It may also be mentioned that these proceedings though initially against the order of a Judicial Magistrate are treated as matters on the civil side.⁴

At this stage it may be observed that in the Bombay Local Boards Act there is no provision of revision against the decision of a Magistrate acting under s. 113 of the Act, as there is no parallel provision in the Bombay Local Boards Act similar to ss. 110(3) and 111(1) of the Municipal Boroughs Act and ss. 86(2) and 86(A) of the District Municipal Act, providing special remedy of revision to the District Court. It is, therefore, evident that there can be no remedy to the District Court by way of revision under the Local Boards Act. Consequently there is no further question of the High Court sitting in revision over the decision of the District Court (which alone can be treated as a subordinate civil Court). The Magistrate acting under s. 113 of the Bombay Local Boards Act is decidedly a persona designata and no remedy to the High Court against his decision appears to be available under the provisions of s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code.

Reverting over to the main theme which arises out of certain directions in the unreported decision of Special Civil Application No. 2526 of 1955 filed in the High Court and the necessary facts of which are narrated at the reported case of *District Local Board, W.K. v. Kutuballi*⁵ (which was the same case as that of Special Civil Application No. 2526 of 1955 and which was converted into a C.R.A.). The facts of this case are that the Judicial Magistrate at Shahada acting under s. 113 of the Local Boards Act gave some decision against the Local Board of West Khandesh. The Local Board thereupon filed a criminal revision application under s. 435 of the Criminal Procedure Code in the Court of the Sessions Judge of West Khandesh alleging that the provisions of s. 113 of the Local Boards Act provides appeal only against the demand notice and the appeal was not competent before the Magistrate as admittedly no demand notice in that case was issued and hence the Magistrate was not competent to hear the appeal and that he had acted without jurisdiction. The Additional Sessions Judge who heard the petition did hold that under s. 113 of the Local Boards Act an appeal to a Magistrate without demand notice was not competent but also held that the Magistrate so acting was not an inferior criminal Court within the meaning of s. 435 of the Criminal Procedure Code and hence he rejected the Local Board's revision petition. Against this decision the Local Board filed the above mentioned Special Civil Application No. 2526 of 1955 wherein the High Court gave direction that the Local Board might file a civil revision application against the order of the Magistrate himself. The following is quoted in that behalf from District Local Board, W.K. v. Kutuballi (p. 1236) :—

"From this decision of the learned Additional Sessions Judge, West Khandesh, the Local Board approached the High Court by way of an application under arts. 228 and 227 of the Constitution of India. That application was heard by a Division Bench of this Court consisting of the learned Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Dixit. It was Special Civil Application No. 2526 of 1955. The learned Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Dixit upheld the view taken by the learned Additional Sessions Judge, West Khandesh, and held that under the Bombay Local Boards Act no criminal revision application lay from an order passed in appeal under s. 113. While passing this order the High Court directed that the Local Board might file a civil revision application, wherein they might challenge the order made by the learned Judicial Magistrate, First Class, Shahada, in the appeal decided by him under s. 113 of the Act."

It may further be mentioned that the matter thereafter was proceeded further as a Civil Revision Application No. 1822 of 1955 and the application was allowed as is reported at 60 Bom.L.R. 1235.

After the decision of Special Civil Application No. 2526 of 1955, application matters directed against the decision of the Magistrate acting under s. 113 of the Bombay Local Boards Act are filed and proceeded with as civil revision applications as under the provisions of s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code.

In view of the earlier cited cases it is the accepted view that civil revision under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code is not available against the order of the Magistrate and that, that remedy is available only against the decision of the District Court, as the District Court has been held as a subordinate civil Court.

No remedy of revision by a special provision in the Local Boards Act is provided to the District Court and consequently the remedy of civil revision application to High Court under s. 115 cannot become available. It appears that at the stage of the decision of the Special Civil Application No. 2526 of 1955 it was not made clear to their Lordships that there is no provision in the Bombay Local Boards Act similar to s. 110(3) and s. 111(1) of the Municipal Boroughs Act. Even then it still remains that the civil revision application was directed against the order of the Magistrate himself. With great respect, it may be mentioned that the directions of their Lordships in Special Civil Application No. 2526 of 1955 ought to have been to file a Special Civil Application against the order of the Magistrate and the direction of their Lordships to file a civil revision application against the Order of the Magistrate and the implications thereof are in direct conflict with the earlier decisions of the High Court referred to above and hence the said decision of Special Civil Application No. 2526 of 1955 and its implications which are further ratified by the decision reported at 60 Bom.L.R. 1235 need to be reconsidered.

GLEANINGS.

INSULTING CONDUCT

SOME of our readers will have noticed in the Press not long ago a charge against two men of insulting conduct likely to cause a breach of the peace, contrary to the Public Order Act, 1936, s. 5. The men had been walking along a street with paint pots and brushes with the idea, apparently, of painting some slogan or other words on the house of Mr. John Stonehouse, M.P. A police constable knew in advance of their intention and stopped them as they were about to start work on the house. The magistrate before whom they were brought commended the constable for preventing the crime but dismissed the charge on the ground that, since the men had done nothing insulting as yet, they had not been guilty of any conduct likely to provoke a breach of the peace. It would be hard on painters if merely carrying their tools of trade were likely to result in a charge being brought against them! It is possible, however, that a charge of attempting to commit malicious damage could have been brought on the analogy of R. v. Taylor, (1859) 1 F. & F. 511. In that case Taylor had knelt down by a hayrick and struck a match intending to fire it, but, on noticing that he was being watched, he blew out the match and desisted from his attempt. It was held that he was rightly convicted of attempting to set fire to the rick.—S.J.

SERVANT INJURED ON ANOTHER'S PREMISES

A MASTER'S duty to his servant includes a duty to make the master's premises where the servant works as safe as reasonable care can make them (Taylor v. Sims [1942] 2 All E.R. 375). This is not a warranty of safety but it is a higher duty than the duty of an invitor to an invitee because in the case of an invitee it is a defence to prove that the matter complained of was obvious. In the case of a servant injured on his master's premises, although knowledge of the danger may have some influence on the question of contributory negligence, it is not a defence (Smith v. Baker [1891] A.C. 325).

It is probable that the above rule is not substantially affected by the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957. Section 5 of that Act lays down that the common duty of care ("to take such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable to see that the visitor will be reasonably safe in using the premises for the purposes for which he is invited or permitted by the occupier to be there": s. 2(2)), is owed to persons who enter premises in exercise of a right conferred by contract. It seems clear that a servant has a right to enter his master's premises by virtue of his contract of services and does so enter thereby. By s. 2(5) it is laid down that the common duty of care does not impose on an occupier any obligation to a visitor in respect of risks willingly accepted as his by the visitor (the question whether a risk was so accepted to be decided on the same principles as in other cases in which one person owes a duty of care to another). This provision is a specific provision related to the general provision of s. 2(4) to the effect that in determining whether the occupier of premises has discharged the common duty of care to a visitor, regard is to be had to all the circumstances of the case. Consequently, in the case of master and servant, it seems that the principles affecting the defences open to a master will be the same as they are now.

Servant on another's premises

Different considerations apply where the servant is working at the premises of another person. It has been held that in such circumstances the servant is an invitee of the third party and that the duty which the master owes in respect of his own premises is not owed by the master in respect of the invitor's premises (see dictum in Cilia v. James [1954] 1 W.L.R. 721). This makes a considerable difference to the remedies available to the servant since if he knows of a danger such knowledge will be a defence to the invitor whereas it would not be one to a master in respect of his own premises (London Graving Dock Co. v. Horton [1951] A.C. 737 (H.L.)).

This is not to say that the master owes no duty to the servant in respect of the premises of other persons at which the servant has to work: he must "lay out the work" properly so that, for example, an employer of window cleaners must see that proper appliances are used by the cleaners having regard to the nature and condition of the premises the windows of which they are required to clean (Drummond v. British Building Cleaners, Ltd. [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1434 (C.A.)).

Third party employing independent contractors

The common-law position is not likely to be substantially affected by the Occupiers' Liability Act in regard to the above point, but in one respect there is a change: in Thomson v. Cremin, [1956] 1 W.L.R. 103 (H.L.), it was held that the occupier of premises as an invitor of another's servant who is working on his premises, is responsible for the negligence of persons who are, as regards the occupier, independent contractors and whose acts caused injury to the workman. By virtue of s. 2(4)(b) the occupier is not to be liable without more if in all the circumstances he had acted reasonably in entrusting the work to an independent contractor and had taken such steps as he reasonably ought in order to satisfy himself that the contractor was competent and had done the work properly.

A recent case

A recent decision on the problem arising where a servant is injured on the premises of another is Smith v. Austin Lifis, Ltd., and Others [1959] 1 W.L.R. 100. The accident occurred before the coming into force of the Act so that the old common law governed the case. It concerned a fitter whose job required him to service lifts. One of his jobs required him to visit the premises of the second defendants to service a lift of which the machine house was on the roof. Access to the machine house was by a ladder to double doors some eleven feet above the level of the roof. The plaintiff knew the premises and knew that the doors had fallen into disrepair and could not be properly bolted or secured. The bottom hinge of the left-hand door was broken and on the occasion in question the left-hand door had become wedged inwards; the right-hand door was swinging free unsecured but how this had come about was a matter for inference only, there being no direct evidence. To get into the machine house he climbed the ladder and held on to the left-hand wedged door, but it moved and he was thrown off balance so that he fell and was injured. The Court of first instance found that the door had been wedged by some unknown human agency and they rejected a contention that the door had been blown in by the wind.

The plaintiff sued both his employers and the occupiers and the trial Judge found them both liable, ascribing 20 per cent. of the blame to the employers and 80 per cent. to the occupiers. On appeal to the Court of Appeal it was held that they were not liable. The matter then went to the House of Lords, who were divided both as to the proper inferences to be drawn from the facts and as to liability. The majority held that the judgment of the trial Judge should be restored and they saw no reason to disturb the apportionment of blame. The basis of liability on the part of the occupiers was that the door was in a dangerous condition. The plaintiff did not appreciate the nature of the particular danger on the occasion in question, and, consequently, did not appreciate the risk to which he was exposed when he relied on the apparent security of the wedged door. To him as invitee, therefore, there was an "unusual" or "unappreciated" danger of which the occupiers had failed to give proper warning. The test of appreciation is subjective so that liability depends on the actual appreciation of the particular plaintiff. The principle of London Graving Dock v. Horton, supra, was applied but the result did not protect this occupier because, unlike the facts in Horton's case, the risk was not fully appreciated.

Lord Denning pointed out that as a general proposition knowledge of the danger is not a bar but only a factor to be taken into account in considering whether a plaintiff willingly, accepted a risk or, to put it another way, whether the accident was due wholly or in part to his own fault. Horton's case was a particular decision on the position of a servant who sues the occupier of premises on which he is working instead of suing his employer. His Lordship also pointed out that Taylor v. Sims, supra, which suggests that the employer cannot be sued, must be read in the light of later decisions to the effect that "employers who send their workmen to work on the premises of others cannot renounce all responsibility for their safety... They must... take reasonable care to devise a safe system of work... and if they know or ought to know of a danger on the premises to which they send their men they ought to take reasonable care to safeguard them from it."—S.J.

THE RULE OF LAW AND THE DELHI CONFERENCE

THE rule of law, typifying its position in the English Constitution and its supremacy in the English legal system, was expounded as long ago as the 15th century (Year Book xix, Hen. VI) in the ancient maxim: "La ley est le plus hautes inheritance, que le roy ad; car par la ley il meme et toutes ses sujets sont rules, et si la ley ne fuit, nul roi, et nul inheritance sera." The accepted classic exposition of the place of the rule of law in the constitutional and political institutions of this country is that of Dicey in The Law of the Constitution.

As Dicey had it, the rule of law forms a fundamental principle of the Constitution, and he gave it three meanings. It means, he said, in the first instance, the absolute supremacy or predominance of regular law as opposed to the influence of arbitrary power, and excludes the existence of arbitrariness, of prerogative, or even of wide discretionary authority, on the part of the government. Englishmen are ruled by the law and by the law alone; a man may with us be punished for breach of law but he can be punished for nothing else.

It means again, equality before the law, or the equal subjection of all classes to the ordinary law of the land administered by the ordinary law Courts; the rule of law in this sense excludes the idea of any exemption of officials or others from the duty of obedience to the law which governs other citizens or from the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals.

The rule of law, lastly, may be used as a formula for expressing the fact that in this country, the law of the Constitution, the rules which in foreign countries naturally form part of a constitutional code, are not the source, but the consequence, of the rights of individuals, as defined and enforced by the Courts; that, in short, the principles of private law have here been by the action of the Courts and Parliament so extended as to determine the position of the Crown and of its servants; thus the Constitution is the result of the ordinary law of the land.

Whilst this may be what Dicey said about the rule of law in 1885, it was not what the International Commission of Jurists said in its Declaration of Delhi of January 10, 1959. This declaration pronounced that the commission "recognises that the rule of law is a dynamic concept for the expansion and fulfilment of which jurists are primarily responsible and which should be employed not only to safeguard and advance civil and political rights of the individual in a free society, but also to establish social, economic and cultural conditions under which his legitimate aspirations and dignity may be realised."

The commission then called on jurists in all countries to give effect in their own communities to the principles expressed in the conclusions above mentioned.

This is, indeed, a long way from the idealistic intellectualism of the 19th century. It may, therefore, be of use and interest to recount the background to the conference at Delhi which led up to the above mentioned declaration—especially since it represents a most considerable development of the concept of the rule of law in the law of the Constitution.

The conference at Delhi had, as a basis for discussion, a working paper which postulated "respect for the supreme value of human personality as the basis of all law," and recognised that this requires not only a theoretical acceptance of the individual's spiritual and political freedom, but also the provision of a minimum standard of education and economic security.

The tentative definition which it was proposed for the rule of law was: The principles, institutions and procedures, not always identical but broadly similar, which the experience and traditions of lawyers in different countries of the world, often having themselves varying political structures and economic backgrounds, have shown to be important to protect the individual from arbitrary government and to enable him to enjoy the dignity of man.

The Legislature in a free society, the document suggested, must accept certain minimum standards or principles of freedom for the individual, even at the cost of limitation of its own powers. These principles included a ban on retro-active penal legislation, the right to responsible government and the freedoms of religious belief, speech, assembly and association.

A study of the executive showed concern about the increase in delegated legislation, which, whilst recognised as a necessary and indeed inevitable practice in modern conditions, was one which it was essential should be controlled ultimately by a judicial tribunal independent of the executive.

In the criminal process it was concerned with the rights of the accused person, the definition of fair trial; and with the protection of the independence of the judiciary. The Attorney-General for India, in addressing the conference, pointed to three contemporary tendencies which constituted a threat to the rule of law. First, the emergence of military dictatorship which, on the pretext of more efficient government, deprived the individual of the right to free elections and the protection of an independent judiciary. Secondly, the more subtle challenge posed by totalitarian regimes functioning under a facade of democratic institutions, in evaluating which, it was suggested, the attitude of the state to the individual was the only true criterion. And, thirdly, the encroachments of governments, even in democratic countries, by means of delegated legislation, administrative rules, and officials who were judges in their own actions. Against such encroachments, it was suggested, constant vigilance was needed, especially perhaps in infant democracies where massive parliamentary majorities were the rule.

The Indian Prime Minister observed that, while the rule of law was synonymous with the maintenance of civilised existence, society was constantly changing and the law must adapt itself to these changes. The rule of law must keep pace with the rule of life. People must be allowed the opportunity to make changes. Where, for example, was the rule of law under foreign rule? All foreign rule, all imposed rule was outside the pale of law, as was every form of racial discrimination. Protection of the rights of the individual was not the sole function of law; it had also to protect society from individuals' selfish instincts. The Judge who sought to protect the individual from some action of the executive might be less in tune with the general mood of society than that executive was.

Commenting on the report which dealt with executive power, which he himself had helped to draft, Lord Denning said: "When I came to this congress I thought of the rule of law as being essentially concerned with protection of the individual from arbitrary power." Instead he had been struck by the emphasis laid, especially by emergent Asian and African countries, on such primary needs as efficient and uncorrupt government, a democratic Legislature and an independent judiciary.

Risking the obliteration of the distinction between legal and political spheres, he said that he realised that the rule of law was wider than he had thought and was not limited to preventive negative function, but laid upon governments a positive duty—admittedly unenforceable in a court of law—to act for the welfare of their people. He compared this concept to the unwritten law in England whereby no government could even contemplate abolishing Courts of law or free speech, although the only sanction against that action lay in a mature and vigilant public opinion.

This is, of course, not the first time that flights on the wings of intellectualism to rarified conceptions have been brought down to earth to consider the facts of life.

This preoccupation by the conference with the facts of life was even more marked in the report of the legislative committee, which laid down that the function of the Legislature in a free society was to create and maintain conditions which would uphold the dignity of man as an individual, not only by recognising his civil and political rights, but also by assuring the social, educational and economic conditions essential to the full development of his personality.

Inevitably the detailed recommendations of the committees reflected an uneasy coexistence between the implications of these wider and narrower concepts. The legislative committee propounded that the Legislature must be restrained from trespassing upon certain fundamental human rights either by written constitutional safeguards or by respect for established standards of legislative behaviour and urged, that these restraints be enforced by judicial sanctions—a demand resisted by Mr. Elwyn Jones, Q.C., as a denial of the legislative supremacy of Parliament.

Then followed the previously cited declaration of Delhi.

The rule of law must, now, then be redefined from what Dicey postulated in the calm of the 19th century so as to be, in the dynamics of the 20th century, a rule of justice. The conception that the rule of law rests on the judiciary is now outmoded. It rests, in the final analysis, on the people.

The rule of law formerly has been held to mean that the individual must be protected from the legal institutions of his country. But today that meaning is insufficient. It is futile to speak of the liberty of the subject to the starving populations of countries which are penurious and where human urgencies are in question. The liberty of the subject cannot be construed as a liberty to starve in poverty, disease and ignorance.

The rule of law must nowadays be expanded to impose upon governments an injunction to ensure the welfare of their people.

The rule of law is now a living theory which should not only protect and succour the legal and political liberties of the subject, but must, in addition, establish and cultivate those other conditions of society which will enable him to fulfil his personality. In this context the following quotation is appropriate: "Salus populi est suprema lex" (13 Co. 139).—L.T.

THE LAW AND THE LAWYERS

A Murderer's Appeal

THE prisoner in Reg. v. Rafik (The Times, March 10) appealed against conviction of murder as a result of a fight in the course of which a knife was used, on the ground that the trial Judge, McNair, J., had failed to direct the jury on the defences of provocation and self-defence—despite the accused's denial in cross-examination that there had been any question of self-defence or provocation in his fight with the deceased. The said defences or either of them could have arisen only on the assumption that it was the deceased who attacked with the knife, since otherwise the accused could not have been provoked or forced to defend himself. The Judge presented the issue to the jury as being whether the accused had attacked the deceased or vice versa, and told the jury that the success of the prosecution depended on their being satisfied that it was the accused who did the attacking and that the death was not accidental. In other words, under that direction the jury were not to find the accused guilty of murder if they believed that he was attacked and the death was accidental, or entertained a doubt about it. After a brief retirement the jury found the accused guilty, so that they must be taken to have concluded that the accused went for the deceased with a knife. Accordingly, there was no room or reason, in this particular case, for any direction as to self-defence or provocation. The Court of Criminal Appeal (Lord Parker, C.J., Devlin and Donovan, JJ.) upheld the conviction. The Lord Chief Justice, who delivered the judgment of the Court, declared that it did not wish to affect the authority of those precedents which had laid down that, if any evidence existed which could support a verdict of manslaughter, that evidence must be left to the jury, even though such evidence was denied by the accused, and even though the defence was not raised by his counsel.

If a man attacks another, the latter is entitled to defend himself; and the test as to what is fighting and what constitutes self-defence is that he who defends himself does not want to fight but resorts to violence merely because he is forced to it. Therefore the law completely exonerates the person who, while defending himself, knocks down his assailant and thereby unintentionally kills him, and his homicide is lawful: Rex v. Deana (1909, 2 Cr. App. R. 75). On the other hand, in no circumstances can the killing be justified or excused if committed under the influence of provocation in the technical sense of the term—that is, “some act or series of acts done by the deceased which would cause in any reasonable person, and actually causes in the accused, a sudden and temporary loss of control, rendering the accused so subject to passion as to make him for the moment not master of his mind:” per Devlin, J., in Rex v. Duffey ([1949] 1 All E. R. 932). In such circumstances the homicide does not cease to be unlawful, though it amounts to manslaughter only: Reg. v. Mawgridge (1706, 17 St. Tr. 57). If sufficient evidence were present for a reasonable jury to infer that provocation (in the technical sense of the term) did operate, it is open to the jury to find a verdict of murder or manslaughter: Holmes v. Director of Public Prosecutions (175 L. T. Rep. 327; [1946] 2 All E. R. 124). And the Judge is bound to draw the jury’s attention to such supporting evidence, even though the accused’s counsel has not raised the defence of provocation: Rex v. Prince ([1941] 3 All E. R. 37). It is equally his duty, in the absence of sufficient material for a reasonable jury to conclude that provocation operated in the above sense, to direct the jury that the available evidence does not support a verdict of manslaughter: Holmes’s case.

The Judge’s duty in the above circumstances arises from his general responsibility as regards evidence, especially in criminal trials, where the regular procedure has to be strictly observed and the parties have not, as in civil cases, even a limited latitude to compromise over it by mutual consent. Of course it is for him to decide whether certain evidence which it is proposed to tender on behalf of one side or the other is admissible or not. Again, whether or not the evidence adduced amounts to a prima facie case for the accused to answer is a pure question of law for the Judge to determine. And even though the accused does put his character in issue, the Judge may in his discretion refuse the prosecution leave to cross-examine him as to his previous convictions: Maxwell v. Director of Public Prosecutions, (151 L. T. Rep. 477; [1935] A. C. 309). Similarly, the prosecution can only call rebutting evidence by the Judge’s permission—Reg. v. McKenna, (1956, 40 Cr. App. R. 65)—which must also be obtained before a party who calls a witness can treat him as hostile and subject him to cross-examination: Reg. v. Fraser (1956, 40 Cr. App. R. 60). Indeed, whereas in civil proceedings the Judge has no power to call of his own accord a witness who he believes may be of assistance in the determination of the issue or issues before the Court, he has power in a criminal trial to call such a witness on his own initiative: Reg. v. Thompson (1876, 13 Cox C.C. 181); Rex v. Day 162 L. T. Rep. 407; (1940) 1 All

E. R. 402); Reg. v. Wallwork (1958, 42 Cr. App. R. 153). Finally, neither the prosecution nor the defence is entitled to examine or cross-examine such a witness without the leave of the Judge: Reg. v. Cliburn, (1898, 62 J.P. 232). That is why the trial Judge is expected to bring to the notice of the jury evidence of self-defence or provocation or both—when such is fit for their consideration—irrespective of such defence or defences having been put forward by or on behalf of the accused: Rex v. Hopper (118 L. T. Rep. 381; (1915) 2 K. B. 481); Kwaku Mensah v. Regem (174 L. T. Rep. 96; (1946) A. C. 83).—L. T.

LAW RELATING TO ABORTION

IN 1938, at the Central Criminal Court, an indictment was preferred against an obstetrical surgeon alleging that he had used an instrument with intent to procure the miscarriage of a certain girl, contrary to the provisions of s. 58 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861. It appeared that in this case, R. v. Bourne [1939] 1 K.B. 687, the girl in question, who was fourteen years of age, had been raped by a soldier and as a result had become pregnant. The defendant formed the opinion that the continuance of the pregnancy would probably cause serious injury to the girl, injury so serious in fact as to justify its termination. Another doctor took the view, that, if the girl had given birth to the child, she would probably have become a mental wreck. With the consent of the girl's parents and as "an act of charity... unquestionably believing that he was doing the right thing," the defendant performed the operation openly in hospital. Macnaghten, J., directed the jury "that the burden rests on the Crown to satisfy you beyond reasonable doubt that the defendant did not procure the miscarriage of the girl in good faith for the purpose only of preserving her life." His Lordship added that, if they believed that the defendant was of the opinion, on reasonable grounds and with adequate knowledge, that the probable consequence of the continuance of the pregnancy would be to make the girl a physical or mental wreck, they were quite entitled to take the view that the doctor was operating for the purpose of preserving her life. In the event the defendant was acquitted. In a letter to The Times (2nd September), the Abortion Law Reform Association restated its contention that the present law relating to abortion, which is based on the Act of 1861 and R. v. Bourne, bears no relationship to modern medical practice and they call for new legislation "to embody specific grounds on which legal abortion can be recommended and performed by qualified medical practitioners." The Association recalls that in 1939 the Interdepartmental Committee on Abortion recommended the clarification of this aspect of the law, but in December, 1957, Mr. Butler told the House of Commons that he could not see the "practical need" for reform. On 3rd April of this year he was asked on what evidence he had arrived at this conclusion and in a written answer he simply stated: "On the decision in the case of R. v. Bourne."—S.J.

CHILD DELINQUENTS: PSYCHIATRISTS' VIEW

THE Royal Medico-Psychological Association, whose Child Psychiatry Section is generally regarded as being the representative body of child psychiatrists in this country, has now published the memorandum which it has submitted to the Committee of Children and Young Persons. In cases of children in need of care and protection or beyond control, the Association suggest that the element of emotional neglect is frequently of outstanding importance and that this is often found in children from the many homes which are not only broken in the usual sense but also from those which appear to be adequate yet are really broken, as the parental relationship is one of indifference, or smouldering hostility, and lacks the vital emotional quality upon which true family life depends. Neglect of this character can rarely be satisfactorily relieved by criticism, direct advice or legal action but can best be prevented by the numerous community agencies which seek to preserve family life and arrest the deterioration of relationships in the home. These agencies should be encouraged to co-operate with the child psychiatric services and legal action should be resorted to only when all other methods of approach have failed. The Association are of the opinion that a certain number of older delinquent children appear to be capable of continuing the process of social development only within a controlled environment and they contend that this group is in urgent need of scientific observation and study. They are not the first to recommend the raising of the age of criminal responsibility and they argue that the utmost discretion should be employed in communicating the contents of psychiatric reports to parents or to the children concerned. Undue publicity of cases appearing before juvenile Courts which, although the name of the child may be withheld, often leads to notoriety, should be avoided and some of the magistrates on the juvenile panel should come from the younger age group of family men and women. Whenever possible, the remand of the child at home is the procedure which they prefer, but it is the belief of the Association that there is need for an increase in hostel accommodation for disturbed adolescents and that greater facilities for the psychiatric observation and treatment in hospital of certain children from juvenile Courts should be made available.

While we have never imagined that juvenile delinquency is confined to these shores, those who accept the doctrines of Marx must be a little disturbed to read of widespread hooliganism, drunkenness and theft in Moscow and other large Russian towns. Gangs of young people, armed with razors, knives, steel wires, and even revolvers, are said to roam the streets. How do the Russians approach this problem? They employ day and night patrols of members of the Communist Youth League, armed with nothing more than their bare fists, to break up and correct the behaviour of these gangs of their less public-spirited comrades. We would not be surprised to find that there are some in these islands, not necessarily fellow-travellers, who are sympathetic towards the adoption of such methods to combat a certain type of offender and offence, but with all its failings, whatever they may be, the British approach to the young criminal would seem to us to be preferable.—S.J.

WILL: ATTESTING SOLICITOR

It is well settled that the provision in a will whereby a solicitor is to be entitled to receive professional remuneration for his services is in the nature of a legacy. It would, however, be fatal to his right to receive any benefit under the will, if he had been one of the attesting witnesses, for he is then precluded, by s. 15 of the Wills Act, 1837, from claiming any beneficial interest under the will (Re Pooley (1833) 40 Ch.D. 1). What is the position of an attesting solicitor who, by his appointment as a trustee after the testator's death, becomes the object of a charging clause in the will which might enable him to charge for his services? This exceedingly difficult question, on which there is no direct authority, arose in Re Royce's Will Trusts ([1958] 3 All E.R. 586). Wynn-Parry, J., there decided that the solicitor was disqualified, by s. 15 of the Act of 1837, from taking any benefit under the will even in those circumstances, principally upon the ground that "the only safe view to adopt is that if a man attests a will he should not in any way be enabled to take any benefit under that will—not even if he only enters a class intended to benefit by the will after the will has been proved". On the face of it, this seems a hard decision, particularly since there are authorities, such as Re Trotter ((1899) 1 Ch. 764) and Thorp v. Bestwick ((1881) 6 Q.B.D. 311) which tend to show that events subsequent to the attestation—such as the marriage of a beneficiary to an attesting witness—do not render the gift invalid. It may be thought also that the right to charge for services which were, in fact, rendered, would not, in normal parlance, be termed a gift, but it is, of course, too late in the day to argue that the inclusion in a will of a charging clause in favour of a professional trustee does not amount, in law, to a gift or a bequest.—L.J.

CASUS OMISSUS

It is pleasant occasionally to turn from the daily tread-mill and consider the byways of the law. The byway which in this article it is proposed to consider is that of casus omissus or the lacuna in the law, which may be described as a point for which provision should have been, but has not been; made in a statute.

In respect of casus omissus in a statute reference may be made to Coke's maxim: ad ea quae frequentius accidunt jura adaptantur (2 Inst. 137). Laws cannot be so worded as to include every case which may arise, but it is sufficient if they apply to those which more frequently happen. This maxim was forcibly applied by Lord Blackburn in Dixon v. Caledonian and Glasgow and South Western Rail Cos. ([1880] 5 App. Cas. 820); and two other judgments of Lord Blackburn, Clarke v. Write ([1861] 6 H. & N. 862), and Dalton v. Angus ([1877] 6 App. Cas. 818) demonstrate that it also has force as a principle of common law.

It is a general rule that penal enactments, other than an executive measure designed to prevent a public danger, are to be construed strictly, and that the legal meanings of the words used are not to be departed from, unless it appears from the context that Parliament has intended them to be used in a popular or wider sense. They are not to be extended by equity or enlarged by parity of meaning. A casus omissus cannot be supplied in a statute creating an offence (Broadhead v. Holdworth [1877] 2 Ex. D. 321, and R. v. Murry (1898) 57 J.P. 136).

However, as to equitable interpretation of casus omissus in a statute, in Sparrow v. Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Ry. Co. ([1852] 21 L.J. Ch. 731), Lord Cranworth, L.J., said that if there had been a casus omissus he thought it ought to be construed in a way most favourable to those who are seeking to defend their property from invasion . . . a manufactory does not cease to be one because another person has a right over it.

There is also, however (and not always realised) casus omissus in relation to the unreported case. The unreported case has a peculiar place at law, and recourse has, again, to be made to a maxim of Coke: casus omissus et oblivioni datus dispositioni communis juris relinquitur (5 Co. 37). "A casus omissus", observed Buller, J., "can in no case be supplied by a Court of Law, for that would be to make laws" (Jones v. Smart [1785] 1 Term Rep., at p. 52).

It must be remembered, unfortunately, that this is not a universal truth, because, even today, to the consternation of the reader, reference may be found in judgments to unreported cases: q.v., Cottam v. Eastern Counties Ry. Co. ([1860] 30 L.J. Ch. 217) (which related to the negligence of trustees), where Sir William Page-Wood, V.-C., cited the views of Sir John Leach in an unreported case of Goldney v. Bower (circa 1828); and reference to the former case and the latter (unreported) case was made by Harman, J., in so recent a case as Welch v. Bank of England ([1955] 1 All E.R. 811), when dealing with a case of estoppel by conduct.—L.J.

NO NEGLIGENCE

THE plaintiff alleged [in Prince v. Gregory and Another, Vol. 227 Laws Times, p. 38] that the defendant had been guilty of negligence in placing or leaving the lime mortar in the gutter when he knew that children habitually played in the road, and that he had caused or permitted the existence of a danger in the road which he knew, or ought to have known, to be an allurement to children, and had failed to take any reasonable steps to prevent children from coming into contact with it. It was argued for the second defendant that a householder was doing a reasonable thing in leaving the lime mortar in the gutter outside his house for the purpose of which he required it, and it was not reasonably within his contemplation that some boy would come along and pick up some of it and throw it at a passer-by or the plaintiff, who happened to be a boy playing in the street. In the course of a judgment with which Hodson, L.J., expressed agreement Ormerod, L.J., said that the argument from the case above cited could be carried almost ad infinitum to other things where something was left anywhere. Something left in a playground was a very different thing from something left in the street, which was not there for playing with but for an entirely different purpose, and in those circumstances it was reasonable to take the view that this was not a question which should be left to a jury. It was a reasonable thing for the householder to leave the lime mortar in this particular position. There was no reason why he should anticipate that some mischievous boy would pick it up and throw it at another small boy. The statement of claim, so far as it affected the second defendant, should therefore be struck out.—L.T.

"RECKLESS" IN STATUTE CREATING OFFENCE

ONE of the most interesting of the cases reported during last term was that of Reg. v. MacKinnon ([1958] 3 All E.R. 657), which was decided at the Central Criminal Court on September 22, by Salmon, J., sitting with a jury to try a charge, involving a number of defendants, of inducing persons to enter into contracts to acquire shares by making reckless statements and forecasts. The case involved the construction of s. 12(1) of the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act, 1939, which, so far as material to the present purpose, provided: "Any person who, by any statement, promise or forecast which he knows to be misleading, false or deceptive, or by any dishonest concealment of material facts, or by the reckless making of any statement, promise or forecast which is misleading, false or deceptive, induces or attempts to induce another person—(a) to enter into... (i) any agreement for...acquiring...securities...shall be guilty of an offence..." The offender was liable to penal servitude (not exceeding seven years) for which now read "imprisonment" (Criminal Justice Act, 1948). The Crown contended that the word "reckless" in this section meant no more than "very careless," and that anyone who very carelessly made a false statement, promise or forecast and thereby induced another to enter into any agreement for acquiring securities committed a criminal offence, even if he honestly believed in the truth of what he wrote or said. For the defence it was contended that "reckless" meant not caring whether the statement, promise or forecast was true or false, and that if an accused person honestly believed the truth of what he had said or written he could not be guilty of an offence under the section.—L.T.

RES IPSA LOQUITUR

As a general rule, the plaintiff is required to prove negligence, but his task is often made easier by the application of the maxim res ipsa loquitur. This doctrine was recently considered by the Manitoba Court of Appeal in Kullberg's Furniture, Ltd. v. Flin Flon Hotel Co., Ltd. (1959), 16 D.L.R. (2d) 270. The plaintiff was lessee of business premises which were self-contained but formed part of a building in which his lessor, the defendant, operated a hotel, certain rooms of which were situated immediately above the plaintiff's furniture store. It seems that on several occasions water leaked through the ceiling of the plaintiff's premises from rooms under the exclusive management and control of the defendant and that on two of those occasions furniture displayed in the plaintiff's store was damaged. The defendant called no witnesses and offered no evidence to explain or contradict these facts. Their Lordships held that the rule res ipsa loquitur was applicable and that the judgment in favour of the plaintiff should be affirmed. Unlike Richards v. Lothian [1913] A.C. 263, where the jury found that the damage "was the malicious act of some person," there was no evidence to justify an inference or finding that the escape of water from the defendant's hotel was the consequence of the acts of a third party. Schultz, J.A., reminded the defendant that in Walsh v. Holst & Co., Ltd. [1958] 1 W.L.R. 800 the defendants had tendered evidence which satisfied the Court that they had not been negligent and therefore the action failed. In the absence of similar evidence by the defendant in the case with which they were then confronted, their Lordships found that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur entitled the plaintiff to succeed. The burden of proof had shifted from him and it had not been discharged.—S.J.

REVIEWS.

Extraordinary Legal Remedies. By S. K. KAPUR, B.A., LL.B., and P. M. MUKHI, M.A., LL.B. DELHI: Eastern Book Company, Kashmeri Gate. 1958. Roy 8vo. Pages vi, Part I, Pages 383; Part II, Pages 208; Schedule I, Pages 93; Appendix I, II, III, Pages 80; Index Pages xxx. Price Rs. 37.50.

THE object of this work has been to present a detailed and comprehensive study of the several articles relating to constitutional remedies in the Indian Constitution. Articles 32, 136, 226 and 227 provide a charter within the compass of which any person in India can approach the Supreme Court or the High Courts for speedy and effective remedy. This work affords to the lawyer seeking a constitutional remedy for his client to find within its pages a commentary on such remedies. In the appendix are given rules made by the Supreme Court and several High Courts relating to writ petitions. The bare text of relevant articles of the Constitution is incorporated for ready reference. Where a section of any Act has been referred to, the text of the section has been reproduced in the footnotes. This is a very remarkable work and the learned authors deserve all praise for their conscientious effort to produce a magnificent work dealing with the principles and the case law bearing on the Indian Constitution.

The Law of Income-Tax in India. By V. S. SUNDARAM, Formerly of the Indian Audit & Accounts Service. MADRAS: The Madras Law Journal Office. Eighth Edition. 1959. Roy 8vo. Pages 118+1135+colxxxiv. Price Rs. 40.

THIS is a very exhaustive commentary on the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, as amended upto June 15, 1959. The comments and the critical exposition of the provisions of the Act have proved valuable not only to lawyers but also to those who have to deal with this Act. The case law, which is fully dealt with, is brought down to-date. This edition has been carefully and thoroughly revised and will be found extremely useful for purposes of reference.

Digest of Statutes, Central and Kerala. Vol. I Central Statutes. By JOSEPH M. MADATHIL, B.A., LL.B., Advocate. ERNAKULAM-1: Kerala Law Times. Roy 8vo. Pages vi + 517. Price Rs. 15.

AN attempt has been made in this work to give a synoptical indexing of various statutes in two volumes. Volume I comprises of Central Statutes. Volume II will deal with statutes of Travancore, Cochin, Travancore-Cochin, Kerala, and Madras as far as they are applicable to Malabar. The statutes are systematically arranged showing the various stages of progress initiated by Acts or Ordinances. An Index referring to the various articles of the Constitution is annexed at the end.

COURT-FEE ON RETURNED PLAINT.*

IN a recent decision of the Bombay High Court, Brindalal v. Gokal & Hoffman,¹ given by a single Judge of that Court, it has been held that if a plaint is returned under O. VII, r. 10, of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, and it is re-presented in another Court situate in a State different from the State in which the Court returning the plaint is situate, fresh court-fee is required to be paid in respect of the plaint in accordance with the scale of court-fees in force in the State in which the plaint is re-presented. The decision appears to have been based on two grounds. Firstly it is said that since the coming into operation of Part III of the Government of India Act, 1935, on April 1, 1937, the Court-fees Act, 1870, though till then a Central Act, thereafter continued to be in force as a Provincial Act, in various provinces in India. Secondly it is said that to hold that fresh fee is not necessary would result in a curious position. It is said that one State would pocket the court-fee and the Court in the other State would try the suit at the cost of such other State. It is further said that if under the rules in force relating to the refund of court-fee in the State in which the plaint is re-presented, plaintiff afterwards becomes entitled to a refund of the whole or part of the court-fee paid in respect of the plaint, the State which did not receive any part of the fee will have to refund the whole or part of the fee as the case may be out of its own pocket.

It would appear that the principal ground on which the decision is based is the first of the above two grounds, and it is, therefore, necessary to examine the validity or otherwise of the premises that the Court-fees Act, 1870, continued to be in force in each of the provinces in India, from April 1, 1937, as a piece of provincial legislation. The reason put forward in support of the same is that by virtue of s. 292 of the Government of India Act, 1935, all previous laws in force immediately before April 1, 1937, including the Court-fees Act, 1870, continued to be in force in India notwithstanding the repeal of the earlier Government of India Act, and as under the Government of India Act, 1935, every Act must be either a Central Act or a Provincial Act, the Court-fees Act, 1870, must be either of the two; and since it was only a Provincial Legislature that could alter, repeal or amend the Court-fees Act, 1870, because of the distribution of the legislative powers between the centre and the provinces under the Government of India Act, 1935, the said Act must be taken to have continued in force in various provinces as a piece of provincial legislation.

Before examining each of those reasons it would be convenient to invite attention to the state of law relating to court-fees previous to the Government of India Act, 1935. The Court-fees Act, 1870, when enacted was undoubtedly a Central Act. It appears that till 1920, the Provincial Legislatures (Local Legislatures as they were then called) had no authority to touch a Central Act. By virtue of Devolution Rules of 1920, framed under the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1919 (s. 129A) some revenues appear to have been allocated to the Provinces. Section 45A of the Government of India Act,

* By G. K. Dabke, Advocate, Thana.

1 (1958) 61 Bom. L. R. 996.

1919, appears to be a source of authority for those rules. Sub-section (1) of that section was as follows:—

"45A. (1) Provision may be made by rules under this Act—

(a) for the classification of subjects, in relation to the functions of government, as central and provincial subjects, for the purpose of distinguishing the functions of local governments and local legislatures from the functions of the Governor-General in Council and the Indian legislature;

(b) for the devolution of authority in respect of provincial subjects to local governments, and for the allocation of revenues or other moneys to those governments;"...

Rule 3 of the Devolution Rules framed under s. 45A read with s. 129A was as follows:—

"3. (1) For the purpose of distinguishing the functions of the local governments and local legislatures of Governor's Provinces...from the functions of the Governor-General in Council and the Indian Legislature, subjects shall in those provinces be classified in relation to the functions of Government as central and provincial subjects in accordance with the lists set out in Schedule I.

(2) Any matter which is included in the list of provincial subjects set out in Part II of Schedule I shall, to the extent of such inclusion, be excluded from any central subject of which, but for such inclusion, it would form part."

Material portion of r. 14 of the Devolution Rules, 1920, was as follows:—

"14. (1) The following sources of revenue shall, in the case of Governors' provinces...be allocated to the local Government as sources of provincial revenue, namely:—

(a) ...

(b) receipts accruing in respect of provincial subjects;"...

Entries 17 and 20 in part II of Schedule I of the Devolution Rules, are relevant for the present purpose and they were as follows:—

"17. Administration of Justice, including constitution, powers, maintenance and organisation of courts civil and criminal within the province, subject to legislation by Indian Legislature as regards High Courts, Chief Courts and Courts of Judicial Commissioners, and any courts of criminal jurisdiction.

20. Non-judicial stamps, subject to legislation by the Indian Legislature, and judicial stamps subject to legislation by the Indian Legislature as regards amount of court fees levied in relation to suits and proceedings in the High Courts under their original jurisdiction."

All the above provisions will be sufficient to show that provinces became entitled to the revenue arising from the sale of judicial stamps in 1920 and not 1937. Further the Local Legislatures appear to have been conferred with power to alter, amend or repeal certain classes of Central Acts at the same time, as will be clear from the provisions of s. 80A of the Government of India Act, 1919, which was as follows:—

"80A. (1) ...

(2) The local legislature of any province may, subject to the provisions of the sub-section next following, repeal or alter as to that province any law made either before or after the commencement of this Act by any authority in British India other than that local legislature."

The above provisions will show that it is not correct to say that Provincial Legislatures became entitled to alter, amend or repeal the Court-fees Act, 1870, by virtue of the Government of India Act, 1935. It is noteworthy that right from 1922, various Local Legislatures have passed a number of amendment Acts in order to increase the revenues of the respective provinces, while the Central Legislature has almost not touched the said Act since 1920, presumably because the Centre lost all interest in revenue arising from sale of judicial stamps.

It is quite true that between 1920 and 1937, both the Central Legislature and the various Provincial Legislatures enjoyed concurrent power to legislate with respect to court-fees, in spite of the fact that it was a provincial subject under the Devolution Rules referred to above. The powers of the Central Legislature (Indian Legislature as then called) extended to all topics in spite of the fact that some topics formed part of provincial subjects. Section 65 of the Government of India Act, 1919, conferred legislative powers on the Indian Legislature functioning at the centre. Clause (a) of sub-section (1) thereof was as follows:—

"65. (1) The Indian legislature has power to make law—

(a) for all persons, for all courts and for all places and things, within British India;" Section 84(2) of the said Act also further clarified the position. That sub-Section was as follows:—

"(2) Nothing in the Government of India Act, 1919, or this Act, or in any rule made thereunder, shall be construed as diminishing in any respect the powers of the Indian Legislature as laid down in Section Sixty-five of this Act, and the validity of any Act of the Indian legislature or any local legislature shall not be open to question in any legal proceedings on the ground that the Act affects a provincial subject or a central subject, as the case may be, and the validity of any Act made by the Governor of a province shall not be so open to question on the ground that it does not relate to a reserved subject."

In view of this consideration it is said that because the Central Legislature had also power to legislate with respect to court-fees, it could not be said that the Court-fees Act, 1870, was in force as a provincial piece of legislation in various provinces before April 1, 1937. The fact that Provincial Legislatures got exclusive power to legislate with respect to court-fees in 1937, it is presumably urged, makes all the difference and turns the Court-fees Act, 1870, into a provincial law. It is, therefore, now necessary to see whether this assumption is correct or otherwise.

It is to be noted that the Court-fees Act, 1870, is not confined to fees taken or paid only in Courts of justice. It also relates to fees taken by or paid to other judicial or executive authorities or officers. (See arts. 9 and 6 in the First Schedule and arts. 1, 3, 10 and 11 in the Second Schedule). It may be further noted that court-fee is payable in respect of applications or other documents filed not only before the officers or authorities functioning under the provincial governments but also those functioning under the Central Government, such as customs or income-tax authorities or officers. Moreover court-fee is not only payable when documents are filed in a Court or before an officer, but also when certain documents are issued or furnished by them. When certain certified copies are issued or furnished by Courts or other officers including executive officers, court-fee is required to be paid at the time of issuing or furnishing the same whether they are thereafter filed in any Court or office or not. This is the position under the provisions of the Act, though in some States court-fee in respect of such copies is remitted by state governments under s. 35 of the Act, if the same are issued or furnished for private use. It would thus be clear that the scope of the Court-fees Act, 1870, is much wider than the topic 'fees taken in courts' referred to in entry 1, in the Seventh Schedule of the Government of India Act, 1935, though largest part of court-fees is paid in respect of plaints or memoranda of appeals filed in Courts of justice.

Perusal of all the three Lists in the Seventh Schedule to the Government of India Act, 1935, will show that the Court-fees Act, 1870, does not wholly fall within the words "the administration of justice; constitution and organisation of all courts except Federal Court, and fees taken therein," contained in entry 1 of the Provincial Legislative List and entry 54 of the same List, with respect to which alone Provincial Legislatures enjoyed exclusive power to legislate. The Act also fall within entry 59 of the Federal Legislative List and entry 36 of the Concurrent Legislative List. The aforesaid four entries correspond respectively to entries 3 and 66 in the State Legislative List, entry 96 in the Union Legislative List and entry 47 of the Concurrent Legislative List set out in the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution of India, 1950. It would, therefore, be clear that the Central Legislature did continue to have power even after April 1, 1937, to alter amend or repeal the Court-fees Act, 1870, in so far as it fell within entry 59 of the Federal Legislative List and entry 36 of the Concurrent Legislative List of the Government of India Act, 1935, and still continues to have such power in so far as the Act falls within the scope of entry 9 of the Union List and entry 47 of the Concurrent List of the Constitution of India, 1950. It would not, therefore, be correct to say that the Central Legislature completely lost the power to alter, amend or repeal the Court-fees Act, 1870, and the various provincial Legislatures alone came to enjoy such power on April 1, 1935. It may be noted in this connection that the recent Bombay Court-Fees Act, 1959, which apparently replaces the whole of the Court-fees Act, 1870, so far as that State is concerned, does not really repeal the whole of it, but the repeal is expressly confined to that part which falls under entries 3 and 66 of the State Legislative List and entry 47 of the Concurrent Legislative List. In other words, it does not repeal the same in so far as it falls within the scope of entry 96 of the Union List and to that extent at least the said Act is still operative even in the State of Bombay.

But even apart from this consideration, it is submitted, with respect, that the proposition that the Court-fees Act, 1870, which was originally a Central Act, continued to be operative as a Provincial Act in various provinces does not appear to be supported by any constitutional principle or authority. In support of the proposition, s. 292 of the Government of India Act, 1935, is sought to be pressed into service. It was as follows:—

"292. Notwithstanding the repeal by this Act of the Government of India Act, but subject to the other provisions of this Act, all the laws in force in British India immediately before the commencement of Part III of this Act shall continue in force in British India until altered or repealed or amended by a competent Legislature or other competent authority."

It is, however, difficult to see how the provision would be of any assistance to the proposition. The purpose suggested does not appear to be the real purpose of the section. Its precise purpose is set out by Gwyer C.J. in *United Provinces v. Atiga Begum*². After quoting the said section, his Lordship observes (p. 24, col. 1):

"...The purpose of s. 292 was clearly to negative the possibility of any existing Indian law being held to be no longer in force by reason of the repeal of the law which authorised its enactment; and it is a safeguard usually inserted by draftsmen in similar circumstances."

In order to correctly appreciate the above observations it would be necessary to bear in mind some basic principles relating to legislation. Power to legislate is derived from a constitution, written or unwritten. A piece of legislation owes its birth to the Legislature that enacts it. It also owes its continued life to the same Legislature, and if the said Legislature becomes extinct, the piece of legislation would lapse with it. When one Constitution is replaced by another, the Legislatures created by the earlier Constitution become extinct and new Legislatures with identical or different powers are created by the new Constitution to take their place. Strictly constitutionally speaking the new Legislatures are not successors of the old ones. They may be of entirely different type and composition. They cannot be said to inherit the laws enacted by the old Legislatures. All laws enacted by the old Legislatures lapse with their extinction. If that were not so, provisions like s. 292 of the Government of India Act, 1935, or art. 372(1) of the Constitution of India, which are normally found in almost all Constitutions would have been wholly redundant. Thus the real purpose of s. 292 of the Government of India Act, 1935, was to preserve intact the then existing laws (Central or local), without affecting their origin or quality, as they would otherwise have lapsed with the extinction of the Legislatures which created them, or repeal of the provision that previously preserved them, by reason of the repeal of the Government of India Act, 1919. It was not its purpose to classify the said statutes into Central and Provincial Acts according to the distribution of legislative powers under the Government of India Act, 1935.

Again the proposition that under the Government of India Act, 1935, Acts can either be Central or Provincial is also only partially correct. It would be correct to say that all statutes enacted after the Act came into force would bear either of those two descriptions. But the laws already in existence on April 1, 1937, do not owe their continued life to any of the Legislatures created by the Act but to s. 292 of the Act itself. This is thus the third category of laws that would operate after April 1, 1937. It is, therefore, difficult to accept the position that as from April 1, 1937, the Court-fees Act, 1870, transformed itself into so many replicas as the then number of provinces in India, and each replica separately operated in respective provinces as a piece of provincial legislation.

There is no direct provision saying that when a plaint is returned and re-presented in another Court, no fresh fee is necessary. But once a document is duly stamped it continues to bear that stamp even after the stamp is cancelled. Cancellation of the stamp does not destroy it and make the document unstamped, when it is again filed in a Court or an office. Cancellation of stamp is provided only to ensure against its fraudulent use over again in respect of another document. Certified copies if stamped at the time of issuing the same, the stamp is cancelled at the very moment, but they are not required to be stamped over again when filed in Court. Similarly when a copy of decree filed with an application for execution is withdrawn after the execution case is disposed of and is filed with a subsequent application for execution it is not required to be stamped afresh. For the very reasons a plaint when returned for presentation to the proper Court is re-presented therein is not required to be stamped afresh (see *Prabhakarbhat v. Vishwambhar Pandit*³ and *Mahadaji v. Joti*⁴).

It is, however, said that this position would be quite correct if both the Courts are situate in the same State, but if not, the position would be different. It is said that it would create difficulties as the scales of fees in different States may be different. This reasoning is hardly convincing. If the court-fee computed according to the scale in force in the State in which the plaint is re-presented exceeds the fee already paid in respect of the plaint, it would be legitimate to call upon the plaintiff to pay the difference. But it would be contrary to the provisions of the Court-fees Act, 1870, to say that the Court will not recognise the stamp already affixed, on the ground that it was not issued by the State in which the Court is situate.

There does not appear to be any provision in the Court-fees Act, 1870, that empowers a government to direct that within its territory only such stamps as are issued or sold by it shall be used. Section 26 empowers the State governments to make rules directing that stamps to be used in different cases shall be impressed or adhesive or partly impressed and partly adhesive. Section 27(a) empowers them to make rules as to supply of stamps and s. 27(b) as to number of stamps to be used. But no further powers are vested in State Governments. Thus once a stamp is issued by any competent authority functioning under the Court-fees Act, 1870, it has got to be recognised throughout India.

Another difficulty pointed out is that one State would pocket the fee and another State would be required to refund the same either in whole or in part out of its own pocket. But this has hardly any relevance to the correct interpretation of the provisions of the Act. Sections 13, 14 and 15 are the only provisions regarding refund and it is difficult to see in what cases coming within their scope the difficulty referred to above would arise. All other provisions regarding refund are creatures of either the provincial or State Acts or rules made by provincial or State governments under s. 35 of the Act. It would be open to the governments concerned to modify the rules in such a way as to ensure against the said difficulty. The rules may provide that no claim for refund would be admissible if the fee is not paid to the State concerned. But it is submitted, with respect, that this difficulty would be hardly any justification for construing the Act in a different way. There does not appear to be any warrant for the proposition that court-fee is required to be paid on behalf of any State under the Act. That would amount to adding to the statute words which are not there.

It is true that the above discussion is only of academic interest so far as the State of Bombay is concerned, because that State has now enacted its own Court-fees Act, 1959, which has come into force on August 1, 1959. This Act replaces the Court-fees Act, 1870, except in so far as it falls within the scope of entry 96 of the Union List. Now, therefore, possibly only such stamps as are issued under the State Act or deemed to be issued under the same will have to be used in all Courts in the State of Bombay. The litigants, however, deserve protection against double taxation. Every government owes a duty to the subjects to grant such protection. It may, therefore, be justly suggested that the State of Bombay and every other State which may have enacted or may hereafter enact a Court-fees Act of its own to replace the Court-fees Act of 1870, should make a provision for refund of court-fees when a plaint is returned for presentation to a Court outside the State or when a suit is transferred from a Court situate in one State to a Court situate in another State.

GLEANINGS.

SOLICITOR

Rutter v. Sheridan-Young ([1958] 2 All E. R. 13) raised an interesting point on solicitors' remuneration. A client agreed to pay a lump sum as remuneration for work done in connection with acquiring a lease. The solicitor informed the client erroneously that he was entitled to charge on the basis permitted by the second schedule to the Solicitors' Remuneration Order, 1883, as amended by the Solicitors' Remuneration Order, 1953, but he was not entitled to do so as regards the greater part of the work because he had not made a written election in compliance with art. 6 of the former order, as amended by the latter, before undertaking the work. The Court of Appeal (Lord Evershed, M.R., Parker and Sellers, L.J.J.), applying In re Palmer (1890, 62 L. T. Rep. 778; 45 Ch. D. 291), held that the client was entitled to an itemised bill, because the solicitor's mistaken statement that he was entitled to charge a lump sum had been one of the factors which had led to the making of the agreement. But the court indicated that, as a matter of general principle, it was not right to say that a client who had made an agreement for paying a lump sum for non-contentious business had an unqualified right to ask for a bill of costs. His right to require a bill was limited to cases where he could show on the facts of the particular case to the satisfaction of the court that there was something into which, as a matter of general principle or private right or both, the court ought to look.

In Hughes v. Hughes ([1958] 2 All E. R. 366) Wrangham, J., held that a solicitor's lien on being discharged from a suit otherwise than for misconduct, which is normally absolute, was only a qualified lien in a divorce case, having regard to the fact that these cases are not merely suits inter partes, and could not be disposed of by agreement like civil actions. A statutory duty was imposed on the court to inquire into matters and to refuse to grant decrees unless satisfied of certain facts, irrespective of the wishes of the parties, and there was provision for the intervention in such proceedings in certain circumstances of the Queen's Proctor, representing the public, and indeed of any member of the public. The assertion of an absolute right to refuse to deliver up material papers must be calculated to embarrass that full investigation which the public interest required. His lordship consequently negatived a solicitor's claim to an absolute lien and upheld a registrar's order giving effect to a qualified lien involving delivery up of the papers subject to the right to have them returned at the end of the proceedings and to such undertakings as might be required to make the lien effective against the former client.

This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal ([1958] 3 All E.R. 179), which observed that, notwithstanding the public interest, divorce proceedings inter partes were still litigation and there was no compelling reason why the rights of solicitors in such cases should differ from their rights in other cases. An unqualified lien should be preserved in the public interest in order that litigation might be properly conducted with due regard to the interest not only of litigants but also of the officers of the Court who served those interests. It would be odd, it was said, if a litigant were in effect able to get solicitors' work done for nothing by the simple expedient of changing his solicitor as often as he chose, leaving a trail of unpaid costs in his wake and demanding papers without payment, when he had no just cause to complain of the solicitor's conduct.

The appellant in In re a Solicitor's Clerk ([1957] 3 All E.R. 617), an unadmitted solicitor's clerk, was the subject of a direction by the disciplinary committee of the Law Society that no solicitor should employ him without the written permission of the society. Section 16(1) of the Solicitors Act, 1941, provides for the making of such an order where a clerk has been convicted of larceny in respect of any money or property belonging to, or held or controlled by, his employing solicitor. By an amendment effected under section 11(1) of the Solicitors (Amendment) Act, 1956, section 16(1) of the 1941 Act includes convictions of larceny irrespective of ownership. A Divisional Court (Lord Goddard, C.J., Barry and Havers, JJ.) dismissed an appeal against such an order, notwithstanding that the appellant's conviction—of larceny of property not that of the employing solicitor—was prior to the amendment. The conclusion did not involve a retrospective construction of the Act of 1956. The Act was not retrospective; it simply enabled a disqualification to be imposed for the future which in no way affected anything done by the appellant in the past. The disciplinary committee had, therefore, jurisdiction to make the order.—L.T.

TORTFEASORS: CONTRIBUTION

In Harvey v. R. G. O'Dell, Limited (Galway Third Party) ([1958] 1 All E.R. 657) McNair, J., held that the first defendants were entitled to be indemnified by the third party under section 6(1) of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, against their liability under the judgment in the action. This judgment was in favour of the plaintiff, whom his lordship held entitled to damages at the hands of the defendants, his employers, in respect of personal injuries sustained as the result of a road accident when he was a passenger in a sidecar driven by a fellow employee, both being at the time on a journey on the employers' business. The accident was due in part to the negligence of the driver, who was killed and whose widow as administratrix of his estate was the third party. Section 6(1) of the above cited Act provides: "Where damage is suffered by any person as the result of a tort... (c) any tortfeasor liable in respect of that damage may recover contribution from any other tortfeasor who is, or would if sued have been, liable in respect of the same damage." His lordship held that the claim was well founded. Had the cause of action been in tort, the claim would have been barred by section 1(3)(b) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, since proceedings had not been taken within six months after representation had been taken out. The right here in question, of contribution between tortfeasors, was a right sui generis conferred by statute and the cause of action for contribution did not arise until the judgment in the case. The words in the 1935 Act "who would if sued have been liable" had no temporal connotation referring to the time at which the hypothetical actions must be assumed to have been brought. Construed literally all that the phrase required was that the hypothetical action had been instituted at some time before the claim for contribution arose.—L.T.

SENSITIVE MINK

IN the well-known case of Hollywood Silver Fox Farm, Ltd. v. Emmett [1936] 2 K.B. 469 the plaintiffs carried on the business of breeding silver foxes. The defendant, an adjoining landowner, maliciously caused his son to discharge guns on his own land, but as near as possible to the plaintiffs' breeding pens, with a view to injuring the plaintiffs by interfering with the breeding of their foxes. The plaintiffs brought an action to recover damages for nuisance by noise and for an injunction. The action was successful although the firing took place on the defendant's own land over which he was entitled to shoot. This decision was distinguished by the Court of Appeal for Alberta in Rattray v. Daniels (1959), 27 W.W.R. 385. In that case the defendant took a bulldozer on to his land during the whelping season of mink in the plaintiff's mink farm situated on adjoining land and as a result some of the mink destroyed their young. The plaintiff claimed damages for nuisance created by the defendant and for negligence in the operation of the bulldozer. The learned trial Judge dismissed the action and the plaintiff's appeal against that decision did not succeed. Their Lordships took the view that there was no negligence in the bulldozer's operation as the defendant had muffled its noise as far as possible. With regard to nuisance, the defendant had negatived malice by showing that he could only obtain the use of the bulldozer during the whelping season, that he needed the bulldozer to level his land for business purposes, and that he had given the plaintiff one year's notice of his intention to use it at the time in question. It was decided that the defendant should not be denied such reasonable use of his land because of the delicate and sensitive nature of the business being carried on by his neighbour, the plaintiff, on his own property. The Court might well have adopted the words of Lopes, L.J., in Robinson v. Kilvert (1889), 41 Ch.D. 88, where his Lordship said: "A man who carries on an exceptionally delicate trade cannot complain because it is injured by his neighbour doing something lawful on his property, if it is something which would not injure anything but an exceptionally delicate trade."—S.J.

ADMISSION OF CONFESSIONS

As Lord Sumner found in Ibrahim v. R. [1914] A.C. 599, "it has long been established as a positive rule of English criminal law, that no statement by an accused is admissible in evidence against him unless it is shown by the prosecution to have been a voluntary statement, in the sense that it has not been obtained from him either by fear of prejudice or hope of advantage exercised or held out by a person in authority." In Ibrahim v. R., supra, ten or fifteen minutes after a soldier had been murdered an officer said to another soldier, the prisoner, who was then in custody: "Why have you done such a senseless act?" and the soldier replied: "Without doubt I killed him." It was held that this confession was a voluntary statement as it was not made either from fear of prejudice or hope of advantage. A rather similar point arose in R. v. Smith (1959), The Times, 26th March. A regimental sergeant-major heard that there had been some stabbing. Without delay he called a late night parade but, after each man had been questioned individually, nobody admitted being concerned in the incident. The sergeant-major then made it clear that he would keep the company on parade until someone admitted the stabbing, and when he heard this, the appellant stepped forward and said: "I did the stabbing." The Courts-Martial Appeal Court had no doubt that this statement was inadmissible as it was not made voluntarily. The sergeant-major's words were, quite clearly, a threat or, possibly, an inducement. However, at about 7.30 on the next morning a sergeant from the special investigation branch arrived to make inquiries. He saw the appellant who, after he was given the usual caution, again confessed to the stabbing. The appellant then signed a written caution and made a further statement in confirmation of his confession. The Court came to the conclusion that the oral and written statements made to the sergeant of the special investigation branch were clearly admissible as, in the words of Lord Parker, C.J., "the effect of any original inducement or threat under which the first statement was made had been dissipated."—S.J.

"AS SOON AS POSSIBLE"

WHERE an act is to be performed "as soon as possible" it is now established that something more than execution within a reasonable time is required.

The decision of the Court of Appeal in Hydraulic Engineering Co., Ltd. v. McHaffie, Goslett & Co. (1878), 4 Q.B.D. 670, is important in this connection. The defendants contracted with the plaintiffs in July for the manufacture of a part of a machine "as soon as possible," well knowing that the article was wanted by the plaintiffs by the end of August. In fact, it was not delivered until the latter part of September, because the defendants were without a foreman competent to prepare certain patterns which were essential to the manufacture of the article in question. The Court found that the defendants were in breach of their contract, and Bramwell, L.J., declared that "'as soon as possible' means to do it within a reasonable time, with an undertaking to do it in the shortest practical time."

The defendants contended that the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Attwood v. Emery (1856), 1 C.B. (N.S.) 110, gave the phrase a wider construction, but his Lordship thought that that decision did not go further than to say that if a tailor accepts an order to make a coat "as soon as possible," he need not put down a half-made vest in order to begin the coat as every customer knows at the time of giving an order that the manufacturer or tradesman may have other orders on hand. If Attwood v. Emery, supra, did go further than he believed, he (Bramwell, L.J.) could not agree with it, but Brett, L.J., did not think that the earlier case decided anything which could not be fully adopted and reconciled with the decision which they were then making.

The definition advanced by Bramwell, L.J., in the Hydraulic Engineering case was approved by Dysart, J., in the Canadian case of Kings Old Country, Ltd. v. Liquid Carbonic Canadian Corporation, Ltd. [1942] 2 W.W.R. 603. It appeared that there was a contract for the sale and delivery of an automatic bottling machine which provided that the machine was to be shipped by the manufacturers "as soon as possible." The Court decided that the effect of the undertaking to deliver the machine "as soon as possible" was that it was to be delivered within a reasonable time, the understanding being that it was to be done within the shortest possible time.

The meaning of the expression "as soon as possible" was also considered in Verelst's Administratrix v. Motor Union Insurance Co., Ltd. [1925] 2 K.B. 137, where a policy of insurance stipulated that notice of an accident should be given to the insurance company "as soon as possible" after the occurrence of the accident. The insured was killed in a motor accident in India in January, 1923. Although her personal representative knew of the death within a month the existence of the policy was not discovered until January, 1924, and notice was given to the company as soon as possible after the policy came to light. The Court decided that the arbitrator was entitled to find that notice had been given to the company "as soon as possible" as all the circumstances should be taken into account, including the available means of knowledge of the insured's personal representative of the existence of the policy and the identity of the insurance company. In the course of his judgment, Roche, J., accepted the suggestion that the phrase "as soon as possible" meant "as soon as possible in the circumstances which prevail and apply to" the personal representative.—S.J.

LARCENY: THING OF "VALUE"

A VERY interesting point on the law of larceny arose in a recent case at the London Sessions. As is well-known, "a person steals who, without the consent of the owner, fraudulently and without a claim of right made in good faith, takes and carries away anything capable of being stolen with intent, at the time of such taking, permanently to deprive the owner thereof" [s. 1(1) of the Larceny Act, 1916]. A thing "capable of being stolen" must be, inter alia, a thing "which has value" [s. 1(3)]. It appears that a market porter had been charged with stealing some carrots from his employers but a witness for the prosecution said that the carrots were valueless. In view of this statement counsel for the defence successfully submitted that the prisoner should be discharged as he was not alleged to have taken something "which has value." Strange to say, there seems to be little recent authority as to what "has value" for the purposes of s. 1 of the 1916 Act. However, in R. v. Morris (1840), 9 C. & P. 349, Parke, B., said that there is no doubt that the article alleged to have been stolen must be of some value "but it is quite new to me, that it must be of the value of some coined money." He thought that a value of "a hundredth part of a farthing" was sufficient. The Court took a similar view in R. v. Perry (1845), 1 C. & K. 725. A person was indicted for stealing a void and worthless cheque and it was found "at all events, there was a stealing of a piece of paper, which was sufficient to sustain a count for larceny." In a later case, it was shown that three pigs which had been bitten by a mad dog were shot and buried on the owner's land three feet below the surface of the soil. There was no intention of digging them up again or of making use of them in any way. The prisoners were convicted of larceny of the pigs and the Court of Criminal Appeal agreed that there was "nothing in" their objection that the buried pigs were of no value to the prosecutor (R. v. Edwards [1877], 13 Cox 384).—S.J.

CONTEMPT OF COURT

COMPLAINTS that the powers of the Courts to convict for contempt are excessive and bear harshly upon the subject have been made from time to time during the last seventy-five years, but remedial legislation, which was introduced on some five separate occasions between 1883 and 1908, failed to reach the Statute Book. Within the last two years, possibly as a result of the decisions in R. v. Odhams Press, Ltd. ([1956] 3 All E.R. 494), R. v. Griffiths and Others ([1957] 2 All E.R. 379) and Alliance Perpetual Building Society v. Belrum Investments, Ltd. ([1957] 1 All E.R. 635), the subject attracted fresh publicity, and led to a cautiously phrased resolution by the annual general meeting of the Bar in July, 1958, that there should be a right of appeal from any decision holding a person guilty of contempt of Court. Another point of criticism is levelled against the uncertainty of the law. A Committee appointed by the Council of Justice, under the Chairmanship of Lord Shawcross, P.C., Q.C., have considered the problem, and have set down their conclusions in a detailed report which was published on April, 3. The Committee reach the conclusion that "the substantive law of criminal contempt is chaotic and a serious handicap to free discussion"; the great and urgent need, in their view, is a right of appeal to the Court of Appeal against any conviction or sentence by the High Court for contempt of Court. The Committee accept the principle that the Court should retain a residuary power in all cases to prevent interference with the course of justice by punishment for contempt, but no prosecution for criminal contempt outside the Court should be initiated except by or with the consent of the Attorney-General. Other procedural proposals are that any application for attachment or committal for civil contempt should be heard in public, that every person charged with contempt should be entitled to give oral evidence in his defence, and that the power of the Court of Appeal, the High Court and quarter sessions to punish summarily for contempt committed in face of the Court should be limited in a way similar to that of county Courts. The Committee recommend further that it should be a defence to any charge of contempt on the ground of matter being published which is alleged to prejudice any judicial proceeding that the alleged contemnor neither knew nor had any reason to suspect that such proceeding had begun. Likewise it is proposed that a publication of anything relating to proceedings in chambers should not of itself constitute contempt unless it is in breach of an order of the Court prohibiting publication in a proceeding relating to an infant, person of unsound mind, or secret process, or in interlocutory proceedings where publication might prejudice a fair trial.—L.T.

PASSING-OFF AND VOICES

THE tort of passing-off is that of representing goods as those of another person. An essential element of it is that confusion is likely to be caused in the minds of purchasers. Hitherto the tort has been applied in relation to the sale of goods, but recently it was put forward as a ground for claiming an interlocutory injunction to restrain the use of a voice in television advertising. Sketches were broadcast on commercial television advertising food products. In these a human figure in cartoon form, not resembling any living person, was employed and the voice of a commentator was broadcast. The attention of Mr. Alastair Sim, the actor, was drawn to these sketches, as people who knew him well had formed the opinion that the voice was his voice and had approached him. The voice was in fact that of another actor, who had impersonated his voice in stage performances, but denied having used that voice in these sketches. No undertaking to discontinue the broadcasts being given in answer to the request of Mr. Sim's solicitors, a writ was issued on his behalf claiming damages for libel and passing-off and an injunction. On motion for an interlocutory injunction it was argued that a professional actor's reputation is a right of property capable of invasion, just as is the property in a particular kind of goods, and that the commentator's voice was being passed-off for the plaintiff's. To confuse the public as to the performances of a well-known actor was to injure his goodwill. Both McNair, J., and the Court of Appeal found it unnecessary to solve this legal problem for the case was not one in which an interlocutory injunction would be granted for libel, where the jurisdiction to grant such relief was exercised with the greatest caution, and it would not be appropriate to grant on the basis of passing-off what should be withheld on the basis of libel (Sim v. H. J. Heinz & Co., Ltd. and Another ([1959] 1 All E.R. 547). Thus, the point of law remains as yet undecided, though it would, no doubt, be a grave defect in the law if it were possible for a party, for the purpose of commercial gain, to make use of the voice of another party without his consent.—L.T.

LONELY EMPLOYMENT

THE hazards of employment are many and sometimes curious. One would not expect a hazard of employment to be that one should be attacked with a spanner when in bed. Yet it happened, and a claimant has established his claim to industrial injury benefit on the ground that the attack arose out of his employment [R(I) 30/58]. He was a lighthouse-keeper, and he and another man, twenty-three years of age, were the keepers of South Lundy lighthouse. Each man had a tour of duty of eight weeks. They had been on duty a little over a fortnight when, the claimant having gone to bed about 8:20 p.m., his colleague entered his room and attacked him with a spanner as he lay in bed. The claimant escaped. The local insurance officer, in deciding against the claim, had founded himself on the Cowman's case [R(I) 76/54], where a fellow cowman had shot at his friend on the job in the early morning and had then committed suicide himself. In that instance the cowman, though shot at his work, did not succeed in his claim to benefit, for there was nothing in the job of cowman which created a risk that a cowman should be attacked by his friend—as distinct, presumably, from being attacked by a bull. The mental instability of the lighthouse-keeper's mate, however, was aggravated by the isolation incidental to his employment, and the lighthouse-keeper's danger was related to the employment because it imposed on him propinquity to his assailant. Thus, the injury arose out of the employment. Similarly, it would seem, the danger to a postman from a householder's dog would be related to his employment, for the postman's duty to approach the house with the post would bring him into propinquity with the dog. Behind the curtain of national insurance the phrase "arising out of and in the course of the employment", which is a test of entitlement to industrial injury benefit, still brings before the Commissioner many curious happenings.—L.J.

THE NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW-SERVANTS

It is now just over ten years since the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act 1948 was passed. This Act abolished the defence of common employment and made an employer liable for the torts of fellow-servants against one another in the same manner as he is liable for their torts towards the public.

It is a convenient moment to look at some of the cases which have been decided since the Act.

There were people who said that, when common employment was abolished, nothing more should be heard of the employer's personal duty to provide safe plant and a safe method of work: these were artificial fictions which had grown up to mitigate the hardship of common employment, and in future it would only be necessary to allege that some individual had acted negligently. Indeed, this view was reiterated recently by Prof. A. L. Goodhart of Oxford in (1958) 74 L.Q.R. 397 and by Prof. C. J. Hamson of Cambridge in a broadcast talk (The Listener, 1958, pp. 613-5). But it is, quite frankly, an untenable view to anyone in contact with everyday litigation. Many accidents are due to impersonal causes, such as machinery or harmful substances, or falls from a height, rather than to any negligent act of a fellow-servant: the necessity for positive safety measures against such dangers springs from the employer's personal duty, and liability does not depend on any act of negligence. In the last ten years the House of Lords has taken the personal duty to provide for safety farther than ever before, e.g., in Morris v. West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Co., Ltd. ([1956] 1 All. E.R. 385: fencing hold of ship at sea). The vicarious liability for fellow-servants is "wholly distinct" from the personal liability (Staveley Iron & Chemical Co., Ltd. v. Jones [1956] 1 All. E.R. 408, per Lord Morton). Therefore it is not correct, and never has been, to say that the abolition of common employment superseded the old law. Nevertheless it added a new province of liability, and has important applications, especially where a fellow-servant is negligent in driving vehicles or handling heavy loads.

FELLOW-SERVANT'S DUTY OF CARE

It is not generally realised that the Act extended vicarious liability to situations in which it had never applied before. A master's liability for his servants grew up for the protection of the outside public: it wears a different aspect when applied to things happening inside the organisation. It is necessary to inquire what duty of care fellow-servants owe to one another.

In the old Scottish case of Dixon v. Ranken ([1852] 14 D. 420), where the Court of Session rejected for a time the "recent" English cases on common employment, Lord Hope, Lord-Justice Clerk, said: "For their careful and cautious attention to duty, for their neglect of precautions by which danger to life may be caused, he (the employer) is just as much responsible as for such misconduct on his own part, if he were actually present and working."

Although this decision was overruled by the House of Lords in 1858, the effect of the abolition of common employment is to reinstate it as good law (Matuszyk v. National Coal Board [1953] S.C. 8, per Lord President Cooper). It has also been said in England that men working together owe a duty to one another "to take reasonable care in the actual work...and in the method of work employed" (Williams v. Port of Liverpool Stevedoring Co., Ltd. [1956] 2 All. E.R. 69).

This duty of care may be broken even by mere agreement to disobey orders, as in Stapley v. Gypsum Mines, Ltd. ([1953] 2 All. E.R. 478, disregard of instructions to make roof safe) or in the Williams case (adoption of unsafe method of unloading ship's hold which resulted in unstable piles of bags). More commonly there is an isolated act of negligence, as in Lindsay v. Connell & Co. ([1951] S.C. 281, hitting a mate with a hammer) or Broom v. Morgan ([1953] 1 All. E.R. 849, leaving trap-door open).

In the Staveley case (supra) the argument was advanced that there must be a certain amount of give-and-take when a number of men are working together for hours on end, and that occasional slips should therefore be excused. But the House of Lords rejected this argument and held that the proper standard of care is that appropriate to a reasonable man in the fellow-servant's position, e.g., "an ordinary, prudent crane-driver." Thus, crane-driver is negligent if he does not carry out the standard drill of giving a test lift to a load to see that it is balanced. This standard of care implies that he must exercise the degree of skill which is necessary for his work.

THE COURSE OF THE EMPLOYMENT

The decisions which have been given on the scope of the employment reflect much the same difficulties which have arisen in the past where members of the public have been injured. For example, some prohibitions may remove a certain class of duties entirely from the scope of the employment: an ordinary miner has stepped right outside his duties if he acts as a shotfirer, because unqualified persons are forbidden by statute to undertake those duties (Alford v. National Coal Board [1952] 1 All. E.R. 754). But where the duties of a garage hand involved moving cars within a garage, though he had been forbidden to drive, it was held that driving a car for the purpose of moving it was within the scope of his employment, though a prohibited method was used (London County Council v. Cattermole (Garages), Ltd. [1953] 2 All. E.R. 582). The recent Scottish case of Mulholland v. William Reid & Leys, Ltd. ([1958] S.L.T. 285) was rather similar. An apprentice in a firm of agricultural implement makers was unable to drive and was not authorized to do so: but it was part of his duties to move the agricultural implements about, and he got into a vehicle which was obstructing the passage of an implement to move it out of the way. The vehicle backed violently into a fellow-servant, who was fatally injured. The employers were held liable.

There are also some interesting cases on the use of lights near inflammable substances. Thus, a storekeeper who exposes a naked light while in charge of a store where petrol is kept is acting negligently in his capacity as storekeeper: Dunk v. Hawkes, Sanders, Ltd. (The Times, October 27, 1953). But in another recent Scottish case, where miners left their work and retired to a quiet part of the waste to smoke, the Court of Session (Inner House) held that they were acting outside the scope of their employment and, in consequence, the employers were not liable (Kirby v. National Coal Board [1958] S.L.T. (Notes), 47).—L.J.

REASONS ON FACT AND LAW

THE weight of high judicial authority has been thrown into the scale to condemn with characteristic felicity of language the citing and, by implication if not expressly, the reporting of negligence cases for fact. It is not precisely fact, however, at which the shafts are aimed, but at the mistake of taking the reasons for conclusions on fact, that is, conclusions which a jury would have decided without giving reasons if the trial had not been by a Judge alone, as propositions of law. This was the error that the House of Lords corrected in Qualcast (Wolverhampton), Ltd. v. Haynes ([1959] 2 All E.R. 38), reversing the decision of the county Court Judge and of the Court of Appeal on fact, namely, on the question whether employers had fulfilled their duty to take reasonable care for the employee's safety. The employee in that case was an experienced moulder, who had not worn protective spats that were available for him nearby, and had sustained injury as a result of spilling molten metal from a ladle. "If the reasons given by a Judge for arriving at the conclusions previously reached by a jury are treated as 'law' and citable", said Lord Somervell of Harrow, "the precedent system will die from a surfeit of authorities." "Let not the same thing happen to the common law," said Lord Denning after recalling how vast was the multitude of workmen's compensation cases, "lest we be crushed under the weight of our own reports." We shun the surfeit. We bow to the appeal. Yet the question of the reportability of cases is often a vexed one into which many considerations enter, and we turn for a moment to that question, lest these shafts be taken to be aimed at reports and reporters rather than their readers. Both should abide their question. For if the reports should be selective, yet the use of them and the appreciation of what they decide and for what they are authority rest with the reader.—L.J.

REVIEWS.

The Identification of Thumb Impression and the Cross-examination of Finger Print Experts. By N. K. MEHTA. 1959. DELHI: Bar Shahbulla, Nai Sarak. Demi 8vo. Pages iv+102. Price Rs. 12.

IN this book the learned author has explained in simple language how to carry on the examination and cross-examination in finger print cases. In India the majority of the people being illiterate they append their thumb impressions in token of their signatures. To laymen thumb impressions appear to be similar, but there exists many differences in these impressions. This book is written with the object of explaining the fundamental principles of the identification of finger prints. Nature has not made any two objects identical. Finger impressions of any two individuals are not alike. On this principle the positive identification of thumb impression is based. This mode of detection has become an exact science. This book is written with the object of assisting Courts and lawyers to arrive at a definite conclusion about the correctness or otherwise of the expert's opinion. The book is bound to be of great use to Courts, members of the legal profession, and police officers.

Workmen's Compensation Act and Other Social Insurance Legislations. By JNANENDRA NATH BAKSI, M.A., B.L., Advocate, Calcutta High Court, and JITENDRA KUMAR MITRA, M.A., B.L., Advocate, Calcutta High Court. CALCUTTA: S. C. Sarkar & Sons (Private) Ltd., 1-C, College Square. 1959. Second Edition. Demi 8vo. Pages xlii+418. Price Rs. 15.

THIS book is intended to give in detail the Acts, Rules, Notifications and Judicial decisions relating to Social Insurance. The corresponding provisions of the English Acts and English decisions have been referred to. Since the publication of the first edition many changes have been made in the Acts and Rules relating to Social Insurance legislation. All these changes have been clearly and carefully incorporated in this edition. The case law, both English and Indian, has been brought up-to-date. We have no doubt that the book will prove useful to lawyers and laymen who have to deal with technical labour matters.

The Specific Relief Act. By K. N. BHANUMIK, B.L. CALCUTTA: Eastern Law House (Private) Ltd., 59, Ganesh Chunder Avenue. 1959. Roy 8vo. Pages xxi+241. Price Rs. 10.

THE learned author has clearly set forth the principles underlying the different provisions of the Specific Relief Act. He has lucidly explained the meaning of various sections in order to make the book of great practical utility. The sections have been clearly explained in the light of decisions of English and Indian Courts. Extensive quotations have been given from various judicial pronouncements wherever necessary. This handy work is bound to assist the legal profession in solving intricate points of law arising out of the different provisions of the Act. Courts and practitioners will find the book very serviceable in expounding the provisions of the Act.

A Commentary on the Hindu Code. By P. C. GHOSH, M.A., B.L. CALCUTTA: S. C. Sarkar & Sons (Private) Ltd., 1-C, College Square. 1959. Demi 8vo. Pages xiv+237. Price Rs. 10.

THIS book is written with the object of presenting to the reader the codified Hindu law. The four principal Acts affecting the Hindus have been fully discussed and carefully annotated to explain their provisions. A special Introduction containing the main provisions of each of the Acts in a nutshell has been given. The differences between the old law and the new law have been clearly pointed out. The provisions of the Acts have been explained in the light of the case law on the subject. Charts illustrating the order of succession and sapind relationship have been given. The book on the whole gives interesting exposition of the amended Hindu law.

Co-ownership and Partition. By SHAMBHUDAS MITRA, M.A., LL.B., Advocate. CALCUTTA: Eastern Law House (Private) Ltd., 54, Ganesh Chunder Avenue. 1959. Roy 8vo. Pages xxiii+272. Price Rs. 10.

THE law as to co-ownership is a Judge made law. The learned author has made a survey of the existing state of law. In every form of co-ownership partition is the ultimate result. Sometimes it is done peacefully, sometimes the matters go to Court. In this book the learned author has carefully indicated the procedure as to partition among co-owners, both amicable as also through Court. He has divided the subject into eleven Chapters, and carefully expounded the law on the subject. The book is bound to be of great utility to the Bench and the Bar.

The Indian Stamp Act. By JAHNABI CHARAN BHANUJ, B.L. CALCUTTA: S. C. Sarkar & Sons (Private) Ltd., 1-C, College Square. 1959. Second Edition. Demi 8vo. Pages xxx+388. Price Rs. 12.50.

THIS is a commentary on the Indian Stamp Act, 1899, as modified upto 1958 by the Central and Provincial Legislatures. The main Act as amended in Bharat, Pakistan and Burma, has been commented upon, indicating local changes. A Schedule has been given showing all the changes in Indian States, Pakistan, and Burma. The commentary clearly discusses various principles and all important decisions have been referred to. The book is sure to be used for reference by all those interested in its subject-matter.

Income-tax Cash Credits & Secret Profits. By M. K. SHAKDWIPI. NASIK CITY: 203, M. Gandhi Road. 1959. Demi 8vo. Pages 3+28. Price Rs. 2.

THE Indian Income-tax Act is a complicated measure lacking in lucidity. The author of this brochure has done a signal service in explaining some of the complicated provisions of the Act. He has clearly explained the system of making cash credits, has presented a comprehensive view of the subject and given the exact picture of the law on every point. He has referred to several decided cases. This brochure is an interesting exposition of some of the complicated provisions of the Act.

H. C. Mitra's Indian Limitation Act. By B. C. MITRA, B.A., LL.B., BARRISTER-AT-LAW, Advocate, Supreme Court of India. CALCUTTA: Eastern Law House (Private) Ltd., 54, Ganesh Chunder Avenue. Fourteenth edition. 1959. Roy 8vo. Pages xciii+991. Price Rs. 18.

WE cordially welcome a new edition of this well-known work. The text of the Indian Limitation Act contains all the latest amendments made by the Legislature and the case law is scrupulously brought up-to-date. Several portions of the work have been rewritten and fresh matter has been lucidly incorporated. The comment is divided into cognate groups with appropriate headings. This edition is bound to be highly useful to the profession at large.

Shorter Constitution of India. By DURGA DAS BASU. CALCUTTA: S. C. Sarkar & Sons (Private) Ltd., 1-C, College Square. 1959. Second edition. Demi 8vo. Pages lvi+680. Price Rs. 28.

THE first edition of this book was exhausted in a very short time. The various Articles of the Constitution have been lucidly discussed and the case-law has been carefully considered and brought up-to-date. This work is intended as a comprehensive guide to the Indian Constitution and it fulfils its purpose admirably well.

The "Yearly Digest" of Indian and Select English Cases. By N. RAMA-RATNAM, M.A., B.L. MADRAS: The Madras Law Journal Office, Mylapore. 1958. Crown 4to. Columns 2595.

THIS annual publication has become deservedly popular with the profession. The learned author deserves great credit for bringing out this stupendous work even under abnormal condition. The utility of this Digest to Courts and practitioners cannot be gainsaid.

The Bombay Law Reporter.
JOURNAL.

October, 1959.

HON. MR. JUSTICE J. C. SHAH.

We offer our sincere congratulations to Mr. Justice Shah on his elevation to the Bench of the Supreme Court of India. He was born on January 19, 1906, and received his early education at the Proprietary High School and the R. C. High School, Ahmedabad, and passed the Matriculation Examination in 1922. In 1926 he secured honours in mathematics in the B. A. Examination from the Elphinstone College, Bombay. Thereafter he took to law and passed in the LL.B. Examination in 1928. In January 1933 he achieved success in the Advocates Examination and started his practice in Ahmedabad. Within a short period he came to Bombay and commenced to practise on the Appellate Side of the Bombay High Court. In the trial of the dastardly murder of Mahatma Gandhi he appeared as Assistant Special Prosecutor before the Sessions Judge at Delhi.

In a very short time he built up a very lucrative practice on the Appellate Side of the High Court and made his mark as a consummate lawyer. In 1949 he was appointed a Puisne Judge of the Bombay High Court. His Work as Chairman of the Kerala and Madras Food Poisoning Inquiry in July 1958 was much appreciated.

As a Judge he was extremely conscientious in the strict performance of his judicial duties. He united strong commonsense and industry with sound knowledge of law and proved a very capable Judge. Patient, courteous and impartial, he gained the respect of the legal profession and the confidence of the litigating public. His judgments are noteworthy for full statement of facts, and elaborate discussion of arguments and relevant legal principles. His disposal of cases was quick. If Judges would make their decisions just, they should behold neither plaintiff, defendant, nor pleader, but only the cause itself. Justice discards party, friendship, kindred, and is therefore always represented as blind. The administration of justice is the firmest pillar of Government.

By Mr. Justice Shah's elevation to the Supreme Court, the Bombay High Court loses a strong, sound, painstaking and expeditious Judge, but the Supreme Court gains a shining pillar of strength. Our sincere felicitations to his Lordship, as he is bound to achieve great success in the new sphere of his career.

The members of the Bar and Solicitors gathered together in the Central Court, on October 8, 1959, to bid farewell to the Hon'ble Mr. Justice J. C. Shah.

Sir Jamshedji Kanga said:

May it please your Lordship,

The members of the Original Side of the Bar, on whose behalf I am speaking in the absence of the Advocate General, have received with very great pleasure your Lordship's well-merited appointment to the Bench of the Supreme Court, and offer their sincere congratulations to your Lordship.

As a senior member of the Bar, I have had the opportunity of observing your Lordship's career at the Bar from the day it commenced. Your Lordship's knowledge of law and able advocacy were highly appreciated, and your Lordship became a leading practitioner. Your Lordship's practice was mainly on the Appellate Side, which has a purely Indian Bar ever since the High Court began functioning. The Appellate Side Bar has been praised by several English Chief Justices, and I have heard senior English Barristers, who went on the Appellate Side almost every Wednesday, say that the Appellate Side Indian Bar was a competent Bar. Your Lordship's elevation to the Bench was anticipated, and luckily it came at such a time as would give your Lordship many years on the Bench. Your Lordship has completed nearly ten years on the Bench of the Bombay High Court. During that period, your Lordship has maintained all the best traditions of the Court, and has given entire satisfaction to the legal practitioners and the public. Your Lordship heard all those who appeared before your Lordship with patience and courtesy. When I joined the Bar, Sir Lawrence Jenkins, once a Judge of the Calcutta High Court, was the Chief Justice of the Bombay High Court. In those days the Calcutta Bench and the Calcutta Original Side and Appellate Side Bars were considered the best in India. Even the remuneration of the Chief Justice of Calcutta was greater than that of the Chief Justice of Bombay and Madras. But the times have materially altered. Bombay gave its first Chief Justice, its first Attorney General and its first Solicitor General to the Supreme Court. The Bombay Bench and the Bombay Original Side and Appellate Side Bars at the present time occupy a very high place in India. That result is undoubtedly due to the contributions made by Judges and lawyers like your Lordship. We are fully confident that your Lordship will have a very successful career on the Bench of the Supreme Court. The general expectation is, and our wishes and prayers are, that your Lordship will end your Lordship's judicial career as the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

On behalf of the Original Side of the Bar, I wish your Lordship a very successful career on the Supreme Court Bench, long life, health and happiness.

Mr. Y. V. Chandrachud, the Government Pleader, said:

My Lord,

Last time we met in the Central Court was to do homage to Chief Justice Chagla, who relinquished his office in September 1958. The feel ings of those who have assembled here to-day are no less poignant than the feelings which were expressed on that occasion. Those were feelings of gratitude and of affection.

Your elevation to the Bench in 1949 was preceded by a career which, for its success, had few precedents at the Bar. For a period of ten years and more, there was no celebrated cause in appeal in which you were not briefed to appear for one side or the other. At the Bar you not only acquired a large practice, but what is perhaps of equal importance, you also acquired an admiring circle of friends. An almost crushing load of ever-mounting work deprived you of all leisure, and it was not often that you could seek relaxation in the lighter atmosphere of the Bar-room. You, however, stole time to pay fleeting visits to the Bar-room, when you would relax with a shy abandon which is so peculiarly your own. For then you would don the Parsi cap of Mr. Pochaji Jamshedji and you would let loose a stream of stories glowing with a sly humour. The younger set—and I was one of them—would try to eavesdrop, but the subtleties of the seniors were beyond our comprehension.

In 1948 came the crowning achievement of your career, for the Government of India appointed you with Mr. C. K. Daphtary as a Prosecuting Counsel in the Mahatma Gandhi Murder Trial. The trial was of great national importance and it evoked a world-wide interest. The preparation of that monumental case involved a heavy strain on you, even though you were accustomed to a life of hard work and rigorous self-discipline.

Soon after the conclusion of the Gandhi trial, you were persuaded to accept a seat on the Bench of this High Court. You responded to the persuasion, though at a great personal sacrifice, for it meant giving up a large and lucrative practice. Your appointment as a Judge must have come as a relief to you from the gruelling work at the Bar, though subsequent events show that you gave up a career of hard work to embark upon a career of even more hard work. As Lord Macmillan has said in his autobiography, advocacy is an enthralling vocation, though an exhausting one, and one is apt to grow weary of putting all one's energies into other people's disputes. You accepted the sanctuary of the Bench partly for the reason that, though enthralled, you were exhausted, and partly for the reason that, as a Judge, you could continue to serve the Law in a serener atmosphere where you could turn to more useful account the garnered stores of your experience.

It is not without trepidation that I approach the task of assessing your work as a Judge of this Court. The 1st of March 1949 saw the birth of a judicial career marked by independence of thought and an almost infinite capacity for taking pains. The dissenting judgment in Jesingbhai's case, which was delivered in April 1950 by you as a member of the Full Bench consisting of Chief Justice Chagla, Mr. Justice Bavdekar and yourself, will ever stand as a tribute to your independence of thought and approach. Those of us who had the good fortune to be present in the First Court that day will not easily forget how, in a rather surcharged atmosphere, you proceeded to voice your dissent—not without regret, not without respect, but with a calm confidence. That judgment and the other judgments which are treasured in the Law Reports emphasize the directness of your approach and your faculty for plain unadorned language. Your judgments are characterised, not by purple passages, but by clear and simple statements of fact and law.

Your knowledge of the several branches of law is so well-distributed that it is difficult to say where you excel. Whether you sat on the Appellate Side or on the Original Side, whether you were hearing civil appeals or criminal appeals, your qualifications as a Judge shone in proportion as the occasion called forth their display. But, as the poet Wordsworth says:

"Even amongst the fairest objects,
Some are fairer than the rest."

And may I, with apologies to the poet, say:

"Even amongst the strongest subjects,
Some are stronger than the rest."

If I am asked to pin-point your excellence, I would say that you excelled in the law of land acquisition.

It is notable my Lord, that in the discharge of your judicial functions, you were never led by any conscious desire to excite the admiration of the Bar. Chief Justice Mathew Hale has said that there are two golden rules of conduct which he followed as a Judge: one, not to be solicitous of what men will say or think so long as you keep yourself exactly according to the rule of Justice, and two, to be short and sparing at meals so that you may be the fitter for business. We knew as a matter of personal experience that your Lordship adhered strictly to the first rule, and there is enough circumstantial evidence to lead to the conclusion that your Lordship followed the second rule also.

I am afraid, my Lord, I will be untrue to the Bar, which I have the good fortune to represent to-day, if I omitted to mention that for some time it was felt that the Bar could not keep pace with your quickness. Sometimes you lost patience if you lost time; sometimes excursions into matters of small moment were cut short too promptly, and sometimes your unrivalled power of searching comment was utilised so as to indicate that any further argument may be ineffective. I am happy, my Lord, to be able to say to-day that it was a matter of no small satisfaction to the Bar that, in recent years, your Lordship made a determined effort to remove any cause for complaint or criticism on these counts. Imperfections mark every human character, and the test of a good Judge, as that of a good man, is not how perfect he is, but how he strives to be less and less imperfect.

My Lord, as the time for parting draws nearer and nearer, happy memories crowd into our minds, and to-day we have nothing but happy memories of our association with your Lordship. You will soon occupy a seat on the Bench of the highest Court of the land. You have never relaxed. As the Chairman of the Commission of Enquiry into the Food Poisoning cases in Madras and Kerala, you even ordained that Sundays should be treated as mere Mondays. You have carved a place for yourself by a thrifty application of time. We are all happy, that you will now have longer week-ends, no working Saturdays, and longer holidays which you richly deserve, and a part at least of which, we hope, you will spend without the companionship of law books and labais. Life is larger than Law. On behalf of the Bar, I wish your Lordship great good luck and every distinction in your new assignment.

My Lord, it is difficult to measure contemporaneously the influence of individuals on the growth and shaping of institutions. That is the privilege of history. But it requires no strong imagination to anticipate that in your case the verdict of history can only be that you gave speed, strength and vitality to this Court by a singular devotion and rectitude. While parting, the Bar could give you no better farewell than to say that your work in this Court will ever inspire us to devote our talents towards enhancing the prestige of this Court by hard and conscientious work.

Mr. N. H. Sethna, President, Incorporated Law Society, said:

My Lord,

On behalf of the Solicitors' profession, it gives me great pleasure to associate myself with the expressions and sentiments which fell from the lips of Sir Jamshedji Kanga and Mr. Chandrachud. My Lord, I do not think I can usefully add anything to what they have said in such happy terms, but there is one incident in your Lordship's life which perhaps the previous speakers did not know, and that is that your Lordship was at one time meant for the Indian Civil Service, but for reasons other than that of intellect or industry, your Lordship was asked not to present yourself at the selection. My Lord, what was then lost to the Civil Service was gained by this Court, and by reason of your industry and intelligence you surmounted all difficulties, till at last we found you presiding over this Court as one of the best Judges that we can have.

My Lord, I would be failing in my duty if I did not, on behalf of the members of my profession, express great appreciation for your Lordship's kindness and courtesy when your Lordship was taking chambers on the Original Side of the High Court. Your Lordship's valuable guidance very often, when we were in error, led us to believe that after all Judges are also human beings who can correct us and not merely blame us. At the same time, when we saw your Lordship taking witness action on the Original Side of the High Court, it came to several of us as a matter of surprise with what ease you handled such witness action—an ease, my Lord, which some of the best counsel from the Original Side could not have achieved at any time.

My Lord, it is a matter of considerable regret to us that you have to part from us, but it is a happy thought that your Lordship will in the new environments be able to do great service to our country and add greater lustre to the highest Court of our country, and perhaps also make a name as one of the Chief Justices of that Court.

On behalf of my profession, I wish your Lordship God-speed and good health; and perhaps at some time, when your Lordship has occasion to revert for a few days to this city, we may have the pleasure of seeing you again in good health.

The Hon'ble Mr. Justice J. C. Shah replied:

Sir Jamshedji Kanga, Mr. Government Pleader, President of the Incorporated Law Society, and members of the Bar,

I feel deeply moved by the cordial welcome which you have accorded to me this evening and the sentiments expressed by you. I am not vain enough to think that I have deserved the tribute you paid to me.

My memory goes back more than twenty-six years when I came to Bombay after a short practice at a mofussil Bar, when I was friendless and felt lonely. When I saw this Court building built in gray stone, I felt that my lot was cast in surroundings which did not appear to be congenial. I saw a large number of members of the Bar flitting about with hardly a kind word to say. But that was soon changed. I acquired a large circle of friends, both on the Original Side and on the Appellate Side, and it was my good fortune that I happened to come to this Court, more by accident than by design, to practise.

Gentlemen, years have rolled by and I am sitting here for the last time in this Court bidding you good-bye, and I am carrying with me the cherished memories of times which have gone by, of the affectionate and courteous regard and co-operation which I have always received when I was with you at the Bar and also when I sat on the Bench. The termination of this association, which has been to me instructive and pleasant, is particularly painful to me, and I find it difficult to express adequately the depth of my feeling. It is for more than ten years that I have sat on this Bench. I entered upon the performance of my duties with great diffidence, but it has been my good fortune during these years to have had the assistance of what is reputed to be the ablest Bar in this country. Throughout my career as a Judge, I have invariably found an honest presentation of the cases and arguments, coupled with unfailing courtesy, which made my work both light and interesting. You have referred to the merit of my work on the Bench: I can unreservedly say, not out of any modesty but out of genuine conviction, that the merit thereof reflects the industry and presentation by members of the Bar of cases which came up for hearing before me. Our work—the work both of the Bar as well as of the Bench—in the Courts is done in the fierce light of publicity. It is work done in the light of cold reason in the search for truth, and it is to the credit of the Bar that the dust of political arena and of other-strife has not entered the precincts of this Court. When I entered upon the performance of my duties as a Judge, I fervently prayed to the Almighty that he may give me the strength to hold the scales of justice even and to uphold the highest traditions of the Bombay Bench and the High Court. I have, I believe, made a sincere effort in that direction: I do not know how far I have succeeded in achieving that ideal.

Gentlemen, all parting is sad. To me it is particularly sad when I am required to leave the field of my activity where the formative years of my life as well as the most important period of my professional life have been lived in such pleasant associations. During the last ten years that I have sat on the Bench, there have been revolutionary changes in this motherland of ours. We have won Independence and have started upon a programme of unprecedented development, the pace of which we, being in the midst of the stream, are unable to gauge. Even though our work as lawyers and as Judges is performed in the cloistered arena of the Courts, we cannot be immune to these developments. It will be for the future historian to record whether as lawyers and Judges we have contributed to the acceleration of the progress of our State. That the profession of law and the administration of justice have a vital role in the administration of the State is undisputed. When we have set out upon a vast experiment of enabling every individual citizen in this land to attain his fullest individuality, to make him free from want and hunger, to provide him with the normal amenities of civilised life, let us not lay ourselves open to the charge that in the matter of administration of justice the progress was hindered by judicial delay.

Gentlemen, in regard to my work as a Judge, if in the discharge of my duties I have at any time appeared to go quicker than I was expected to do, it has been because I have always believed that justice delayed is justice substantially denied. I have, I feel, attempted to act in that belief. If, during the course of my career as a Judge, unwittingly any harsh word has escaped me, as it may have escaped, I crave your indulgence on this day of parting.

I thank you, gentlemen, for the co-operation you have given to me.

SECTION 28 OF THE BOMBAY RENT ACT

*Babulal Bhuramal v. Nandram Shivram.

CERTAIN observations of the Supreme Court in *Babulal Bhuramal v. Nandram Shivram*¹ have raised a very interesting controversy as to whether the civil Courts would cease to have jurisdiction over a particular suit by reason of a plea of tenancy and consequent protection under the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, being taken up by the defendant in the written statement. The relevant passages of the said judgment are at pp. 957-8 and are as follows:—

"...Do the provisions of s. 28 cover a case where in a suit one party alleges that he is the landlord and denies that the other is his tenant or vice versa and the relief asked for in the suit is in the nature of a claim which arises out of the Act or any of its provisions? The answer must be in the affirmative on a reasonable interpretation of s. 28."

"...On a proper interpretation of the provisions of s. 28 the suit contemplated in that section is not only a suit between a landlord and a tenant in which that relationship is admitted but also a suit in which it is claimed that the relationship of a landlord and tenant within the meaning of the Act subsists between the parties. The Courts which have jurisdiction to entertain and try such a suit are the Courts specified in s. 28 and no other."

Two interpretations are placed on the above passages of the Supreme Court judgment. One school of thought interprets these passages as merely emphasizing the frame of that particular suit while reaffirming the judgment of the High Court that the civil Courts would not have jurisdiction to entertain a suit in respect of a title arising out of any of the provisions of the Rent Act as such a claim or question can only be gone into by the special Court set up under s. 28 of the Rent Act. In other words, under s. 29-A of the Rent Act, the right of a civil Court to go into questions of title is restricted to cases of titles de hors the Rent Act and does not extend to titles which arise out of the provisions of the Rent Act e.g. the question whether a person is a lawful sub-tenant or assignee in respect of certain premises and entitled to protection as such under ss. 14 or 15 of the Rent Act is a question which only the special Court set up under s. 28 can go into as it involves taking cognizance of s. 14 or 15 of the Rent Act. A civil Court, as rightly held in Harswarup Khannamal v. Nandram,² would not have jurisdiction to go into the above question as the title claimed therein arises out of the provisions of Rent Act. However, if the title which is claimed arises de hors the Rent Act e.g. ex contractu or out of ownership, then the special Court not having been invested with jurisdiction to decide question of title otherwise than by reason of the provisions of the Rent Act, the ordinary Courts of the land would continue to have jurisdiction to decide questions of title, and it is because of this that the Legislature made it clear that suits on title and in respect of title could be filed in Courts competent to decide these questions, notwithstanding what is contained in s. 28 or 29 of the Rent Act. According to this view, when the plaintiff files an ejectment suit on the basis of any other relationship but that of landlord and tenant, say, licensor and licensee or owner and trespasser, and if the defendant pleads that he is a tenant of the plaintiff and entitled to protection under the Rent Act, the Court must determine the respective contentions of the parties and decide whether the relationship between the parties is that of licensor and licensee or owner and trespasser as the plaintiff claims or that of landlord and tenant as the defendant claims. If the Court decides the issue in favour of the defendant, the civil Court would not have jurisdiction to proceed further with the suit as it would then be a question between a landlord and a tenant for reliefs under s. 28 and only the special Court set up under s. 28 would have jurisdiction to deal with the same. On the other hand, if the Court decides the issue in favour of the plaintiff, it would continue to have the jurisdiction to try the suit and would be able to try the suit on the merits to its logical conclusion.

The other School of thought interprets the above Supreme Court judgment as laying down a new principle, viz. that even though a plaintiff may bring a suit in ejectment against the defendant on the basis of any other relationship, say, licensor and licensee or owner and trespasser, if the defendant contends that he is a tenant of the plaintiff and entitled to protection under the Rent Act, the civil Court, by reason of the above quoted passages of the Supreme Court judgment, would be ousted of its jurisdiction and cannot even decide whether the relationship which subsists between the parties is that of licensor and licensee or owner and trespasser as claimed by the plaintiff or that of landlord and tenant as claimed by the defendant. According to this view, the determination of this very question is left to the special Court set up under s. 28. In other words, though a civil Court would have jurisdiction to entertain a suit when instituted, it being based on a title de hors the Act and otherwise within its competence, it would cease to have jurisdiction to decide that suit, nay, even the question to decide whether it has jurisdiction to try the suit or not, as soon as a defendant takes up the plea of tenancy and protection under the Rent Act. It is argued that the words are wide enough to cover cases both where such a claim is made either in the plaint or in the written statement, and the only Court which can deal with such claims is the special Courts set up under s. 28 of the Rent Act. It is interesting to note that this interpretation of the Supreme Court judgment has appealed to the City Civil Court, Bombay, and that Court has, subscribing to the above interpretation, declined to go into the question of determining its jurisdiction in such cases, and returned the plaints for presentation to proper Court viz. the Small Causes Court, Bombay.

It is submitted with great respect that the above interpretation of the Supreme Court judgment does not appear to be correct. It is submitted that the above observations of the Supreme Court must be read in the context of the facts of that case, and, when so read, it will be clear that the Supreme Court has not laid down such a broad principle. In that case, plaintiff No. 1 was a tenant of the premises in question under defendant No. 1. Plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 were persons to whom the premises were sub-let by plaintiff No. 1. Defendant No. 1 as the landlord gave notice to quit to plaintiff No. 1 on December 6, 1947. Thereafter he filed suit No. 483/4400 of 1948 in the Court of Small Causes, Bombay, on April 29, 1948, whereby he sought to evict plaintiff No. 1. To this suit, defendant No. 1 also made plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 parties to the suit alleging that they were trespassers and had no right to be on the premises. The Small Causes Court held that plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 were not lawful sub-tenants, and the sub-letting to them by plaintiff No. 1 being contrary to law, the latter had deprived himself of the protection of the Act. An appeal against the decree was unsuccessful and revision application made to the High Court was summarily dismissed. Thereafter, the plaintiffs filed the present suit in the City Civil Court praying, inter alia, for a declaration that plaintiff No. 1 was a tenant of the defendants and was entitled to protection under the Rent Act, and that plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 were lawful sub-tenants of plaintiff No. 1 and were entitled to the possession, use and occupation of the premises as sub-tenants thereof. The City Civil Court held that it had jurisdiction to try the suit but dismissed the same on the ground that there had been no lawful subletting of the premises to plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 as the provisions of s. 10 of the Rent Act, 1944, had not been complied with. Against that decision, the plaintiffs appealed to the High Court, which appeal was dismissed on the ground that the City Civil Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit, as the suit involved a question of title arising out of the provisions of the Rent Act and was triable exclusively by the Court of Small Causes, Bombay. Plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 preferred an appeal to the Supreme Court from the judgment of the High Court.

It is material to note that, in this case, there was no dispute that plaintiff No. 1 was not the contractual tenant of the defendant-landlord. The material question was whether plaintiff No. 1 continued to enjoy the possession as a statutory tenant against whom no order in ejectment could be passed, notwithstanding the termination of his contractual tenancy by the landlord, if he was ready and willing to pay the rent and observe and perform the terms of tenancy. Now, the question whether he was ready and willing to pay the rent and observe and perform the terms of tenancy and therefore entitled to protection under the Rent Act could only be gone into by the special Court set up under s. 28 as it would be a question arising out of s. 12 of the Rent Act. Again, plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 prayed for a declaration that they were lawful sub-tenants of plaintiff No. 1 and were entitled to protection as such under the Rent Act. This would clearly mean that in order to support their case plaintiffs Nos. 2 and 3 would have to rely on the provisions of s. 14 of the Rent Act, and, as rightly held in Harswarup v. Nandram any claim or question arising out of the provisions of the Rent Act could only be gone into by the special Court set up under s. 28 of the Rent Act. None of the plaintiffs in the case before the Supreme Court was claiming a title de hors the Act and, therefore, the City Civil Court would have no jurisdiction to entertain a claim of title which arose out of the provisions of the Rent Act. It was in emphasizing the frame of the suit as filed that the above observations of the Supreme Court were made and they must be read as such.

On the other hand, if the claim or question of title arises de hors the Rent Act, the civil Courts of the land would continue to have jurisdiction to decide the same under s. 29A of the Rent Act, even though the same may have been determined incidentally under s. 28 or s. 29 of the Rent Act. This has been made clear by the Supreme Court at p. 959 of the same judgment.

"...It is possible to conceive of cases where in a suit under s. 28 a question of title to premises which does not arise out of the Act or any of its provisions may be determined incidentally. Any party to the suit aggrieved by such a determination would be free to sue in a competent Court to establish his title to such premises by virtue of the provisions of s. 29A [of the Rent Act]. On the other hand, in a suit where a question of title entirely arises out of the Act or any of its provisions, the jurisdiction to try such a suit was exclusively vested in the Courts specified in s. 28 of the Act and no other. That is to say, a title which could not be established outside the Act but which arose under the provisions of the Act by virtue of a claim made thereunder must be determined by a Court specified in s. 28 and a title de hors the Act may be determined in any other Court of competent jurisdiction... By enacting s. 29A the Legislature clearly intended that no finality should be attached to the decision of a Court trying a suit under s. 28 on a question of title de hors the Act."

Thus, if the plaintiff files an ejectment suit against his licensee or a trespasser, the City Civil Court would have jurisdiction to try the same, e.g. in *Govindram Salamatrai v. Dharampal*³ the plaintiff had filed the suit against the defendants alleging that they were his licensees of a certain property, that the license had been properly and legally terminated and that he was entitled to an order of eviction against the defendants. The defendants contended that they were the tenants of the plaintiff and therefore were protected under the Rent Act, and also contended that the High Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. Dealing with the question of jurisdiction, it was held that the proper forum for the determination of the question whether the relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant is as between landlord and tenant or as between licensor and licensee or as between owner and trespasser is the High Court which initially has got the jurisdiction to entertain the suit for ejectment which has been properly framed on the basis of relationship as between licensor and licensee or owner and trespasser.

But it is argued that the above judgment is impliedly overruled by the above observations of the Supreme Court. It is respectfully submitted that the above observations of their Lordships were made more to indicate the frame of the plaintiff's suit than to determine the question of jurisdiction of the civil Court. A division bench of the Bombay High Court has recently considered in *Jaswantlal v. "Western Comp., India"*⁴ the above Supreme Court judgment. The facts in that case were that the plaintiff had filed a suit in ejectment against the defendants contending that the defendants were trespassers or at best licensees whose license had been validly revoked. The defendants contended that they were the plaintiff's sub-tenants and were entitled to protection under the Act. The defendants relied on the above two passages of the Supreme Court judgment and contended that the City Civil Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. Dealing with this contention of the defendants it was held that the above observations emphasized more on the frame of the suit and did not deal with the question of jurisdiction. It was held that in order to decide whether a suit comes within the purview of s. 28 what must be considered is what the suit as framed in substance is and what the relief claimed therein is. If the suit as framed is by a landlord or a tenant and the relief asked for is in the nature of a claim which arises out of the Act or any of its provisions, then only and not otherwise will it be covered by s. 28. The ratio of the above judgment has been reaffirmed in another recent decision reported in Abdul Kayum v. Ebrahim.⁵ It was held in that case that a suit by a plaintiff under s. 47 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, for a declaration that the defendant was not at the time of applying for the order under ss. 41 and 43 entitled to the possession of such property, and the application by the defendant for such an order constituted an act of trespass, was main-tainable in the City Civil Court as the suit was essentially under ss. 46 and 47 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act and the mere fact that the plaintiff had stated in addition that he was entitled to protection under the Rent Act would not change the nature of the suit.

It is, therefore, respectfully submitted that the true interpretation of the Supreme Court judgment is that the Supreme Court has not laid down any such broad proposition as to oust the jurisdiction of the civil Court to entertain any suit without determining the issue of its jurisdiction as soon as the defendant pleads tenancy and protection under the Rent Act. In any event, it is submitted that the observations of the Supreme Court are obiter and should not be deemed to override an earlier judgment of the Supreme Court in *Bhatia Co-operative Society Ltd. v. Patel*⁶. There the plaintiff had filed a suit in ejectment against the defendant who was his tenant on the footing that the Rent Act did not apply to the premises as the same were exempt under s. 4 of the Rent Act. The defendant contended that the Rent Act applied and the premises were not exempt from the provisions of the Rent Act and that, therefore, the City Civil Court had no jurisdiction to entertain and try the suit. Dealing with the question of jurisdiction, their Lordships have observed (p. 206) :

"...The crucial point, therefore, in order to determine the question of the jurisdiction of the City Civil Court to entertain the suit, is to ascertain whether, in view of s. 4 of the Act, the Act applies to the premises at all. If it does, the City Civil Court has no jurisdiction; but if it does not, then it has such jurisdiction. The question at once arises who is to decide this point in controversy. It is well settled that a civil Court has inherent power to decide the question of its own jurisdiction, although, as a result of its enquiry, it may turn out that it has no jurisdiction over the suit. Accordingly we think, in agreement with the High Court, that this preliminary objection is not well founded in principle or on authority..."

Similarly if a plaintiff files a suit against his licensee or a trespasser and the licensee or the trespasser contends that he is the tenant of the plaintiff and entitled to protection under the Rent Act, the question which would arise is whether the relationship between the parties is that of landlord and tenant or that of licensor and licensee or owner and trespasser. If the relationship is that of landlord and tenant, the City Civil Court would not have jurisdiction. If the relationship is that of licensor and licensee or owner and trespasser, the City Civil Court would have jurisdiction to try the same. The question arises as to who is to decide the point in controversy and the Supreme Court has answered it by saying that every civil Court has inherent jurisdiction to determine the question of its own jurisdiction although as a result of the enquiry it may turn out that the Court has no jurisdiction to try the suit.

Now, if the Supreme Court in deciding Babulal Bhuramal v. Nandram wanted to lay down a different principle from the one it laid down in Bhatia Co-operative Housing Society Ltd. v. Patel it would have said so. But it having not done so, it is legitimate to infer that it did not want to make a departure from the law laid down in Bhatia Co-operative Society's case where the facts were different. Secondly, even if it is possible to read the Supreme Court judgment in Babulal Bhuramal v. Nandram as laying down a very broad principle, it is submitted, that the same ought not to be extended to cases where the facts are exactly the converse of the case before the Supreme Court.

Now, the scope of the binding nature of the observations of the highest Court has been laid down by the High Court in *Comr. I.T. v. Bai Shirinbai*⁷. In that case the question arose whether the assessee's assessable profits on the sale of shares was the difference between the sale price and the cost price paid by the assessee or the difference between the sale price and the market price on April 1, 1945, on which date the assessee had started her business, the assessee having purchased the shares prior to April 1, 1945. The assessee contended that she was liable to be taxed on the difference between the sale price and the market price on April 1, 1945. The department, relying on an earlier judgment of the Supreme Court, contended that the profits should be assessed on the basis of difference between the sale price and the actual cost price. Now, the earlier Supreme Court judgment dealt with a case where the assessee had, during the accounting year, withdrawn some silver bars and shares from the business and settled them on certain trusts in which he was the managing trustee, and in his books he credited the business with the cost price of the silver bars and shares so withdrawn. The department and the High Court assessed him to tax on the basis of the difference between the cost price of the silver bars and shares and their market value on the date of their withdrawal from business. The Supreme Court set aside the assessment holding that there was only a fictional sale and that the assessee could not be taxed on a fictional sale. Basing its argument on this judgment, the department contended in the later case that just as a person cannot be assessed on profits deemed to arise on a fictional sale, so also in assessing the profits of the assessee in the later case, the basis to be adopted should be the difference between the actual purchase price paid by the assessee and the sale price and not the difference between the sale price and the market price on the date of conversion viz. April 1, 1945. The above argument of the department was not accepted by the High Court. Chagla C.J., who delivered the judgment, stated (p. 716):

"It has been very strongly urged by the Advocate General that it is our duty, whatever our own views may be, to give effect to the decision of the Supreme Court. With very great respect, a decision of the highest Court is a decision which is true with regard to the facts on which that decision is based. Logical corollary may follow from that decision and a Court may be asked to accept the logical corollary and to extend the principle of that decision, but the binding nature of the decision depends upon what is the ratio which applies not only to the facts in that particular case but would be applicable to other facts as well. It is perfectly true that no two decisions can have identical facts and it is not in that sense that one decision is to be distinguished from another. But once the ratio is discovered, then the case is not an authority for a proposition that may seem to follow logically from it, as was stated by Lord Halsbury in Quinn v. Leatham." We need hardly say that if we were satisfied that the ratio of the Supreme Court judgment applied to the facts of this case, whatever our view might have been, we would have unhesitatingly applied it and come to a decision in conformity with the decision of the Supreme Court. But when we are asked to extend the principle of that decision, with very great respect, we hesitate to do so, because we feel that if all the aspects of the matter had been present before the Supreme Court, they would not have agreed to extend that principle to cases where an asset was realised by a business man and where the question arose as to what were his business profits and how those business profits should be allocated."

Likewise, it is submitted that the ratio, if any such be, of the Supreme Court judgment in Babulal Bhuramal v. Nandram ought not to be applied to a case where the plaintiff brings a suit in ejectment on the basis that the defendant is his licensee or a trespasser, as the facts would be converse of the case in Babulal Bhuramal's case, and that if all the aspects of the matter had been present before the Supreme Court, they would not have agreed to extend the principle to a case of the above nature.

It may be observed in passing that the City Civil Court seems to have been influenced in holding that it has no jurisdiction to even determine the question of its own jurisdiction on the basis of certain provisions of certain statutes where the Courts' jurisdiction has to be decided not by an ordinary Court of the land but by a special tribunal set up under that particular piece of legislation, not because of what the plaintiff says in his plaint but because of the plea that the defendant sets up in his written statement, e.g. the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act or the Displaced Persons' Debts Adjustments Act etc. That may be so, because there is an express provision to that effect in those statutes. But under the Rent Act there is no similar provision and therefore provisions in those statutes cannot be a helpful guide in determining the forum for the disputes under the Rent Act. The same point was urged before the High Court in Bhatia Co-operative's case before Weston J. He held (p. 203):

"It is first contended by Sir Jamshedji Kanga that the City-Civil Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit, for the Court to which the jurisdiction to entertain such suit is given by the Act No. LVII of 1947 is the Court of Small Causes at Bombay. But unless express provision exists to the contrary, and such provision would be most extraordinary, any Court has jurisdiction to decide whether or not it has jurisdiction in a particular matter, and we cannot accept that it is necessarily for the Small Causes Court to decide in the first instance whether the suit should or should not proceed in that Court or in the City Civil Court."

Lastly, it is submitted, that if the Supreme Court judgment is interpreted as it is sought to be done, it would result in a conundrum. Let us assume that the effect of the Supreme Court judgment is that the ordinary civil Court is deprived of its jurisdiction even to determine the question of its own jurisdiction as soon as the defendant sets up a plea of tenancy and protection under the Rent Act, and that the determination of the question whether the defendant is a tenant and entitled to protection under the Rent Act is to be made by the special Court set up under s. 28 of the Rent Act. Now, if the special Court holds that the defendant's plea of tenancy and consequent protection under the Rent Act is correct, well and good. But if the special Court decides against the defendant, then it would not have jurisdiction to deal with the claim or question of title arising de hors the Rent Act. The special Court would return the plaint for presentation to proper Court viz. the ordinary civil Court. Very likely the defendant will again, though falsely, take up the plea of tenancy and consequent protection under the Rent Act. The civil Court would still have no jurisdiction to decide the dispute between the parties since the defendant, though falsely, claims that he is a tenant. It may be argued that the question having been decided by the special Court is barred by res judicata between the parties and, therefore, the civil Court would have jurisdiction to deal with such a case. But a Court in order to decide that a claim or question being agitated between the parties is barred by res judicata must have jurisdiction to try the subsequent suit. Now, if the above interpretation were to be put upon the judgment of the Supreme Court, the City Civil Court would not have jurisdiction to try the suit or to decide that the defendant's contention is barred by res judicata even after the determination of the issue by the special Court because its jurisdiction will be ousted as soon as the defendant, even though falsely, claims that he is a tenant, and entitled to protection of the Act. The Supreme Court observations are wide enough to cover all cases of claim of tenancy even where a dispute regarding the relationship between the parties has been considered by the special Court and rejected by the special Court. Thus a plaintiff would be left without any remedy. He cannot succeed in the special Court because it has no jurisdiction to assist him in the event of the relationship being otherwise than as landlord and tenant, and the civil Court will equally have no jurisdiction because of the Supreme Court judgment. Surely the Supreme Court had not intended to create such an absurd situation.

It is, therefore, respectfully submitted that the correct interpretation of the Supreme Court judgment is that the above observations only emphasize the frame of the suit. It is further submitted that the correct manner to decide the question whether s. 28 of the Rent Act applies in a given suit and consequently triable exclusively by the Small Causes Court is, as held in Jaswantilal v. "Western Comp. India" to find out what the suit as framed in substance is and what the relief claimed therein is. If the suit as framed is by a landlord or a tenant and the relief asked for is in the nature of a claim which arises out of the Act or any of its provisions, then only and not otherwise will it be covered by s. 28 of the Rent Act.

LISTER V. ROMFORD ICE CO., LTD.

If an employee, while acting in the course of his employment, is negligent and a third person suffers damage in consequence, the employee may find himself liable for that damage not only on a direct claim made against him by the third person, but also on a claim made by his employer or his employer's insurers to recover damages which either have had to pay to the third person. Authority for this proposition is to be found in Lister v. Romford Ice & Cold Storage Co., Ltd. ([1957] 1 All E.R. 125); a majority decision of the House of Lords. Under the law as it stands, therefore, whenever an employee is negligent in the course of his employment and as a result his employer becomes liable to pay damages to a third person, the employee is exposed to the risk that his employer will require him to pay the damages out of his own pocket, and it makes no difference that the employer may have covered his own liability by insurance. It is this possibility which led to the appointment, in March 1957, of an inter-departmental Committee to consider the implication of the Lister case, some aspects of which were discussed in the Journal in an article in 1956 (106 L.J. 4), shortly after the decision of the Court of Appeal in this case ([1955] 3 All E.R. 460) had been reported. The Report of the Committee has now been published: they think that the decision in the Lister case has not exposed a practical problem and that there is not any need for legislation at present.

The decision in the Lister case (supra) did not enunciate any new principle of law; it rather affirmed that an employee who is under a duty of care remains personally responsible for the consequences of his failure to exercise such care. Practical considerations have led third parties who had been injured by employees acting in the course of their employment to make their claims, not against the employee, but against the employer who will have funds to pay, and in the vast majority of cases employers have met such claims without troubling to recoup themselves by seeking to make their employees indemnify them; similarly, insurers have been reluctant to exercise their rights of subrogation against employees, save in exceptional circumstances. Cases to the contrary, which have been most infrequent, include Ryan v. Fildes ([1938] 3 All E.R. 517), Jones v. Manchester Corpn. ([1952] 2 All E.R. 125), Semtex, Ltd. v. Gladstone ([1954] 2 All E.R. 206) and Harvey v. R. G. O'Dell, Ltd. ([1958] 1 All E.R. 657). There is, as the Committee stress, little indication that employers, or insurers of employers, have been taking advantage of their right to obtain recoupment; moreover certain voluntary action has been taken both by employers and insurers which has further reduced the likelihood of employees being asked to contribute to damages paid to fellow employees as a result of their negligence. In these circumstances the Committee do not recommend that an attempt should be made to meet the problem by legislation, and this recommendation has been accepted by the Government (598 Hansard H.o.C. 33). The Committee add, however, that if in future it should appear that employers or insurers were exploiting their rights unreasonably, the problem would have to be reviewed afresh.—L.J.

BANK: NEGLIGENT ADVICE

A BANKER may, as such, give advice on investments to a customer who consults him or, indeed, to anyone who comes to him for advice and whom he chooses to advise. If he undertakes to advise, he must exercise reasonable care and skill in giving the advice, and if he does so negligently he will incur liability. Exactly the same considerations, as Lord Finlay, L.C., pointed out in his speech in Banbury v. Bank of Montreal ([1918] A.C., at p. 655) apply to the case of the manager of a branch of a bank with regard to the business which is immediately under his care as manager. In Woods v. Martins Bank, Ltd. ([1958] 3 All E.R. 166) the manager of a branch of the defendant bank agreed to act as the plaintiff's financial adviser, and in that capacity advised the plaintiff to make investments in preference shares of a private company, also a customer of that branch of the defendant bank, and to guarantee the overdraft of another small private company. The advice was honestly given, but there was no reasonable ground for advising the plaintiff in his own interest to make the investments or to guarantee the overdraft. In each case the sums advanced by the plaintiff were lost. His action for damages for negligence against the bank and the manager of the branch was successful, Salmon, J., holding that on the facts it was within the scope of the defendant's bank business to advise on financial matters, and the advice which had been given to the plaintiff was given without the ordinary care and skill that a bank manager should possess. The company whose preference shares the plaintiff bought had an overdraft with the manager's branch of the bank and the learned Judge made it clear that in his view the branch manager "ought never to have advised the plaintiff at all—certainly not without making a full disclosure to the plaintiff of the conflicting interests between the plaintiff and the defendant bank and the plaintiff and the defendant bank's other customers concerned". The Banbury case was distinguished on the ground that there the bank manager had admittedly no general authority to advise, but Lord Finlay's words on the proper course to be taken where there are conflicting interests are very much in point: "If the banker's familiarity with the subject arises from the fact that he has himself a pecuniary interest in it, he would be bound in advising the customer to make full disclosure to him of this circumstance".—L.J.

Elements of Indian Company Law. By SOHRAB R. DAVAR, Barrister-at-Law. Sixth Edition by KHORSHED D. P. MADON, Advocate, and RUSTOM S. DAVAR, Barrister-at-Law. BOMBAY: The Progressive Corporation (Private) Ltd., Jehangir Wadia Building, 51, Mahatma Gandhi Road. 1959. Demi 8vo. Pages LII+655. Price Rs. 13.50.

WE welcome a new edition of this book which is very popular with students, lawyers and businessmen. Since the publication of the last edition the new Companies Act, 1956, was promulgated. Many changes have been effected in the company law by this Act and a new edition of this book became absolutely necessary. The whole work has undergone a thorough and complete revision in the light of new amendments. All these changes have been carefully pointed out and important recent cases have been referred to. The changes made by the new enactment have been clearly explained and every effort has been made to make this edition useful in every way to students, practitioners and those who have to do anything with the company law. For the guidance of students selected examination questions have been given at the end of the book. A separate chapter at the end of the book deals with capital issue control. The Appendices include the Schedules to the Companies Act and Companies (Central Government's) General Rules and Forms. We may unhesitatingly say that this edition will be found very serviceable to the Company Secretary, company promoter, managing agent, the director and professional men who have to deal with Company Law.

Modi's Text Book of Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology. Edited by N. J. MODI, M.B., M.B.O.P. (LOND.). BOMBAY: N. M. Tripathi (Private) Ltd., Princess Street. Thirteenth Edition. 1959. Roy. 8vo. Pages 808. Price Rs. 25.

In this edition the learned author has carefully and thoroughly revised every section of the book. He has incorporated new cases of medico-legal importance. Several new sections dealing with fresh matter have been added. The section on inter-sex has been entirely rewritten and the section on toxicology has been brought up-to-date. In revising this edition various text books have been consulted and the whole matter has been carefully scrutinised from the medico-legal standpoint. Medical practitioners and lawyers will find this edition extremely useful.

We welcome a new edition of this work. The provisions of the two Acts have been fully and carefully explained in a lucid style and the case law has been brought up-to-date. Students of law will find this edition extremely useful for studying the provisions of these two Acts.

Recognition in the Law of Nations. By SATYAVRATAN RAMDAS PATEL, LL.M., Advocate, High Court, Bombay. BOMBAY: N. M. Tripathi (Private) Ltd., Princes Street. 1959. Demi 8vo. Pages ix+122. Price Rs. 15.

THIS book contains a brief exposition of the law of nations. It critically examines the theoretical aspects of the whole question. Certain imperfections of International law are clearly pointed out. International law does not bind the states of the world in a common legal system. It is applied by states according to their own discretion. International law should be freed from various substantive and procedural defects. The whole subject is divided into twenty-three chapters and the discussion is very illuminating.

The Finance Acts of 1958 & 1959 and the Indian Income-tax Act, the Wealth-tax Act, and the Expenditure-tax Act. By A. N. AIYAR, B.A., B.L., Advocate, Supreme Court, and T. A. RAMACHANDRAN, B.A., B.L., Advocate, High Court, Madras. MADRAS: Company Law Institute of India (Private) Ltd., 21, Thyagaraya Road. 1959. Roy. 8vo. Pages c+viii+133+lv. Price Rs. 14.00.

THIS is a very thoughtful commentary on the various Acts incorporated in this work. The intricate provisions of several sections of the various Acts have been carefully explained in simple language. The annotations are analytical and critical and they throw fresh light on many provisions of these complicated Acts. Persons who have to tackle the provisions of these Acts will find the book very serviceable.

SECTION 102C OF THE BOMBAY LOCAL BOARDS ACT AND THE ANOMALOUS POSITION OF TAXATION APPEALS.*

Section 113 of the Bombay Local Boards Act of 1923 provides for an appeal to a Judicial Magistrate against the quantum of tax levied by a Local Board. The opening two sentences and sub-cl. (1) of s. 113 are as follows:

"Appeals against any notice of demand issued under sub-section (3) of section 104 may be made to any Judicial Magistrate or Bench of such Magistrates by whom under the directions of the Sessions Judge such class of cases is to be tried. But no such appeal shall be heard and determined unless—

(a) the appeal is brought within fifteen days next after service of the notice of demand complained of;"

The plain and literal meaning of the above clearly is that an appeal is competent against the Notice of Demand and that the same must have been issued under s. 104(3) of the Bombay Local Boards Act. There has been occasion for the interpretation of this section and it has been held in *District Local Board, (W.K.) v. Kutuballi*¹ that under this provision of s. 113 appeal is competent only upon issue of the Demand Notice. The jurisdiction in the Judicial Magistrate to entertain and hear the appeal is vested only upon the issue of the Demand Notice, and, however disputable the quantum of tax may be, no statutory remedy of this appeal is available to the tax payer without issue of this Demand Notice. Just as the said s. 113 mentions that appeal against any notice of demand can be filed to a Judicial Magistrate, it also in unequivocal terms states that such notice will be Notice of Demand issued under s. 104(3) of the Bombay Local Boards Act, and the words such appeal in the second sentence of s. 113 refer to an appeal against the Notice of Demand issued under s. 104(3) of the Act. Though in the case of the District Local Board, (W.K.) v. Kutuballi, specific point about the second proposition viz. that the Demand Notice must be under s. 104(3) of the Act was not before their Lordships, still there is clear expression therein that the Demand Notice must be the Demand Notice issued under s. 104(3) of the Bombay Local Boards Act. It is observed in the said case (p. 1237):—

"The opening words of the section, namely, 'Appeals against any notice of demand issued under sub-section (3) of section 104 may be made' would show that before a Judicial Magistrate or a Bench of Judicial Magistrates can exercise jurisdiction under the section, there ought to be in existence a notice of demand issued by the Local Board under sub-s. (3) of s. 104 of the Act. Then again, the words 'No such appeal shall be heard and determined' would also show that the jurisdiction to proceed with the hearing of the appeal made under s. 113 of the Act does not vest in the Judicial Magistrate unless a notice of demand has in the first instance been issued against the person concerned by the Local Board. The words 'such appeal' in the expression 'No such appeal shall be heard and determined' are important. They refer to an appeal against a notice of demand issued under sub-s. (3) of s. 104."

In theory it cannot be disputed that an appeal is intended against the levy of tax. However the remedy of appeal has to be specifically provided for in the enactment by specific provisions and the provisions investing and divesting jurisdiction are subjected to the rule of strict interpretation. It also further appears from the scheme of the various Acts concerning the Local Bodies that only one appeal is provided whether it be at the stage of the levy of tax or at the collection stage. Taxation by Local Authorities has two important phases. First is the levy and the other is the recovery or the collection procedure. In fact the corner stone of taxation is the Assessment List. The recovery or collection phase under the Local Boards Act is provided under Chapter VIII. Issue of Bill is provided at s. 104(1) and Notice of Demand is provided under s. 104(3) and the appeals are provided at s. 113, and this is at the stage of collection. Under provisions of the Village Panchayats Act in the repealed Act of 1933, Assessment List was provided at s. 89 and the Bill under s. 91(1), notice demanding the amount which is named as Writ of Demand was provided under s. 91(2) but the appeal remedy therein was provided at the stage of levy of the tax under s. 89(3). The same scheme is adhered to in the new Act III of 1959, wherein appeal against levy is provided at s. 124(5) and issue of the Bill and Writ of Demand are provided at ss. 129 (1) and 129(2) respectively. Under the Municipal Boroughs Act taxation appeals are provided at s. 110. The old s. 110 of the Municipal Boroughs Act as it stood prior to the amendment by Act XXXVI of 1949 was similar to the Local Boards Act and remedy of appeal was provided against Notice of Demand issued under s. 194(3) of that Act. By the amending Act XXXVI of 1949 after the words "appeal against" the words "any notice of demand issued under section 104(3)" were deleted and also similar words in s. 110(2)(a) were deleted and at that place words "any claim included in the bill presented under section 104(1)" were added and suitable further amendment to s. 110(2)(a) was also made. By this amendment appeals became competent upon issue of the bill under s. 104(1) of that Act and within fifteen days after the presentation of the bill. This amendment was made to avoid inequitable position that the tax payer had to wait till the issue of the Demand Notice and had to pay along with the bill amount, the charges of the Demand Notice though he would be willing to pay the bill amount on presentation of bill but that he could not pay the same because if he paid the same the Demand Notice would not be issued and appeal itself would not be competent. However, by the added words in s. 110 of the Municipal Boroughs Act, it is probably sought to be made clear that an appeal is provided not against the Demand Notice but against the bill. The newly added words also do indicate that appeal contemplated is against the levy of the tax itself, because appeal is provided not against the bill but against the claim included in the bill. However, the appeal limitation is provided as fifteen days from the presentation of the bill and it also can be said that it is the bill upon presentation of which appeal under s. 110 becomes competent and that it is presentation of bill that gives jurisdiction to the Judicial Magistrate to hear the appeal. In any case, so far as the Local Boards Act is concerned there is no such provision made as is found in the Municipal Boroughs Act and under Local Boards Act the appeal is against the Notice of Demand.

Now, reverting over to the main theme, provisions of s. 102C may be looked into. It may be noted that the District Local Board is authorized to levy tax on profession, trades and callings and so also are the Village Panchayats and the residents of the Village Panchayats are subject to the taxation jurisdiction both of the Local Board and also the Village Panchayat, and to avoid such taxation by both the Local Board and the Village Panchayat on the same tax payer it has been provided by Act XLIII of 1955 that a Village Panchayat shall not levy a tax on the profession, trades or callings on the residents of the Village Panchayat so long as such tax is levied upon them by the Local Board, but that such percentage not exceeding 50 per cent. of the collection of such tax (as the State Government may determine) shall be paid to the Village Panchayat and that the Village Panchayat should effect the tax collection work of the Local Board. The important s. 102C inserted in the Local Boards Act by s. 6 of Act XLIII of 1955 further provides that notwithstanding the provisions of the Local Boards Act the Village Panchayat should undertake the work of collection under provisions of the Village Panchayats Act and as if such tax is imposed by itself and consequently collection work could not be done by the Local Board under the provisions of the Local Boards Act. This important provision of s. 102C is as follows:

"Where in exercise of the powers given by this Act a district local board imposes a tax on professions, trades, callings and employments, then notwithstanding in this Act or any other law for the time being in force, in any area within the limits of a village panchayat constituted under the Bombay Village Panchayats Act, 1933,—

(a) such tax shall be collected by the village panchayat concerned from those persons who are liable to pay the tax under the rules made by a district local board and who reside or carry on any trade or exercise any profession or follow a calling within such area, in accordance with the provisions of sections 91 and 92 of the Bombay Village Panchayats Act, 1933, as if it was a tax imposed by it under the provisions of the said Act and shall be paid to the district local board at such time and in such manner as the district local board may specify;

(b) such percentage not exceeding 50 per cent. of the gross collection of such tax in any financial year as the State Government may by general or special order determine shall not form part of the local fund of the district local board but shall be assigned to the village panchayat in such manner as the district local board may determine." (Italics are mine)

Thus, under s. 102C of the Bombay Local Boards Act, collection of the tax on the professions, trades and callings levied by the Local Board upon residents of the area of Village Panchayat is to be effected notwithstanding the Local Boards Act provisions and by the Village Panchayat and that is to be done under the provisions of the Village Panchayats Act only. Therefore, in such cases relevant provisions for issue of Bill, Demand Notice of s. 104 of the Local Boards Act cannot be invoked and the provisions of the Village Panchayats Act regarding issue of Bill, Writ of Demand and distress Warrant has to be availed of. Thus for the purpose of collection of such tax, bill will be issued under provisions of the Village Panchayats Act and if the amount is not paid then writ of demand will be issued. In any event in such cases neither bill nor Notice of Demand will be issued at any time, under respective provisions of ss. 104(1) and 104(3) of the Bombay Local Boards Act. Now the question is that if Notice of Demand under Local Boards Act and under provisions of s. 104(3) of Local Boards Act is not issued and cannot be issued whether an appeal will be competent under s. 113 of the Local Boards Act?

Before concluding that an anomaly exists it must be considered as to what is the intention of the Legislature in providing collection of such tax by the Village Panchayat and whether in such cases an appeal is intended under provisions of the Village Panchayats Act. Section 9 of the amending Act XLIII of 1955 itself provides by insertion of s 31(2) (bb) that the collected proceeds of tax on professions, trades and callings assigned under s 102C of the Local Boards Act will form part of the Village Panchayat fund. The amount is so assigned as if in lieu of the restraints imposed upon it. So Village Panchayat has more interest in the collection work which is done not merely as an agent. The assignment of such high percentage (of about 50 per cent.) of the collection could not be allotted to the Village Panchayat merely as an agent doing collection work. It is stated at s. 102C that such tax shall be collected by the Village Panchayat as if it was a tax imposed by it under the provisions of the Village Panchayats Act. If the idea was that the Village Panchayat was merely a tax collecting agency it would have been merely stated that tax collection provisions of the Village Panchayats Act will apply and that the tax shall be deemed to be a tax of the Village Panchayat for that purpose. But the wordings are that it is to be treated as a tax imposed by the Village Panchayat itself and these are perhaps very meaningful words and it might appear that the Legislature intended that appeal in such cases would be under the provisions of the Village Panchayats Act. Also when the collection work would be done by the Village Panchayat it would retain amount upto 50 per cent. of the tax amount and it would be strange to ask the Local Board to refund the amount part of which in fact would not have been received by it. (In such cases at least it appears that an appeal against only the Local Board will not be sufficient.) However, first difficulty for such consideration is that the Village Panchayats Act does not provide for any appeal against or after the issue of the Bill or the Writ of Demand. Under the scheme of the Village Panchayats Act appeal remedy is not available after the stage of Bill and Demand Notice. Now if remedy of appeal for such cases is to be read as provided at the stage of levy of assessment list then the difficulty is that there is no such specific provision made in the Village Panchayats Act when s. 102C has been inserted. It would also mean that though under Local Boards Act appeal remedy is provided upon payment of the claim dues with demand notice charges such appeal, contrary to the intention of the Local Boards Act would be available without such payment. Ex facie the Village Panchayat does merely the collection work and comes into picture only after the assessment list is prepared and finalised by the Local Board. Also it will not be possible to invoke appeal provisions of the Village Panchayats Act at the assessment stage, as then the Local Board would not be desisted of its function and of its jurisdiction. It appears clear that the Legislature never intended that appeal provisions under the Village Panchayats Act should be available in such cases, because appeals under the Village Panchayats Act are provided against the levy of the tax which is initially imposed by the Village Panchayat itself. This is also clear from the nature of forum provided for such appeals. It also sounds queer to have different remedies of appeal under different provisions of law and to different forum for the levy of the tax of the same Local Board. To non-residents of Village Panchayat there will be available a remedy of appeal under s. 113 of the Local Boards Act and for them the authority will be a Judicial Magistrate. If appeal is available under the Village Panchayats Act at the levy of assessment stage then the forum will be under the old Act the Standing Committee of the Local Board and under the new Act of 1959 to the Panchayat Mandal. Further it would mean availability of appeal remedy two times viz. at the stage of the Assessment List as specifically provided therein and at the stage of the Writ of Demand impliedly, for the purposes of such cases as would come under the provisions of s. 102C of the Local Boards Act. Thus it is not possible to reconcile the position and say that the Legislature had in its mind that appeals in such cases where collection work is done by the Village Panchayats should be under provisions of the Village Panchayats Act.

As stated at the outset an appeal under provisions of s. 113 of the Local Boards Act will be competent upon issue of Demand Notice under s. 104(3) of the Local Boards Act because appeal is provided only against the Notice of Demand issued under provisions of s. 104(3) of the Local Boards Act. Firstly "Writ of Demand" so issued under provisions of the Village Panchayats Act will be a different terminology than "Notice of Demand". Further this writ of demand will be issued under provisions of the Village Panchayats Act and not under s. 104(3) of the Bombay Local Boards Act. Though in theory appeal is against the levy of the tax still in reality there must be some clear and substantive provisions under which the tax payer gets the right to file the appeal and by which jurisdiction to entertain the appeal can be invoked by the authority appointed for that purpose. At present such provision is only under s. 113 of the Local Boards Act and it is difficult to see how writ of demand issued under provisions of the Village Panchayats Act can give such rights which accrue only upon the issue of the Notice of Demand under s. 104(3) of the Bombay Local Boards Act. However, apart from other difficulties, it appears evident that on plain reading of s. 113 of the Local Boards Act, in absence of Notice of Demand under s. 104(3) of the Bombay Local Boards Act, a tax payer will not be able to avail himself of the remedy of appeal provided under s. 113 of the Act. In effect the remedy of appeal is in the statute book but the tax payer cannot avail of it because Notice of Demand would not be issued by the Local Board. That the tax payer should be deprived of his valuable remedy of appeal under such circumstances is really a very hard consequence. It is submitted that this anomalous position need to be corrected by a suitable amendment.

RIGHTS OF AN AUTHOR

REPORTED cases on the rights and liabilities of authors, editors and publishers between themselves are not many, and the recent decision in Joseph v. National Magazine Co., Ltd. ([1958] 3 All E.R. 52) provides an occasion for considering a field of law which seldom comes before the Courts.

In that case the question was of the right of an author to have his article published in the form in which he wrote it or to recover for breach of contract. Equally the case raised the question of the right of the editor to have a contributor's article altered or re-written and then to publish it under the name of the contributor or anonymously. Needless to say the rights of the editor will always depend on any special contract, and in Joseph's case the decision rested on the nature of the contract. But as the contract was one come to by word of mouth with no very specific terms, the case is of general interest.

The plaintiff was an antique dealer who specialised in jade. He was not a writer in any professional way. The defendant company was the publisher of a magazine The Connoisseur, which occupied a prominent position in its own line. It appeared that the contract arose out of a visit by a representative of the defendant company to the plaintiff's premises for the purpose of selling him advertising space. The plaintiff had recently acquired two jade plaques and suggested that instead of their being advertised in the advertisement columns they should appear in the editorial columns with an article on them by the plaintiff. This would have been less costly to the plaintiff and would have given him the enhancement of his reputation accorded to contributors to such a magazine.

There was controversy as to the terms of the contract and the date when it was made; the Judge found that the contract was to publish an article of a page in length (about 1,000 words) to be written by the plaintiff and that in fact the plaintiff's first article was withdrawn by the plaintiff and his second attempt accepted. A third attempt was subsequently produced, apparently the same as the second one except for a number of minor corrections. When the editor received the second attempt he was not satisfied with its style; so he sent it to a professional journalist, who had some knowledge of jade, for the purpose of re-writing it for The Connoisseur. This was done, and the re-written version was sent to the plaintiff for correction, but after the third version had been received.

The receipt of the re-written second attempt was a shock to the plaintiff who immediately wrote rejecting it on various grounds including, according to the plaintiff, errors of fact and also alterations which had taken away the plaintiff's theme by a change in title and the like. He also pointed out that his third attempt had been ignored but His Lordship found that the editor was not bound to consider the third attempt having, at the time of its receipt, already commenced to deal with the second attempt.

The plaintiff issued a writ for specific performance and damages, and the case came to be heard by Harman, J.

The questions for decision were fairly free from authority, but on general principles one would say straight away that a contract to write an article or a book would not be enforced by the remedy of specific performance because the Court cannot effectively see that an author will fulfil his part of the bargain in a way which the other party must necessarily accept and, as specific performance must usually be reciprocal, i.e., it must be possible for either party to require it of the other, that difficulty would be fatal. But there is a circumstance where that rule will not apply, and there is a decision of Danckwerts, J. (not reported in the law reports, but mentioned in (1951) 62 The Author 2, at p. 38, vis., Barrow v. Chappell & Co., Ltd.), to the effect that where the contract relates to a work already in existence, specific performance may be ordered. In such a case the difficulty mentioned above does not arise. In the case in question the contract was to publish a piece of music already composed and previously performed.

In Joseph's case there was never an agreement as to what detail should be published. The second attempt was not accepted by the editor since he had it re-written; the re-written version was not accepted by the plaintiff and the third version was not considered by the editor.

It is important to notice however that Harman, J., did not find that there was no contract. There was a contract to publish an article of about 1,000 words and Harman, J., decided—and this is really the crux of the case—that the plaintiff was entitled to have the article published in his own words under his own name. His Lordship accepted that the editor would have the right to shorten any article found to be too long and make corrections of mistakes or possibly grammatical changes; but the plaintiff was not bound to submit to having his name published as the author of a different article expressing other opinions in a different style.

The defendants argued that, if there was a breach of contract, damages should only be nominal because the plaintiff, it was contended, was merely seeking publicity and this he could have had if he had agreed to the publication of the re-write under his name. The learned Judge rejected this contention because he took the view that the plaintiff's object was to enhance his reputation as an expert on jade, and this he was entitled to do within reasonable limits in his own way. His Lordship considered that the plaintiff was justified in rejecting the re-write as being inferior in style and as one which would not be an assistance to the plaintiff's reputation but the reverse. The plaintiff's claim for damages therefore succeeded.

It would not be practicable to dismiss this case as simply one where the editor had not been careful enough in selecting his contributor having regard to the style which the editor desired, or not being careful enough not to be committed to publish an article before seeing it. There must be many editors who simply would not find it practicable always to close these gaps. It is believed that generally editors put responsibility for contributions on the author and in cases of conflict of view they may accompany an article with a disclaimer by the editor for concurrence in the view expressed. Readers may, no doubt, be inclined to put some responsibility on an editor for selection of an article but this can sometimes be dealt with by a statement that the editor has asked the writer for an article and his contribution follows. No doubt the defendant in Joseph's case had reasons for not adopting those expedients, but it is understandable that a contributor may object to his work being re-written by another and then being published anonymously or under the contributor's name. One would also think that readers prefer to believe that what purports to be written by a named individual is in fact written by him, even though in some cases this is not so. A recent example of "ghost" writing is reported in Housden v. Marshall ([1958] 3 All E.R. 639)—a tax case.—L.J.

STATUTORY OFFENCE: MENS REA

It is a fundamental principle of the common law that to constitute a criminal offence, the guilty act must be accompanied by guilty intention. The principle derives from an age when statute law bulked less largely in the criminal law than it does at present, but even in regard to statutory provisions it is well established that, in the absence of a clear indication to the contrary, the intention of a statute is presumed to be that some kind of mens rea is necessary in order to constitute the offence which it enacts (cf. Brend v. Wood [1946] 62 T.L.R. 462, 463). Yet that presumption is not universal, and only if on the proper construction of an enactment according to its terms and objects mens rea is not expressly or by necessary implication excluded, will it be regarded as essential. The most recent instance where the presumption was negatived is R. v. St. Margaret's Trust ([1958] 2 All E.R. 289), a case in which a finance company found itself—unwittingly—in breach of the Hire-Purchase and Credit Sale Agreements (Control) Order, 1956, which makes it an offence for any person to dispose of certain goods under a hire-purchase or credit sale agreement unless a specified percentage of the cash price is paid before signing the agreement. In this case dealers in motor cars accepted less than the required deposit for the sale of a motor car on hire-purchase terms. They inserted a falsely inflated cash price in the agreement and thereby induced the finance company to advance a larger sum than they would have done if the true cash price had been disclosed. Since the requirement of the Order of 1956 that fifty per cent. of the cash price must be paid before signing the agreement was thus not satisfied, the finance company, by entering into the transaction had, though acting innocently, in fact contravened art. 1 of the Order. Their appeal against conviction was dismissed by the Court of Criminal Appeal on the ground that the terms of art. 1 of the Order considered together with the object of the Order made the prohibited act an offence although the act was innocently done: "The importance of not doing what is prohibited is such", Donovan, J., observed in delivering the judgment of the Court, "that the method of business must be rearranged so as to give the necessary knowledge."—L.J.

MOVING WITH THE TIMES

We agree with Lord Denning that lawyers should play an active part in law reform. Our readers will have noticed that in these pages we publish occasional articles on the need to change the law and we have heard comments to the effect that the business of solicitors is to deal with the law as it is and not to reason why, and that we should leave law reform to politicians and other social reformers. While laymen frequently see more of the ill effects of an existing law than the lawyers, we believe that the only effective law reformers can be the lawyers themselves. Only we have the necessary experience and knowledge to be able to judge not only whether the present state of the law is unjust, but also whether any change would bring with it more benefits than the ills which it is designed to remedy. Although Parliament contains a majority of non-lawyers, the legal strength in Parliament is such as to ensure that law reform is carefully and patiently studied before it is brought into effect. In recent years, in particular, lawyers have taken the initiative in promoting several measures of law reform. We believe that it is right, as Lord Denning said in his recent Romanes Lecture, that legal principles should be like the propositions of scientist, which fall to be modified when shown not to fit all instances or even discarded when shown to be in error. In our view, it is not enough to rely on the Courts and we applaud the way in which the present Lord Chancellor and his predecessors have encouraged and kept alive the constant review of the existing law which is the function of the Law Reform Committee. To this movement the Council of The Law Society have made a substantial contribution and the appendices to successive annual reports of the Council have been a most valuable source of reform.—S.J.

MIDDLE CLASS MORALITY?

WHEREAS others besides admirers of Bernard Shaw will be aware that there are differences in outlook between what are inexactly described as the middle classes and those who are even more inexactly described as the working classes, we believe that Lady Wootton's statement that "what motoring offences are to one class, theft is to another; that is all there is to it", is based on entirely false premises. First, driving motor vehicles is not the monopoly of any one class. The millionaire and the moujik take much the same view about the speed limit, i.e., one is unlucky if one is caught. Secondly, we are not aware that theft is condoned among any class. We agree it is difficult to understand why a man who is convicted of, say, some offence involving dishonesty or some minor homo-sexual offence should be regarded as unfit to hold public office whereas men who have been convicted of dangerous driving, or even of driving while under the influence of drink, have apparently been able to continue in or even to embark upon public office. The Times was probably right when it commented that those who commit motoring offences do so for the most part without criminal intent, and Lady Wootton's own description of such offences as selfish is probably fairly near the truth. While most people would regard dangerous driving and driving while under the influence of drink as morally reprehensible, the vast majority of motoring offences are committed in moments of mental aberration. It might be sound to invent a new category of administrative offences, since it may be morally unsound to put exceeding the speed limit and even careless driving in the same category as crimes in the strict sense of the word.—S.J.

ROOTS: LIABILITY IN NUISANCE

IN a recent action in the High Court (Mayer v. Deptford Corporation), Jones, J., dismissed a claim for damages in respect of damage to a house owned by the plaintiff which, it was alleged, was a result of subsidence caused by the roots of a tree in the street growing underneath the plaintiff's garden and taking moisture from under her house. The action was unsuccessful as the evidence did not satisfy his Lordship that it was the growth of the tree which had caused the settlement, not because no action will lie in any circumstances in respect of damage caused by roots growing under the plaintiff's land. Indeed, in Lemmon v. Webb [1893] 3 Ch. 1, it was said that in this connection projecting branches and roots should be treated in the same way and that, if the roots of a tree grew into a neighbour's soil and damaged his property, the owner of the land on which the tree was growing would be liable in nuisance. This view was confirmed by the Court of Appeal in Davey v. Harrow Corporation [1957] 2 W.L.R. 941, where Lord Goddard, C.J., found that "it must be taken to be established law that, if trees encroach, whether by branches or roots, and cause damage, an action for nuisance will lie," whether the trees were planted or self-sown. However, an action for damages is not the only remedy available to a person whose property suffers as a result of the intrusion of the roots of trees growing on adjoining land. In McCombe v. Read [1955] 1 W.L.R. 635, an injunction was granted to restrain the defendants from allowing the roots of any tree on their property so to encroach on the plaintiff's land as to cause a nuisance.—S.J.

AERIAL CROP DUSTING

IN the United States, aerial crop dusting has become an effective and relatively inexpensive method of killing weeds, even among growing crops but experience has shown that this process may result in loss to the owners of adjoining land. For example, in McKennon v. Jones [1951], 244 S.W. 2d. 138, the defendant intended to dust his cotton crops but in fact he also dusted the plaintiff's bees and their hives with the poisonous particles. Who should bear the loss: the plaintiff or the defendant? This question was considered in a note in the Minnesota Law Review, vol. 43, No. 3. The writer found that the courts of the United States have reached fairly similar results in aerial crop dusting cases but that the theories of recovery adopted by the courts have been far from uniform. Most courts appear to imply that the plaintiff can recover only after proving that the spraying operation was conducted negligently, but only one court, the Texas Civil Appeals Court, has gone so far as to say that the person who suffers damage is without a remedy unless there is evidence of negligence. On the other hand, the Supreme Court of Louisiana has decided that "negligence or fault, in these circumstances, is not a requisite to liability" and other courts have found strict liability under the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher on the ground of "non-natural" user of the defendant's land. Although he appreciates that it would discourage crop dusting in areas where the risk of damage to others is high, the writer of the note believes that strict liability is the most reasonable approach. He suggests that all the States should enact that those who apply the dust should be made absolutely liable for all crop dusting damage and that they should be adequately insured. It would be interesting to see how an English court would approach this problem.—S.J.

CRIMINAL INVESTIGATION

It is well known that fewer criminals would be convicted if it were not for the statements that they make, with or without caution, to the police. It would be a miscarriage of justice if an admission or a confession made to the police could not be given in evidence to prove the guilt of the accused. It would equally be a miscarriage of justice to admit admissions and confessions obtained by threats or inducements. Although we pride ourselves on observing the principle that in this country no man is bound to convict himself out of his own mouth, not so much because of any false sympathy for the guilty but because of fears that the innocent may be wrongfully trapped, it sometimes happens that the police are able to secure from the accused himself the evidence they need for a conviction long before they are required by the Judges' Rules to administer a caution. Indeed, it often happens that the necessity for a caution only arises at the point when the inquiries of the police are no longer in danger of being hampered by giving it. There is some public disquiet on the subject. Several Members of the House of Commons have put their names to a motion asking that no alleged confession of anyone charged with a criminal offence shall be admissible in evidence in any court unless made in the presence of a magistrate. Justice—the British section of the International Commission of Jurists—have appointed a committee under the chairmanship of Mr. F. H. Lawton, Q.C., to consider the law and practice of the examination of persons charged with criminal offences with reference to the examination by police and committing magistrates, the taking and admissibility of confessions, and the desirability of making the defendant give early notice of the main lines of his defence. In the last particular the aims of Justice go beyond the House of Commons' motion. As a corollary of the principle that no man should be bound to convict himself out of his own mouth, in this country we accept the principle that no man is bound to say anything in answer to a charge or to give evidence on his own behalf, either at the preliminary examination or at his trial. Nevertheless, there are judicial dicta indicating that it may be proper for a Judge in his summing-up to comment on the fact that an alibi was not disclosed before the trial, thus giving the prosecution no opportunity of testing it. We have some sympathy with the idea that the defence should be bound to give prior notice of certain lines of defence, particularly an alibi, although we would resist anything in the nature of formal pleadings. What is wrong is that there should be no clear law on the subject. So long as the caution exists in its present form, the complete silence of the prisoner should not be adversely commented on in any way.—S.J.

PRIVILEGE FOR PARSONS!

STATEMENTS are said to be absolutely privileged when no action will lie in respect of them no matter how false and defamatory or even malicious they may be. Such privilege exists, inter alia, in the case of statements made in the course of and with reference to judicial proceedings by a Judge, member of a jury, party, witness or advocate and in respect of statements made in Parliament by a member of either House. The recent case of Harris v. Collins (1959), The Times, 17th April, an action for slander by three members of the League of Empire Loyalists against the Rev. Canon John Collins in respect of implications made in the course of a sermon preached in St. Paul's Cathedral, prompted Mr. Cecil Binney to write to The Times (21st April) to suggest that the law of defamation should be amended as "absolute privilege ought to apply to a sermon preached in an Anglican church, or at least to one preached in a cathedral." We do not agree. As it stands, the law provides that no action may be brought for the publication of a defamatory statement if the defendant pleads and proves that it is true as "the law will not permit a man to recover damages in respect of an injury to a character which he either does not, or ought not to, possess" (per Littledale, J., in M'Pherson v. Daniels (1829), 10 B. & C. 263). In view of this, it cannot be said that the law imposes unreasonable restraint upon pulpit utterances, even upon those of such a courageous and forthright preacher as Canon Collins. It has been said that "a strong and faithful pulpit is no mean safeguard of a nation's life." This is true, but the meaning of "faithful" must include "true to fact", and the maker of a statement which satisfies this requirement is already adequately protected by the law.—S.J.

A CASE OF WRONGFUL DISMISSAL

THE Court of Appeal in Laws v. London Chronicle (Indicator Newspapers), Limited recently upheld the decision of Judge Sir Edgar Dale awarding the plaintiff £45 damages for wrongful dismissal. The Master of the Rolls, in the course of a judgment with which the other members of the court agreed, said that the law to be applied was stated in Halsbury's Laws of England (3rd edn., Vol. 25, p. 486) where it was said that a single instance of insolence in the case of a servant in the position of a newspaper critic would hardly justify dismissal. The passage to which his Lordship referred appears in a note (citing Edwards v. Levy, 1860, 2 F. & F. 94) qualifying a statement in the text setting out several reasons for which a servant may be dismissed summarily—among them if he "is insulting and insubordinate to such a degree as to be incompatible with the continuance of the relation of master and servant." The Master of the Rolls went on to say that, since a contract of service was but an example of contracts in general, the general law of contract was applicable. If summary dismissal was claimed to be justifiable, the question must be whether the conduct complained of was such as to show that the servant disregarded the essential conditions of the contract of service. It was, no doubt, generally true that wilful disobedience of an order would justify summary dismissal, since such disobedience showed a deliberate disregard of a condition essential to the contract of service and, unless the servant obeyed the proper orders of the master, the relation was struck at fundamentally. But the statement of the law in Halsbury also said: "There is no fixed rule of law defining the degree of misconduct which will justify dismissal."—L.T.

REPORTABILITY: LAW AND FACT

Few people, probably, would quarrel with the statement that under a system of precedent the basic legal reason for reporting a case is that it establishes, extends or modifies, a principle of law. In our generation new law is made, however, by statute, and the interpretation of statutes accounts for many reported cases. The statement with which we began is the classic rule. It is too narrow today. The truth is nearer to this—that there exists, and has existed for generations, a demand for reports of cases, and that in our main series of reports a balance is found between two extremes, namely, that of reporting every case (which would satisfy the demand and has had distinguished advocates, but might surfeit other readers) and that of keeping to the classic rule that we have stated, which in the last century has never satisfied practitioners and might indeed, if strictly applied, cause the precedent system to die of inanition rather than surfeit. The demand is based on what helps practitioners with their work. It is here that the question of reporting cases for fact becomes acute. The practitioner has to try to apply old principles amid new developments of science, in changed conditions and under varying conceptions of social duty. He is in need of guidance. The approach of Judges to problems arising at the present day explains to practitioners the application of old principles in new conditions; it may be a valued guide, even though new law is not created. The reporting of cases illustrating this application of established principles is essential to the existence of a sufficient degree of certainty to enable clients to be advised, and litigation to be brought, settled or fought on the real issues. That is the main purpose that reports serve, not solely that the decisions reported make or modify legal principles. It is the proper and useful function of reports to satisfy the need for guidance, avoiding excess so far as is possible.—L.J.

SUMMARY DISMISSAL

In Spain v. Arnott (1817), 2 Stark. 256, Lord Ellenborough found that in the case of a yearly servant, "after a refusal on the part of the servant to perform his work, the master is not bound to keep him on as a burthensome and useless servant to the end of the year." In his judgment in Turner v. Mason (1845), 14 M. & W. 112, Parke, B., took the words of Lord Ellenborough to mean that "the wilful disobedience of any lawful order of the master is a good cause of discharge" of the contract of service. However, in Laws v. London Chronicle (Indicator Newspapers), Ltd. (1959), The Times, 23rd April, the Court of Appeal took the view that it was going too far to say that every act of disobedience to a lawful order entitled the employer to dismiss the servant without notice. The Master of the Rolls was of the opinion that summary dismissal was justified only where the conduct of the servant was such as to show that he had disregarded the essential conditions of the contract of service but, for this reason, his Lordship conceded that summary dismissal was normally justified where the servant had wilfully disobeyed an order. In Laws' case, an action for damages for wrongful dismissal, it was held that the conduct of the plaintiff did not amount to such a wilful disobedience of an order as justified the defendant employer saying to her: "I treat the contract as ended and summarily dismiss you."—S.J.

FORGING A WILL

It is our impression that there are few prosecutions under s. 2(1)(a) of the Forgery Act, 1913, for forging "any will, codicil or other testamentary document either of a dead or of a living person," but recently at Norwich the son of a deceased was sent for trial charged with that offence in respect of a will which he maintained had been executed by his father. It seems that it is no defence for the accused to show that the will alleged to have been forged has been admitted to probate. Authority for this may be found in R. v. Buttery (1818), Russ. & Ry. 342, where nine Judges were unanimous in upholding the overruling of a contention that as probate of the will which the prisoners were alleged to have forged had been granted and remained unrevoked, it was conclusive evidence of the validity of the will. A point of practical importance in relation to a will which is alleged to have been forged was resolved by R. v. Jones (1846), 1 Den. 166. In that case the accused put a forged will into his solicitor's hands ostensibly for the purpose of seeking professional advice, but in reality in the hope that the solicitor would act upon it. It was held that the will had not been given to the solicitor in professional confidence and that the rule as to privileged communications between solicitor and client did not apply. It is also an offence under s. 2(1)(a) of the 1913 Act to forge "any probate or letters of administration, whether with or without the will annexed."—S.J.

DEVELOPMENT OF CASE LAW

We may carry the matter one stage further. Sometimes it is the demand which seems to prevail over logic in law reporting. There is an outstanding recent example in the case of Wintle v. Nye ([1959] 1 All E.R. 552). We venture to repeat the view that we expressed previously in these columns that the decision was not truly reportable as it was a decision of fact—a view which the existence of some observations, in the leading opinion in the House of Lords, on the scope of admissible evidence in a probate case where fraud was not alleged gives us no occasion to alter. The case was ultimately reported because of the demand for it—it is memorable, but it carries the law no step beyond where it was before. Qualcast (Wolverhampton), Ltd. v. Haynes ([1959] 2 All E.R. 38), which gives rise to these paragraphs, was itself a case on the relationship of master and servant and the duty of care, and observations in one of the speeches might seem to lead to the view that there was little to be added by future cases on that branch of the law. Yet it was only in this year that two cases were before the House of Lords, Davis v. New Merton Board Mills ([1959] 1 All E.R. 346) and Smith v. Austin Lifts, Ltd. ([1959] 1 All E.R. 81); both of which were on the discharge of the duty of a master to his servant and both of which, it is suggested, were unquestionably important cases for report. The tide of the law is never still. Its advances are gradual, perhaps almost imperceptible, and yet when one looks back after many years the waters have swept forward. Reports show the ebb and flow of changing trends, but not every report can be expected to show a substantial change in legal principle.—L.J.

WRONGFUL DISMISSAL

WILFUL disobedience to the lawful and reasonable order of the master justifies summary dismissal. There is a number of authorities establishing this general proposition, most of them of venerable antiquity: among them is Turner v. Mason [(1845) 14 M. & W. 112] on which reliance was placed by the employers in the latest case on the subject, Laws v. London Chronicle (Indicator Newspapers, Ltd.) ([1959] 2 All E. R. 285). The servant's isolated act of disobedience in that case consisted in leaving a conference room when she was requested by the chairman and managing director of the company, her employers, to remain. In her action for damages for wrongful dismissal, she was awarded £ 45 by the county court Judge, and the employers' appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed. Commenting on Turner v. Mason, the Master of the Rolls said it would be going too far to assert that any of the Judges there laid it down as a proposition of law that every act of disobedience to a lawful order entitled the employer to dismiss the servant. Thus, in Edwards v. Levy [(1860) 2 F. & F., at p. 95] Hill, J., pointed out that a single instance of insolence in the case of a servant in such a position as that of a newspaper critic would hardly justify dismissal. The proper conclusion to be drawn, so the Court of Appeal stated, was that since a contract of service was but an example of contracts in general, the general law of contract was applicable; and consequently, where summary dismissal is claimed to be justifiable, the question must be whether the conduct complained of was such as to show that the servant disregarded the essential conditions of the contract of service. We may thus go back to the general statement, quoted in the opening sentence of this paragraph, which is taken from Halsbury's Laws (3rd edn.), vol. 25, p. 485, but it is also said there, as Lord Evershed, M. R., pointed out, that "there is no fixed rule of law defining the degree of misconduct which will justify dismissal".—L.J.

MUSHROOMS

THOUGH most of us know what we like it seems doubtful whether many of us realise what we eat. Of late, consumable goods have had more than their fair share of publicity. There was the case of Spanish champagne, then a report about the sugar or glucose content of soft drinks followed by a news item of cheese labelled "Cheshire" but nevertheless accurately marked "Imported" (from Holland). Now it seems that the West Sussex County Council has had doubts about the ingredients used in mushroom soup. A prosecution was brought against a company under the Food and Drugs Act, 1955, on the ground that a packet described as "Knorr Mushroom Soup" had a label stating that dehydrated mushroom was amongst the ingredients it contained. The prosecution was brought on the ground that the alleged dehydrated mushroom was dehydrated spores of fungus called boletus edulis. There was no suggestion that it was not of good edible quality and palatable with its flavour closely resembling that of a mushroom. A Latin dictionary produced in Court defined boletus as meaning the best kind of mushroom. Evidence was given that dried cultivated mushrooms were not satisfactory for the making of soup. The summonses were dismissed and the prosecuted company was allowed 100 guineas costs. It would be revealing to know under what name the prosecution considered the product concerned should be marketed. "Boletus soup" would mean nothing to the public; and if dried cultivated mushroom soup were sold it seems likely that complaints would be received that mushroom soup—as understood by the public—had not been supplied. A storm in a soup-plate!—S.J.

SHOPPERS AND SHOPKEEPERS

WHEN, in Timothy v. Simpson, (1834), 6 C. & P. 499, counsel suggested to Parke, B., that if a man advertised goods at a certain price, he (counsel) had a right to go into his shop and demand the article at the price marked, his lordship replied: "No, if you do, he has a right to turn you out". Some lawyers were reluctant to accept this as a correct statement of law, but the matter was finally settled and the view of Parke, B., upheld by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain v. Boots Cash Chemists (Squithern), Ltd., [1953] 1 Q.B. 401. In that case, Somervell, L.J., said that "in the case of an ordinary shop, although goods are displayed and it is intended that customers should go and choose what they want, the contract is not completed until, the customer having indicated the articles which he needs, the shopkeeper, or someone on his behalf, accepts that offer. Then the contract is completed". We were interested to read that the opposite is true in Poland. According to a report in The Times, 26th May, of a recent case heard by the district Court of Katowice, a woman brought a successful action for damages against the State trade network for refusing to sell her a dress displayed in the window of one of its shops. The woman, who, as a result of the case, is said to have made herself the "heroine of shoppers" all over Poland, fancied the dress but was told that she could not have it as there were none in stock. Her action succeeded as in Polish law the display of an article constitutes an offer to sell: in this country it is merely an invitation to do business and it is for the customer to offer to buy the goods. It is surprising to find that the State trader in Poland is in a weaker position in this respect than the private shopkeeper in England.—S.J.

TREASURE TROVE

IN his work on Prerogative, Chitty said that treasure trove is where any gold or silver "is found concealed in a house, or in the earth, or other private place, the owner thereof being unknown" and he added that it must not have been "casually lost," or "purposely parted with" in such a way as to make it evident that the owner intended to abandon the property altogether. This definition has been adopted by the Courts on more than one occasion (e.g., by Farwell, J., in A.-G. v. Trustees of the British Museum [1893] 2 Ch. 598) and it seems to make clear the reason for a recent decision by the jury at the Southwark coroner's Court. After some articles from a church cellar and tower, including an old harmonium, had been burnt in the church yard, 135 gold sovereigns and 25 half sovereigns were found on the ash heap. The church council sold some of the coins, which must have been hidden in the harmonium, because the vicar thought that as they were found above ground the coins would not be classed as treasure trove. The jury took a different view, presumably because the coins were concealed in a "private place", other than in a house or in the earth. Perhaps it should be mentioned that the jury also found that the discovery of the coins had not been intentionally concealed, a common-law misdemeanour, and that the coroner, Mr. R. Ian Milne, expressed the hope that the vicar would be allowed to retain the amount which he had received in respect of the coins which were sold.—S.J.

LAWYERS AND LAWN TENNIS

THE name of lawn tennis probably originated in the fertile imagination of Arthur Balfour, who was a pioneer of the game. When coined, it was certainly an improvement on the paratitle of sphairistike. But it is a misnomer: lawn has never been the only surface on which the game was played, while the word tennis invites confusion with the very different parent-game of royal and ancient lineage. In deference to Wimbledon as the cradle of the game, one is tempted to suggest that lawn tennis could be more simply and suitably described by the one word "wimbling."

The game was invented in England in the late 1860s. In 1878, barely eight years after the first lawn tennis club had been formed at Leamington and only a year after the championships had started at Wimbledon, Middle Temple Lawn Tennis Club was founded. Soon Inner followed suit—the archives of its lawn tennis club date back to 1881—and by 1885 Edward Marshall Hall, for one, was "often to be seen—to the great distress of his clerk—in spotless white flannels, playing tennis in Inner Temple Gardens with Bouverie and others," after which, according to his biographer, "he would sit in chambers, quenching his thirst with large quantities of lemon squash made by himself." In turn, Gray's Inn Lawn Tennis Club was founded in 1902. Alone among the Inns of Court Lincoln's seems to have been ever impregnable to such distractions.

The couple of grass courts which lay in the gardens of both Inner and Middle Temple until 1939 have not yet been restored, and their respective clubs, ranking among the oldest lawn tennis clubs in the world, have regrettably lapsed into quiescence, at any rate for the present. Abolished also is the grass court which, with trees literally on its side-line, survived in Gray's Inn until 1955

But the firmly established tradition of the attachment of the bench and bar to lawn tennis has not died. It has been protected, co-ordinated and stimulated by an "umbrella" organisation, open at a modest subscription to all members of the English bench and bar, bar students and ladies closely related to any such member.

After months of thoughtful preparation, the value of which was enhanced by the astute guidance of the late Monty Temple, the Bar Lawn Tennis Society was formally inaugurated in Middle Temple on 20th April, 1950. Slade, J., presided, as indeed he has at all the society's meetings throughout the past decade, besides having added lustre and stamina to its team in many a match. Several subsequent general meetings were held somewhat incongruously in one of the Divorce Courts, at the hour when badminton is played in the Bear Garden, while the committee has customarily met over a cup of tea in Master Lawrence's chambers. At the inauguration, Lord Tucker, who is now president of the society, was among those who helped to draft its rules, which, through the earlier co-operation of Judge Aarvold, were largely based on those of the Bar Golfing Society. His Majesty King George VI and Her Majesty the Queen have successively been graciously pleased to grant the society their patronage. Its first president was the then Lord Chancellor, Lord Jowitt, who was active on its behalf until the very eve of his death. Many other prominent members of the bench and bar gave their support from the start; and a warm invitation to join the society is permanently open to those who have not yet done so. Two of its strongest players who, like others too numerous to name, have done much for the society, are Neill Cox and John Cope, "those two hyaenas" as they were dubbed by an astonished American opponent.

The society enables judges, counsel and bar students to participate in the game as a corporate unit. It plays twice a year against the International Lawn Tennis Club of Great Britain for the Slade Cup, at the respective homes of Lady Grosfield and Lord Iliffe, two generous patrons of the game. It annually, and usually at Hurlingham, competes against the solicitors, who surprisingly enough still have no lawn tennis society of their own. It also plays each year in and around London against a score or so of such clubs as are good enough to extend it their hospitality.

Further, the society plays in London and elsewhere against foreign lawyers. Thus, in the words of the late Lord Jowitt, "it is believed to be making a useful, though humble, contribution to international understanding." Without any extraneous financial assistance, it has managed to play as far afield as Baden-Baden, Bastad, Brussels, Deauville, Dublin, Düsseldorf, Florence, Paris and Rome. Several of these international engagements, such as that against the French lawyers for the Chrestell Cup and against the Swedish lawyers for the Parkfelt Cup, are repeated at appropriate intervals. Efforts to arrange such a match in Moscow have not yet met with success. But on 25th August, 1960, the society is due to play a return match against the American Bar for the Breed Cup at the Piping Rock Club on Long Island. Moreover the example of the society has inspired lawyers of other lands to form similar organisations and has given impetus to the salutary growth of international sporting contests between those of a common or similar profession.

Domestically, the society provides for its members annual tournaments which include a singles competition for a coveted challenge cup, presented by a founder member, the late Frank Riseley. He it was who at Wimbledon in 1906 shared the distinction with S. H. Smith of winning a final which is widely claimed to have eclipsed in enchantment any other doubles match ever played on the Centre Court. In addition, the society holds an annual gathering for all its members at the hospitable Hurlingham Club. The occasion is more than a social event, and is enjoyed by non-playing, no less than by playing, members. For the society, mindful of its peculiar heritage, uses its own "club day" to foster the collegiate spirit of each of the four Inns of Court by means of a contest for an inter-Inns challenge trophy. The cup was donated by Sir Gerald Hargreaves, who a few years ago would hasten from a day on the bench to play a round of singles for the Riseley Cup against an opponent of a third his age and then in his studio design colours for the society—narrow scarlet and heliotrope, representing the High and county court benches, on a broad black background, signifying the bar.

For the amateur who likes to knock a ball about at week-ends, lawn tennis, with the advent of the cannon-ball service and smash-volley, has developed into perhaps too much of an exhibitionist exercise for the young athlete in the prime of condition, too much of a spectacle of speed and strength. From that point of view, it may be that the game should never have abandoned an early rule of Germain's lawn tennis that the ball had to be kept within the court on both its first and second bounce. Nevertheless, as an indication of the soundness of its current rules, lawn tennis continues to grow in popularity; and, as part of a tradition which is almost coeval with that of the game itself, the Bar Lawn Tennis Society has grown fast since its 27 founders met in Middle Temple some ten years ago. Its members now number 241; and, besides its other activities, the society has already played no less than 250 matches in England and in more than half a dozen lands beyond the seas.—L.T.

The Bombay Village Panchayats Act, 1958. By D. H. CHAUDHARI, B.Sc., LL.B., Pleader. POONA: N. R. Bhalerao, Law Book-sellers, 492, Shanwar, Near Shanwar Post Office. Demi 8vo. Pages x+268+viii. Price: Rs. 4.

THIS is a very useful commentary on the Bombay Village Panchayats Act, 1958. When the State of Bombay was reorganised it became necessary to enact a new legislation governing village panchayats in order to have a kind of uniformity in their formation. The powers and duties of these panchayats were consequently much enlarged. As the Village Panchayats Act is applicable to villages, sufficient care has been taken to see that the villagers easily understand its provisions. The learned author has carefully explained the various provisions relating to matters affecting the entire life of a village. The provisions of the Act have been carefully explained in simple language. All those who are in any way connected with the development of the village panchayats will find this book very valuable.

The Bombay Court Fees Act, 1959. By D. H. CHAUDHARI, B.Sc., LL.B., Pleader. POONA: N. R. Bhalerao, Law Book-sellers, 492, Shanwar, Near Shanwar Post Office. Demi 8vo. Pages viii+269+xii. Price: Rs. 8.

A COURT-FEE is a kind of judicial tax levied for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the judiciary. The Bombay Court-fees Act, 1959, repeals the Court-fees Act, 1870, in its application to the State of Bombay. The new Act has come into force from August 1, 1959. In explaining the provisions of this Act, the learned author has relied upon the case-law dealing with similar provisions of the Court-fees Act, 1870. Wherever the provisions differ he has carefully explained the idea underlying the new provisions. As the new Act has recently come into force lawyers will surely find this commentary very helpful.

SAPINDASHIP AND RELIGIOUS EFFICACY.*

THE word Sapinda has been the subject of many a hard fought fight: whether the word Pinda in the compound word Sapinda should be taken to mean body or oblations has been the subject of warm discussion among the Hindu lawyers.

The locus classicus has been the comment of Vijnaneshwar in Mitakshara, Ch. 1, 52. Here is a brief outline of it.

"...She is called his Sapinda who has particles of the body in common with him. Non-Sapinda means not his Sapinda... Sapinda relationship arises between two people through their being connected by particles of one body. Thus the son stands in sapinda relationship to his father because of particles of his father's body having entered his. In like manner stands the grandson... Likewise (the grandson stands in sapinda relationship) to his maternal grandmother, and the rest through his mother... So also the wife and husband because they together beget one body."

As authorities for his view Vijnaneshwar quotes three texts. Aiteraya Brahman (आत्माहि जज्ञे आत्मन) "The man himself is born from himself"; Taittiriya Brahman (प्रजामनु प्रजायत) "Thou art born again in the off-spring" and Garbhopanishad (एतत्पादकौशिकं शरीरं) "The human body is made of six koshas"—three being derived from the father and three from the mother. It is mostly from this source that Vijnaneshwar derives material to amplify his statement. This type of Sapindaship he terms (अवयव अवयवसपिण्ड्यम्)—Sapindaship from blood particles.

In Vedic literature the word Pinda occurs a few times. It is found in Rig-veda (1,162.19) and the Taittiriya Samhita (iv. 6.9.3.) where it seems to mean "a part of the body of the sacrificial animal thrown into fire as an offering". In Taittiriya Samhita II. 3,8,2, and in Satapath Brahman II 4,2,24 the word means 'ball of rice' offered to the manes.

It is evident that both the meanings are familiar to the Vedic Rishis. The Dharmasutras also, specially Gautam, Vasishtha and Vishnu, show that the Sutrakars did contemplate some relationship between offering pinda and taking inheritance.

Vijnaneshwar has very intelligently explained how the meaning of Sapinda is restricted to certain degrees. He says "...Therefore, the word Sapinda though it applies everywhere (to a wide circle) by the expressive power of its component parts (literal meaning) is restricted to a certain definite sphere like the words 'Nirmanthya' and 'Pankaja'." The word Pankaja denotes 'springing from mud' but is restricted by usage to the lotus. So the seven persons related through male and five through a female are Sapindas.

The centre of the discussion is the text of Manu. (अनंतरः सपिण्डायस्तस्य तस्य घनं भवेत्). It has been variously explained. The chief difficulty lies in the interpretation of the expression

सपिण्डायाः and तस्य तस्य

The best explanation seems to be that of Kulluka who reads it as सपिण्डमध्यात् among the Sapindas. Dayatatava has a similar interpretation to offer.

*By Brij Kishore Sharma, LL.M., Assistant Professor of Law, Lucknow University, Lucknow.

Some writers take तस्य तस्य to refer to inheritor alone while there is another group of authors who regard the first तस्य as referring to the deceased and the latter to the inheritor.

The Dayabhag School, which has Jimutvahana as its foremost exponent, differs from Mitakshara in the meaning that ought to be attached to the word Sapinda. In this system it is taken to denote "the ball of rice" the "exequial cake" that is offered to the manes at the time of the performance of Parvana Shrad-dha. Sapinda means a person related with another through oblations of food. It is taken that Sapinda has different meaning in the context of Asaucha (impurity after death or birth etc.).

For his support from antiquity Jimutvahana relies on Manu and Baudhayana. Manu, IX, 186, says "To three should libations of water be offered, to three is the cake offered the fourth is the offerer of these, there can be no fifth."

The text of Baudhayana runs thus:—

"The great-grand-father, the grand-father, the father, oneself, the uterine brothers, the son by a wife of the same caste, the grandson and the great-grand-son,—these undivided coparceners, they call Sapindas, the divided coparceners, they call Sakulyas, where there are no offsprings the property goes to the aforesaid."

It may be pointed out here that Colebrooke translated the above passage erroneously. We shall refer to it elsewhere. But that error was a consequence of attaching the meaning of Pinda to Daya as was done by Dayabhag without the least warrant. It seems that Jimutvahana himself was not sure of his theory for he mentions in Ch. XI, 6, para. 38 that though the learned may not agree on his principle (Upakaratva) yet they must abide by the order that he gives on the basis of Manu. The emphasis is more on the order than on the principle.

The result of the interpretation of Dayabhag is to erase the distinction between a Gotraja and a Bandhu. While it is the dictum of Yajnavalkya that Bandhus can succeed only on failure of Gotrajas which indicates that the two classes are to be distinguished from each other. Another anomaly that arises is that Jimutvahana states that sister's son belongs to the same Kula, though not to the same Gotra. This is opposed to the established practice and usual meaning attached to the word.

Kulluka while commenting on another Sloka of Manu, Ch. V 60, states that Sapinda relationship can subsist only among persons belonging to the same Gotra. That is why the maternal grandfather, though being a recipient of the cake is not regarded as a Sapinda.

In this context it is of interest to consider the summary of the law relating to connection between the inheriting of property and offering the Shraddha—the heirs beginning with the son and ending with the daughter's son, are entitled to inherit property and also to offer Shraddha, in the absence of these, though the father and others are to inherit the property the Shraddha is to be performed by the brother and the rest, even though the parents are there; the Shraddha is to be performed by the uterine brother, and only in his absence by the half-brother;—in the absence of these, by the father; then the maternal uncle and the teacher. In the absence of all these, the Shraddha is to be performed by the daughter-in-law; then the father-in-law. After all these the mother, then the grandsons of the brother.

An oft-quoted text in this respect is that of Vishnu (यश्चाप्यहुरः स पिण्डदायी). But the correct meaning of the text is that given by Pt. Ganganath Jha: "He who inherits the property is liable for offering the cake".

Apararka also quotes a Smriti text to the effect that when a man inherits a person's property, he should perform the Shraddha for him and also offer the cake to three ancestors.

• The Virmitrodaya which largely subscribes to the tenets of the Mitakshara school also refers to the principle of religious efficacy in determining the preferential heir though not to establish the right to succeed.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has, relying on Virmitrodaya, held accordingly. We shall consider a few important judgments on the point. It is submitted that to accord the Virmitrodaya the privilege of acceptance as universally acclaimed and unexceptionably followed commentary was an error which the Privy Council committed. The Virmitrodaya was composed in Orchha, a kingdom of little importance in Bundelkhand, and though it contained double the number of slokas of Mahabharata yet it was never taken to represent the consensus of opinion of the Hindu lawyers. With respect, it was not apposite for the Judicial Committee to make its principles binding on every Hindu who may happen to follow Mitakshara.

In the case of Buddha Singh v. Lattu Singh,¹ their Lordships of the Privy Council laid down (p. 227):

"...It is absolutely clear that under the Mitakshara, whilst the right of inheritance arises from sapinda-relationship, or community of blood, in judging the nearness of blood-relationship or propinquity among the gotrajas, the test to be applied to discover the preferential heir is the capacity to offer oblations."

In *Vedachela Mudaliar v. Subramania Mudaliar*², the Judicial Committee again held that the religious efficacy may be taken as a guide to prefer one of the two Bandhus as heirs. In *Jatindra Nath Roy v. Nagendra Nath Roy*³, the Privy Council again reiterated emphatically that as between Bandhus of the same class, the spiritual benefit conferred upon the propositus by offerings is a measure of propinquity to him. In a Madras case *Muttusami v. Muttukumarasami*⁴, the High Court held referring to Virmitrodaya that

"...This passage indicates that as between bandhus of the same class, a rule of preference may be found in the quantity of spiritual benefit which they confer."

In the case of *Lallubhai Babubhai v. Mankuvarbhai*⁵, the High Court observed that the burden rests upon the plaintiffs to show that Vijnaneshwar and Nilkantha regarded Sapinda relationship as resting upon a different basis for the purposes of inheritance from that in the Achara Kanda and in the Sanakar Mayukha. The counsels failed to prove it.

Vijnaneshwar after defining Sapinda insisted that the same meaning should be drawn wherever the word was used. In *Sham Singh v. Kishun*⁶, Justice Mukherjee said that we must take it as settled beyond possibility of controversy that the version of Colebrooke is inaccurate and that the term Sapinda is used by Vijnaneshwar not to indicate connection by funeral oblations, but of corporal particles.

Dayabhag regarding the definition of Daya (दाय) (Ch. I. 51) says:—

"Therefore, the word heritage is used to signify wealth, in which property, dependent on relation to the former owner, arises on the demise of that owner.

(उतश्च पूर्वस्वामीसंबन्धाधीनं तत्स्वाम्योपरमे यत्र द्रव्ये स्वत्वम् तत्रम् निश्चयो दायशब्दः)

In Mitakshara दाय has been explained thus: Ch. I. sec. 1,2.

"Here the term heritage signifies that wealth which becomes the property of another, solely by reason of relation to the owner."

The employment of the word solely excludes any other cause. Sangraha-kara states that what has come to one through the father and through the mother is expressed by the term Daya. (पितृद्वारागतं द्रव्यं मातृद्वारागतम् च यत्).

According to Nighantu दाय is that property which belonged to the father and comes to be partitioned.

2 (1921) 48 I.A. 349, s.c. 24 Bom. L.R. 649.

4 (1892) 16 Mad. 23, 80.

6 (1907) 6 C.L.J. 190, 201.

Vijnaneshwar has further attempted to elucidate whether property is temporal. He contradicts Gautama (Ch. 1, sec. 1, 8 and 9) and proves his proposition that property is secular by logical deduction. Property is worldly for it effects transactions selective to worldly purposes "Whatever does effect temporal ends is temporal as rice and other similar substances. Such too is property. Therefore it is temporal". It is evident from the above definition that the concept of property has hardly any connection with religious duties that are performed after the death of the owner. Even the Dayabhag has abstained from defining it as 'dependent on spiritual benefit' instead of 'dependent on relation'.

Mitakshara has further refuted the relationship by taking the instance of the widow's right to inherit (Chap. II, Sec. 1, 15):

"Besides it may be here asked; is the appointment to raise up issue a reason for the widow's succession to the property? Or is the issue, borne by her, the cause of succession? If the appointment alone be the reason, it follows that she has a right to the estate, without having borne a son; and the right of a son subsequently produced does not ensue."

Moreover, in order to firmly root the argument that the nature of property is strictly temporal there is another argument of Vijnaneshwar, Ch. II. sec. 22 and 23:

"Besides, if wealth be designed for sacrificial uses the argument would be reversed by which it is shown that the careful preservation of gold (inculcated by the passages of Veda) "Let gold be preserved" is intended not for religious ends but for human purposes."

The reasoning here alluded to occurs in the Mimamsa Ch. III, sec. 4, 12, and the reasoning is incompatible with the notion, that wealth is intended solely for sacrificial uses.

It is a rule of interpretation of Hindu scriptures that if two reasons are given in the same clause, for any particular proposition, the reason last given is said to be by way of Sadhak or additional support and may be rejected. For example Vijnaneshwar in Ch. II, sec. I, 22-25 arguing against the statement that the wealth of a regenerate man is designed for religious uses, states one proposition, adds another and further supports his contention twice. Thus in all he submits four points. According to principles of exegesis the weight attached to the last is the minimum. Similarly Jimutvahana in explaining the heritable right of the widow, the daughter etc., and laying down the order of succession quotes express texts and then supports them on the additional ground of the doctrines of spiritual benefit. This additional ground must suffer rejection in view of the principles of exegesis which have been admitted by Jimutvahana himself.

Shrikrishna, an eminent scholar and commentator of Dayabhag, has himself disregarded the additional ground. He does not even mention it and only states the heirs as they are given in the express texts. Ch. XI, Sec. VI. 36.

In Ch. XI, Sec. 1, 32, Jimutvahana quotes Manu (मनु) Ch. 9/137.

अथ पुत्रस्य पौत्रेण ब्रह्मस्याप्नोति विष्टपम् ॥

"By a son, a man reaches heaven, by a grandson remains there for a very long period and by the great-grand-son he obtains the abode of the sun."

After this he comments that though the rights of sons etc., are clearly obtained they also can be inferred by way of reasoning because the wealth which devolves upon the sons etc., benefits the deceased, since the male descendants produce great spiritual benefit to their ancestor. He supports his contention on the ground that Manu names them as heirs after a statement of the spiritual benefits conferred by them and relating it by "therefore".

But a perusal of Manu Ch. IX, 185, and Ch. IX, 165 will make it evident that the right to inherit is not at all taken by Manu to be an incident of the capacity to offer oblation to manes, or dependent upon the competency to perform Parvana Shraddha.

The error in the decision of cases arose from the overlooking of the above mentioned principles of interpretation.

The genesis of the error can be traced to the case of Govindlal Shaha v. Anand Lal Ghose.⁷ That Mr. Justice Hobhouse obviously fell into an error is quite apparent. He reiterates that (p. 27):

"two proposition seem to me to follow first that every one is competent who is not by this chapter (Ch. V Dayabhag) declared incompetent and secondly that everyone who can present funeral obsequies is competent to inherit" and then on page 28 he states as derived from the above chapter that the principle on which the Dayabhag law of inheritance proceeds is that the right to inherit is the reward of the spiritual benefit conferred on the deceased owner of the property. In the Full Bench decision Mr. Justice Mitter also committed the same mistake of disregarding a vital rule of interpretation. He moreover erred in another place when he stated that the real object that the Dayabhag had in view was to establish a general principle of its own. There is no warrant at all for this proposition. What Jimutvahana attempted was a commentary on Yajnavalkya, and even if it be granted that he intended to lay down his own principle, there is entirely no basis for giving his principle a weight greater than the Smriti of Yajnavalkya.

The question now arises is that why at all should the doctrine be relied on by Jimutvahana. The explanation is to be found in the character of the writings of those times as mostly polemical because discussion was the chief way of imparting education and in the second place in the recognition that the principle was a point of current controversy at that time though the scales seem to be slightly in the favour of the view of Vijnaneshwar.

The second proposition is founded on the ground that Vijnaneshwar who wrote about three centuries ahead of Dayabhag found it expedient to refute the principles and deny it any place. In Ch. 1, 52, he writes:

"If Sapinda relationship be alleged to be founded upon the connection arising from the presentation of exequial cakes, then no such relationship is possible with relatives connected through the mother in the mother's line, nor with the sons of brothers and others."

The above passage shows that some of the Pandits did entertain the idea that Sapindaship has a link with the competency to offer the Parvana Pinda.

Even before Jimutvahana, Aparaka had overcome the objection put forth by Vijnaneshwar. He states:

"Among these the uterine brother is a nearer Sapinda to the deceased, than any other propinquous kinsman, because he presents the water and the cake to the same ancestors to whom the deceased was bound to present them. The nephew is a little more remote than the uterine brother, because the former gives a cake to the father which has no connection whatever with the deceased. The son of a nephew is more remote than the nephew himself, because the son presents two Pindas which have no connection with the deceased."

But what is worth being noted is that he does not say anything about the Bandhus succession on the principle of spiritual benefit.

In a great many cases whether the emphasis is on the express texts or on the theory of "Upkaratva" the result is identical. Hence we find Jimutvahana and his disciples relying on the principle by way of Sadhak.

Srikrishna, who is the author of a learned commentary on Dayabhag, observes while commenting in Ch. XI, Sec. VI in para. 33 that if the capacity to benefit the soul of the deceased person had been the foundation of heritable right, then the person who gives pinda to the deceased at Gaya or the person who immerses his ashes in the holy waters of the Ganga ought to inherit before all others. As an opinion of a learned Pandit, it is very important to note this.

It is worth noting at this juncture that the most important rites and solemnities after the demise of a person for his benefit are the sixteen Shraddhas the last of which is the Sapindikarana because it is after "Sapindikarana" that the dead leaves the Pret Yoni. The next in importance are the anniversary and the Nandi Mukh Shraddhas. Parvana Shraddha is not a necessity but at the most a spiritual luxury. It is because of this reason that few even among the learned have the knowledge of this Shraddha and there is hardly any Hindu who performs it.

If the succession is judged according to the performance of the sixteen Shraddhas then the order of succession shall be wholly different from what Jimutvahana has delineated.

Another objection raised against the principle is housed in the Dayabhag itself. In Ch. IV, Sec. III, para. 37 it is stated that the son-in-law of a female succeeds to her Stridhan, because the son-in-law by giving Pinda may benefit the soul of his mother-in-law and father-in-law. Now if the son-in-law is capable of benefitting the soul of his father-in-law, then on the spiritual principles he must be able to claim as heir to the father-in-law as well as to the mother-in-law. But while Jimutvahana gives him the pride of a place in the list of heirs to females he is denied any right as heir to males.

Manu has expressly cut the ground on which afterwards Jimutvahana tried to build the theory, in

गोत्ररिक्त्वातुगः पिण्डो व्यपैति ददतः स्वया ॥

"The adopted son shall not take the Gotra or property of his progenitors the cake follows the Gotra and the property; for him who gives away his son, the funeral offerings cease."

It has been clearly indicated that Pinda follows property and not the opposite. Another text on the same point is from Smriti

"When a man inherits a person's property, he should perform the Shraddha for him and also offer the cake to three ancestors." (G. N. Jha, Vol II, 509).

Another reason assignable to the new interpretation of Jimutvahana is that the enumeration of heirs by Vijñaneshwar was not universally acceptable. It is well known that there is some conflict in the Smritis of Manu and Yajñavalkya. Yajñavalkya states that after brother's son the Gotrajas and the Bandhus take the heritage. But he has nowhere defined as to who are the Gotrajas and the Bandhus, and at no place explained what is the order of succession amongst them. Vijñaneshwar later on defined Gotrajas as agnates and Bandhus as cognate Sapindas. He thus enabled Samanodakas to inherit before the Bandhus in the face of a text of Manu that Samanodakas can inherit only in default of Sapindas.

Jimutvahana on the other hand laid down a line of succession in accordance with Manu after defining Gotrajas and Bandhus and placing Samanodakas in the last. One must admit that this is more symmetrical. The novel definition of Sapindas made it easier to resolve the competing claims than it was in the case of the incomplete enunciation of rules by Mitakshara. It can be speculated that Jimutvahana who wanted to systematise and simplify the law in regard to succession relied on the theory of spiritual benefit to make it palatable to the Pandits of his day. He also relied on Baudhayana and Manu which are cited in Ch. XI, Sec. 1, paras. 37, 40.

A loophole in Jimutvahana's new twist is admission of maternal relations. He gives them entrance on the reasoning that during a man's life-time he is bound to offer Pindas to his maternal ancestors and after his death, this wealth may, therefore, be taken by maternal relations who give pindas to the same ancestors and thus perform acts productive of religious merits to him. But this is quite unacceptable. It is not proper to suggest that a person by giving a pinda to a deceased ancestor brings any benefit upon the souls of third persons who used to give pindas to the same ancestor in their life-time. It is beyond dispute that maternal relations cannot confer any benefit on the soul of the deceased person. The above reasoning also assures that even after death the deceased exercises control and ownership on the property, and that even after death there exists the sacred obligation to offer oblations to manes. Moreover, the Parvana Shraddha of the maternal ancestors can take place only along with the performance of the Shraddhas of the paternal ancestors. When a person dies and is relieved of the obligation to perform the Shraddhas of the paternal ancestor it is difficult to imagine that there still subsists a duty to perform the rituals for the benefit of the soul of maternal ancestors. The Sastras impose duties on the living and not on the dead.

Another point which demands elucidation is the proper importance that is to be attached to a primary or a secondary Pinda. The father's daughter's son takes before grandfather. The reasoning would be that he offers three secondary Pindas while grandfather gives only two primary Pindas. But it is veiled in mystery as how to ascertain the relative importance of these Pindas. The above case when compared with that of the brother's grandson and father's sister's son becomes more inexplicable because in the latter case the brother's grandson who offers only one primary Pinda in which the deceased participated supersedes the father's sister's son, the offerer of three secondary Pindas. The only satisfactory explanation to these anomalies is that neither the heritable right nor the order of succession depends on that principle.

It may also be pointed out that there is absolutely no authority for the proposition that offerings to the nearer ancestors are more effective than offerings to a remoter ancestor.

A glance at the list of persons competent to perform Shraddha and their order will make it clear that the order varies from the order of succession in the Dayabhag school.

Further among several brothers it is only the eldest brother who performs the Shraddha, but all the brothers have an equal right of succession. The wives of ancestors are also recipients of Pindas etc., but it is nowhere held that the offerer should succeed to their Stridhan. It cannot be maintained that it is only the male who derive religious benefit and not the female.

According to the rules regarding performance of Shraddhas if a person's father and grandfather are alive then he must offer Pindas to whom his grandfather offers. This rule extends the link of spiritual benefit to the third, fourth and fifth ancestors. In case the father only is alive then the bond extends to four ancestors. But the order of heirs has no such corresponding flexibility.

Summing up after the preceding survey it is submitted that the real basis of the Dayabhag rule seems to be that the genesis of the theory was to support the custom prevalent in the country by which certain cognates claimed inheritance. Udyot and Medhatithi had already subscribed to the theory. The rules relating to inheritance are closely allied with the offering of funeral oblations but it is wholly unwarranted to assume that spiritual bargain is the real basis of succession according to Hindu law. This error was enlarged by the British Courts and a substantial part of it was due to the limitations of their province of study to translations by Colebrooke.

The modern legislation regarding the personal laws of the Hindus has brought fundamental changes in numerous basic conceptions of the Hindus. The Hindu Succession Act has, however, refrained from using the expression Sapinda which was not always clear in its connotation and uniform in its import. The Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, however, has adopted the age-old terminology. It must be conceded that the use is hapless and is bound to create confusion. But as we are not concerned here with the computation of degrees etc., we may properly abstain from dwelling upon the subject. But it is of interest to note that the new definition as given in s. 3(f)(4) has struck off all relations between religious efficacy and Sapindaship. The relationship is to be based only on computation as provided in s. 3(f)(4) and the Explanation.

GLEANINGS.

A POPULAR DELUSION

IN the course of his judgment in the memorable case of the lady and the unwholesome snails, His Honour Judge Bladgen referred to "the popular delusion that is floating about that when anybody suffers a calamity of any sort somebody else has got to pay." The learned county court judge recalled the fact that "the general rule is that the tree lies where it falls." We thought of these observations when we read the newspaper reports of a recent case before Streatfeild J., at Bristol Assizes. The plaintiff alleged that after an operation for the removal of the little finger of his right hand he was too tightly bandaged and that, in consequence, he developed gas gangrene and two more fingers had to be amputated. His lordship admitted that the plaintiff had suffered a misfortune of the first magnitude but he was satisfied that no individual had been negligent. In view of this, he gave judgment in favour of the defendants, the board of governors of the hospital in which the operation was performed, and added: "Surgeons, doctors and nurses are not insurers. They are not guarantors of absolute safety. They are not liable in law merely because a thing goes wrong. They are not workers of miracles." It is easy for the layman to forget that the law merely requires that such professional people should exercise professionally that skill, perception and knowledge which belongs to the ordinary practitioner, not that of the topmost specialists in the land.—S.J.

SERVANT'S INJURY AS BREACH OF CONTRACT

NORMALLY the question whether injuries suffered by a servant in the course of his employment are to be regarded as a breach of a contractual duty to take reasonable care for his safety or as a tort is of little more than academic interest. If there is anything to choose between them tort may be said to have the advantage that there is no need to prove any particular term of the contract of service, and a good background of cases to assist in clarifying the nature of the duty. There is an argument on the question whether the damages that can be claimed in tort are greater than those which can be claimed in contract; this arises from a comparison of the wording of the rules laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (1854), 9 Exch. 341 for claims in contract, and Re Polemis [1921] 3 K.B. 560 for claims in tort. The writer takes the view that it can be shown that the area of causes encompassed by the rule in tort is larger than that in contract. But it is rare that the question arises at all, and, as far as is known, it has not arisen in cases such as we are now considering.

Indeed where the distinction has been discussed it seems to have been treated as of no value. Only recently in Davie v. New Merton Board Mills, Ltd. [1959] 2 W.L.R. 331; Viscount Simonds said (at p. 336): "The same act or omission by an employer may support an action in tort or for breach of an implied term of the contract of employment, but it can only lead to confusion if, when the action is in tort, the court embarks on the controversial subject of implied contractual terms." If the difference was thought to be of importance the contrast between the two bases for an action would not "lead to confusion" but would, on the contrary, be important to study in order to compare the position under the one type of claim with the position under the other.

There are cases, however, where the distinction has practical significance, one of which was the recent decision of Matthews v. Kuwait Bechtel Corporation [1959] 2 W.L.R. 702. First, there is the case of a foreign employer where leave may be required for service of proceedings out of the jurisdiction—that was the case here—and, secondly, there is the county court jurisdiction on the matter of costs.

In Matthews' case the plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendants, a Panamanian company, to serve them as a foreman millwright in Kuwait. The contract was signed in England by the plaintiff and by the defendants' agents, and was expressed to be governed by the law of England. It was a long, printed document but contained no clause imposing any duty on the defendants to take care for the safety of the plaintiff. Shortly after arriving in Kuwait the plaintiff met with an accident by falling into a trench whilst working on a pump, and suffered injury. It appears that he stepped back to avoid a load swinging from a crane.

The plaintiff alleged that there was to be implied in this contract a term by virtue of which the employers agreed "to take all reasonable care by themselves, their servants or agents to provide and maintain safe premises, plant and equipment at any place or places" at which the plaintiff was to work and "to institute, operate and maintain a safe system of work and not to expose (the plaintiff) to any unnecessary risk of injury..."

Leave to serve the proceedings out of the jurisdiction was obtained but the defendants applied to have the writ set aside on the ground that any claim of this nature must be brought in tort and that there is no jurisdiction to grant leave for claims in tort not arising in England.

It was conceded by the defendants that a duty of the type claimed as an implied term did arise between the parties but not under the contract. There was a provision which formed part of cl. 12 of the contract to the effect that the agreement "embodies the whole arrangements between the parties with reference to the employment agreement hereby constituted, and all previous correspondence and negotiations, whether oral or written, shall be excluded." Sellers, L.J., said, in regard to that provision, "I think none of those terms is anything like adequate to exclude, or, indeed, was ever intended to exclude, any term which would normally be implied into the contract if in fact there are such terms."

His lordship turned to Lister v. Romford Ice and Cold Storage Co., Ltd. [1957] A.C. 555 and read extracts from several of the speeches showing that the House proceeded in that case on the basis that there were obligations on the master and on the servant to act with reasonable care in regard to their contractual duties. Viscount Simonds said that it made no substantive difference whether the claim were framed in contract or tort. Lord Radcliffe regarded the inquiry into the distinction as raising an artificial question.

The Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that the authorities postulated a principle that the duty of care for the safety of a servant which is imposed on a master may be treated as implied in the contract of service, or arises under the law of tort, and that the servant may at his option frame the action under either head.

The position in regard to costs in the county court, where the same problem arises, was not, of course, relevant to this action; but it was pointed out that the question does not usually arise because costs in tort are greater than those in contract and claims for injuries are usually framed in tort.

References to a rule contrary to that laid down by this decision were made. In Salmond on Torts, 12th ed., p. 130, and in Munkman on Employer's Liability, p. 60, it is contended that claims such as this lie only in tort. So, too, in Riley v. Baxendale (1861), 6 H. & N. 445, such a view was expressed. The court considered that the rule suggested by the latter decision could not stand in the light of what has been said in the House of Lords on this matter, and consequently refused to follow it. It was consigned "to the limbo of lost causes."

We must not overlook the rule that one can within very wide limits make any arrangement one likes by contract. Consequently, if cl. 12 of the contract in this case had been suitably worded would it not have excluded the implied contractual term for safety of the servant? If the clause had expressly excluded all implied terms, would this have been sufficient? One does.

commonly come across clauses similar to this one but more wide in their scope. Could one argue that it is contrary to public policy to exclude the contractual term for safety so as to preclude a servant who is employed by a foreign firm from bringing an action in his native country—the place to which he will normally return if injured? This really raises another question: If claims for injury can be dealt with by the English courts when framed in contract why cannot they be dealt with when framed in tort? Exactly the same facts are in issue and the same principle to all intents and purposes. Consequently it would be reasonable to call for an extension of the provisions of Ord. 11 so as to allow service out of the jurisdiction for claims in tort where they could be framed in contract except that the contract expressly excludes the claim.—S.J.

A NICE CUP OF TEA

THE Germans have their beer gardens; the French have their cafés; but only the English have tea rooms as a national institution and tea as a national drink. For them it is rest in labour, balm of hurt minds, great nature's second course, centre of social intercourse. If it comes to the point there are few things an Englishman would rather have than a nice cup of tea. Tea has given its name to one of the great sustaining meals of the English day and, except in the most sophisticated circles, it haunts all the others. It is just over three centuries ago that it first decisively bedewed the English social scene, for it was in 1658 that the Sultan's Head near the Royal Exchange advertised "that excellent and by all physicians approved China drink called by the Chineans toha and by other nations tay alias tee." It was also called cha or chaw and was already known in an esoteric way to English travellers in the East, since in 1615 an agent of the East India Company named Wickham, resident in Japan, wrote to a colleague in Macao asking for "a pot of the best sort of chaw."

The origins of tea emerge faintly from the mists of remote antiquity. Perhaps they go back to the legendary Chinese Emperor Chinnung more than 4,000 years ago. Certainly it was known in the sixth century and was already a taxable commodity in the eighth century. By the ninth century its cultivation had spread from China to Japan. While the tax collector exploited it, a contemporary lyric poet sang its virtues: "Tea tempers the spirits, harmonises the mind, dispels lassitude and relieves fatigue, awakens thought and prevents drowsiness, lightens and refreshes the body." The most fervent English tea drinker could say no more.

The tea trade with Europe seems to have been started by the Dutch in the early 17th century. In the middle of that century a little tea was still a gift fit for a king and in 1664 the East India Company presented two pounds of it to Charles II. Pepys, ever full of curiosity, made its acquaintance on 25th September, 1660. "I did send for a cup of tee (a China drink) of which I never had drunk before." By 28th June, 1667, Mistress Pepys had discovered its virtues: "By coach home, and there find my wife making of tea: a drink which Mr. Pelling, the pothecary, tells her is good for her cold and defluxions." Henceforth the great seas of beer, which had hitherto rolled unchecked about the stomachs of the English, were met and challenged by a tide of ever-increasing strength, and, in the long run, the floods of tea proved powerful enough to sweep aside even the insidious cross-current of gin, so destructive in the 18th century.

In the second half of that century tea ceased to be an indulgence for the better-off and became a commonplace at the labourer's table, not only the usual beverage in the morning and evening but generally drunk in large quantities at his midday dinner. By this time it was inevitably attracting the attention of the law. The authorities became concerned about tea in two respects, first • the evasion of duty by smuggling on a tremendous scale, connived at by all classes, and secondly the adulteration or, as it was charmingly called, the "sophistication" of tea. The smuggler was as much part of the rural community as the grocer or the carrier. On 29th March, 1777, Parson Woodforde noted in his diary: "Andrews the smuggler brought me this night a bagg of Hyson tea six pound weight...I gave him some Geneva and paid him for the tea at 10s. 6d. per pound." Acts of Parliament were passed imposing penalties for smuggling tea, coffee and spiritous liquors and seeking to encourage both the smugglers and the dealers to whom they sold to inform against each other. A particularly drastic Act was passed in 1779. Nevertheless, in 1784 it was reckoned that less than half of the 13 million pounds of tea consumed in the United Kingdom actually paid duty.

Fraudulent dealers in tea practised two principal cheats, reselling used tea leaves and mixing in other ingredients. A pamphlet of 1780, entitled "Advice to the Unwary," cited the case of the widow Burket of Beccles in Suffolk, formerly a tea dealer, at whose house a chest was found after her death, full of dried tea leaves which she had begged from the King's Head Tavern, evidently for resale. The pamphlet demanded the utmost newspaper publicity for cases of adulteration to warn people "not only to detect and punish such delinquents but to preserve themselves, as no one can tell what pernicious effects (though secret and slow) the continual drinking of a hot infusion of different leaves manufactured with terra japonica, logwood, copperas and various ingredients may have upon the strongest constitution." It quoted a letter dated 1778 from two of the most respectable grocers in Norwich relating an experiment with a mixture of sloe leaves and used tea leaves dried again: "Four of the most capital tea dealers in this city then present were unanimously of opinion that it might easily have passed them for real tea."

By sect. 5 of an Act of 1724 (11 Geo. 1 c. 30) a penalty of £100 was imposed on any dealer in tea who adulterated it or mixed it with terra japonica, or with any drug or with any leaves other than leaves of tea, or with other ingredients. By sect. 11 of another Act of 1731 (4 Geo. 2 c. 14): "Whereas several ill-disposed persons do frequently dye, fabricate or manufacture very great quantities of sloe leaves, liquorish leaves, and the leaves of tea that have been used or the leaves of other trees, shrubs or plants in imitation of tea, and do likewise mix, colour, stain and dye such leaves and likewise tea with terra japonica, sugar, molasses, clay, logwood, and with other ingredients, and do sell and vend the same as a true and real tea to the prejudice of the health of His Majesty's subjects the diminution of the revenue, and the ruin of the fair trader," it was made an offence so to adulterate tea, to offer adulterated tea for sale or to have possession of it, subject to a penalty of £10 per every pound. The Adulteration of Tea Act, 1777 (17 Geo. 3 c. 29), regulated the whole subject, imposing a penalty of £5 for every pound of adulterated tea manufactured or sold. In the event of non-payment the offender was to be imprisoned for not less than six months or more than twelve months.

A curious case came before the Lord Mayor of London on 11th October, 1833, when application was made to burn 11,000 lbs. of a preparation called "British leaf," an imitation of tea, seized by the Excise. It contained elm leaves, sloe leaves, apple leaves, poplar leaves, willow leaves and rose leaves, and a wing of a maple seed had been found in a sample. It was not represented as genuine tea. The discussion of its wholesomeness resolved itself into a battle of experts. Mr. Gilbert T. Burnett, Professor of Botany at King's College, said that he had no objection to a cup of the infusion now and then, but he objected to the ordinary use of it. He said he spoke as a medical man as well as a botanist. He did not think it wholesome; it was astringent. He said it bore a strong resemblance to tea. He added that these leaves contained some of the most active poison in the vegetable world, prussic acid. On the other side, Mr. John F. Daniel, Professor of Chemistry at King's College, said that he had not the least objection to drink the infusion. There was not the slightest particle of prussic acid in it and there was nothing deleterious in the sample. He should say that.

green tea was more astringent. After retiring to his private room the Lord Mayor said that he and his advisers were unanimously of opinion that the British leaf should be condemned. The whole quantity was accordingly burned.

Tea is still protected by the law, although the 18th century Acts were repealed in 1958. The chief wall against adulterated imports is now sect. 229 of the Customs and Excise Act, 1952, which deals with imported tea found to be mixed with any other substance "exhausted" (that is "deprived of its proper quality, strength or virtue by steeping, infusion, decoction or other means"). How zealous may be the application of this Act was demonstrated by a letter in The Observer last year. Until quite recently, said the writer, jasmine scented tea, which has a most delightful flavour, was being sold in England at 20s. a pound. "Then quite suddenly we learned that no more would be imported because the Board of Trade had decided that mixing flowers with tea was adulteration. A few months later the merchant from whom I buy tea told me that two friends of his had recently returned from a visit to China bringing with them six tins of jasmine-scented tea. The customs officer wished to throw the tea into the sea, but, yielding to the violent protests of the travellers, he allowed them to take the tins of tea ashore after they had been labelled 'Unfit for Human Consumption.' " No doubt some official at the Board of Trade feels that jasmine-scented tea is too "sophisticated" for the era of the Common Briton.—L.T.

NOVATION AND PROPER LAW OF CONTRACT

THE decision of the Court of Appeal in Re United Railways of the Havana and Regla Warehouses, Ltd. ([1959] 1 All E.R. 214) is a valuable contribution to the law of the discharge of a contract in the field of private international law, particularly in these days when foreign government by legislation or administrative act interfere with the contracts of private parties. The case also gives help in the question whether a renvoi has any place in the law of contract; and also whether an act, to be actionable in tort in this country, must be an act not justifiable according to the law of the foreign country concerned.

The facts of the case were complex and arose out of a claim by an American trustee to prove in the liquidation in London of an English company operating a railway in Cuba. In 1921 the company raised $6 million in the United States for the purchase of rolling stock by means of a modification of what is known as the Philadelphia Plan. The company issued fifteen-year 7½ per cent. Trust Certificates carrying interest and repayable at a premium to be administered by a trustee company incorporated in the State of Pennsylvania. At the same time the company caused to be incorporated in the State of Delaware a subsidiary corporation and assigned to it the rolling stock; the subsidiary in turn leased to the parent company the rolling stock at a rental to be paid to the trustee company in Philadelphia. The railway company as lessee covenanted not to assign its right or interest in the rolling stock. The lease included a provision that the parties intended to enter into it and execute it in accordance with the laws of Cuba and register it under those laws and to record it as might be required by United States law. The trustee company was to re-assign the rolling stock to the subsidiary company when all payments had been made. The rental from the lease provided funds for the service and payment of the debt through the trustee company. By 1953 the railway was very much in arrears under its obligation to the trustee company and in that year became the subject of state acquisition under the laws of Cuba. This acquisition took the form of a sale by the railway company of its undertaking and assets. In 1954 the railway company went into voluntary liquidation in England. The successor to the trustee company lodged a proof for instalments unpaid under the lease which was rejected by the liquidators. In an appeal against rejection, which first came before Wynn-Parry, J., the primary question raised was whether the railway company's obligations to the trustee company under the lease still subsisted or whether they were discharged by the act of acquisition by the Cuban government. The learned Judge held that the railway's obligations to the trustee still subsisted, and his decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal. They clearly still subsisted if the proper law was that of Philadelphia; if the lex situs of the debt, namely Cuban law, applied, or if Cuban law were the proper law of the contract, it might be otherwise. Counsel for the liquidator contended that by Cuban law the sale of the railway to the Cuban State had the effect of transferring liability to the latter. In other words, there was a compulsory novation which forced the trustee to accept henceforward the Cuban State as its debtor. In the Court of Appeal, Jenkins and Romer, L.JJ., concluded that the law of Philadelphia was the proper law; Willmer, L.J., that it was the law of Cuba. However, all three learned Lords Justices agreed that it was immaterial which was the proper law since they accepted the evidence of a Cuban lawyer that the acquisition by the Cuban State amounted to no more than an agreement between the company and the Cuban State to the effect that as between those two parties the State should discharge the liabilities under the lease and agreement and indemnify the company in respect thereof, leaving wholly unaffected the rights of the creditors concerned against the company. Therefore, it was not necessary for the Court to pass upon the liquidators' contention that there had been a compulsory statutory novation. Nevertheless, though obiter, the Court's views as to which law applied in the case of a compulsory novation of a debt through governmental action carry weight.

In the Havana Railways case the only two systems of law that could apply were those of Pennsylvania or of Cuba. The former would apply if it were the proper law of the contract or if the law of Cuba, operating the principle of renvoi applied, Pennsylvania law. Cuban law would apply either if it were the proper law or if the lex situs of the debt (which was situate in Cuba and which arose out of the contract) applied. The question raised was whether English law would look to the proper law of the contract or to the lex situs of the debt at the time of such an acquisition by a foreign state as occurred in the case of the Havana Railways. The matter is bare of authority and it is first necessary to analyse the juridical nature of a novation. Counsel for the liquidators contended that a novation was a single act, and whether it bound the creditor depended on the lex situs of the debt, namely, Cuban law. The trustee company's contention, which was preferred by the Court of Appeal, was that a novation involved two distinct and successive acts, the discharge of the debt owed by the first debtor followed by the entry into a fresh contract between the creditor and a new debtor whereby the latter takes over the obligations of the original debtor. First in time comes the discharge of the original debtor. It was essential for the liquidators of the Havana Railways, in order to succeed, to establish that what might be termed the discharge component of the novation was governed by Cuban law as the lex situs. On this, Jenkins, L.J., confirmed Wynn-Parry, J.'s, approval of the view of Dr. Cheshire that "discharge affects the substance of the obligation". Jenkins, L.J., also approved the view of Wynn-Parry, J., that "one of the most important aspects of any contract is the manner in which it is to be charged, and one would suppose that the parties would intend the law which they had chosen as the proper law to govern that important matter—discharge". In Gibbs & Sons v. Société Industrielle et Commerciale des Métaux ([1890] 25 Q.B.D. 390) the plaintiff in England contracted to sell copper to a French company according to the rules of the London Metal Exchange. This, in the view of Lord Esher, M.R., rendered it impossible to deny that the contract was English. The defendants failed to accept the copper. Later they were pronounced by a French Court to be in judicial liquidation, and such a judgment, they contended, discharged them from liability on the contract. Their contention was decisively rejected by Lord Esher. To hold otherwise would have been to bind the plaintiffs by a law with which they had nothing to do. In the words of Wynn-Parry, J., this was "a strong case and it has...never been questioned"—even though in 1890 the phrase "proper law of the contract" was not in use.

The proper law of the lease and agreement in the Havana Railways case was, in the view of Jenkins and Romer, L.J.J., that of Philadelphia. Willmer, L.J., held that it was that of Cuba but agreed that his dissent in that respect was immaterial since all three Lords Justices concluded that the agreement between the Cuban Government and the railway company left the rights of any creditors unaffected. The most satisfactory formulation where—as here—the parties have not selected the proper law is that the latter is the one "with which the transaction has its closest and most real connection". The Delaware subsidiary and the trustee corporation were both American corporations. The Philadelphia Plan was a peculiarly American financial device, and the trusts created were, at their inception, unrecognised by Cuban law. All this was decisive in favour of Pennsylvanian law as the proper law notwithstanding that resort might be had to the Cuban Courts to assert rights over the rolling stock, the security for the loan situate in Cuba, or that the lease and agreement were executed and registered in accordance with Cuban law.

To sum up: where a debt is situate in a country other than that of the proper law, the rights of the creditor will not be prejudiced by any action taken by the foreign debtor's government to relieve the debtor of his obligations. The Court of Appeal also held that renvoi had no place in the law of contract. —L.J.

"LE CRIME PASSIONNEL"

THE mind at once leaps to drama, to an extravagant picture of a tragic person in the dock, dwarfed by guards with curling moustaches; to a story of passion and pathos, of betrayed lovers or wronged wives, of human frailty and of very dramatic death. While there, one finger aloft and his gown billowing out behind him, stands the Great Advocate, dominating the court, cowing the prosecutor and hypnotising the jury into returning a verdict contrary to all canons of any known law! But quite apart from the fact that there is no really appropriate English translation, the whole conception of le crime passionnel smacks of exotic continental jurisprudence alien to the subtle and methodical balances and processes of English law. Thus, to the distinguished figures ruminating before the fire of the Garrick Club or sipping coffee in Chancery Lane, the thought that any such development was creeping into English law, like banjo housing development encroaching on to a green belt, that a human being who kills because he is so transported by anguish or love or other emotion should be somehow less culpable in law, must be alarming and abhorrent. But what, in fact, is the present trend abroad and at home? On the Continent, where the romantic conception of le crime passionnel was shared at the end of the nineteenth century by the first scientific theories relating to the subject, it appears that the modern trend is to circumscribe the admission of extenuating circumstances in favour of the "passionate" offender rather than to broaden the ground of exemption or attenuation. As M. Marc Ancel, a judge of the Supreme Court of France, has written, the number of crimes passionnels has substantially declined, and the number of acquittals or too lenient sentences has considerably decreased since 1945. M. Ancel attributed this to the admission of women to sit on the jury and women have shown themselves inclined to be more severe than men; the decline of the romance of passion; and the fact that Parisian juries have had before their eyes since 1940 infinitely greater disasters. Yet in England certain changes in the law of murder have recently been made, widening the scope and range of defence and enlarging the province of the jury in judging the extent of passion and its effect on loss of self-control.

For in the past, be the story ever so tragic and lovers ever so star-crossed or so betrayed, the power of the jury, when deciding upon the culpability of a man charged with murder who tried to excuse the killing by claiming that he was provoked, was severely limited. Except for the reasonably unlikely chance of one spouse catching another precisely in flagrante delicto, the jury were directed that where a person was killed by a deadly weapon mere words or gestures were not enough to reduce the offence from murder to manslaughter. Although it might be thought that words and gestures could in many circumstances provoke a man to rages of passion and loss of self-control, nevertheless the judge had to withdraw the question of provocation from the jury where words alone were relied upon as constituting provocation, save in circumstances of a most extreme and exceptional nature. Moreover, the fact that the person provoked was highly excitable or particularly irascible or suffered from some physical or mental peculiarity could not, and cannot still, be pleaded as an especial excuse for lack of self-control. For in deciding whether the provocation was such as to make a man through passion lose his self-control and whether in fact he did so lose his self-control in consequence of such passion caused by such provocation, the test of the provocation and its effect is that of what can be reasonably expected in such circumstances of the reasonable man—that controversial character who must travel on an omnibus, who takes the magazines at home and pushes the lawn mower in his shirt sleeves, the normal dredger owner, who is always male and never female, who possesses the “agility of an acrobat and the foresight of an Hebrew prophet”, and whose qualities and tastes, or lack of them, have played such a dominating part in determining how an Englishman should react and what he may or may not do with impunity. But not even that “ideal vir constans” was expected to retain his self-control when catching his wife in the act of adultery, and the chink in the rule was this admission that there did exist in human affairs a certain circumstance which could understandably drive men beyond their normal self-control and so render their reaction less culpable. But this remained an exception, and as Lord Simon made clear in Holmes v. Director of Public Prosecutions [1946] A.C. 588, the mere confession of adultery was not sufficient. Taunting or gloating or brandishing the fact in words which might often prove more provocative even than a sudden, if unlikely, discovery, was not provocation sufficient to reduce the crime. To paraphrase Lord Simon’s well-known illustration, the only possible defence of Othello would have been to publish the circumstances of his crime for the urgent attention of the Home Secretary after the trial.

Until 1957, the classic direction given to juries in cases in which the sympathy of everyone was with the accused, where, in fact, the crime arose from passion or from pathos, was that given by Devlin, J., in R. v. Duffy [1949] 1 All E.R. 982. For he then defined provocation as “an act or series of acts done by the dead man to the accused which would cause in any reasonable person and actually caused in the accused a sudden and temporary loss of self-control, rendering the accused so subject to passion as to make him or her for the moment not master of his or her mind.” But in 1957 the Homicide Act, was universally hated and scorned even more than Dr. Johnson hated and scorned cant or the Whigs, altered the law. It provided, in s. 3, that on a charge of murder where there is evidence on which the jury can find that the accused was provoked (whether by things done or by things said or by both together) to lose his self-control, the question whether the provocation was enough to make a reasonable man do as he did shall be left to be determined by the jury. So the standard of the reasonable man, not the excitable, the irascible, the peculiar nor the particular, remains; but the jury are now permitted to consider things done, things said, or both together. In this sense the issue of provocation is very much at large. What, then of the English crime of passion or provocation?

Recently a husband was acquitted of the murder of his wife's lover and sentenced to a term of imprisonment for manslaughter. His defence was one of provocation and involved recounting the general circumstances of his life and the conduct and words of the man he killed. Because of the 1957 Act, the jury were permitted to consider everything done and everything said, and if they accepted the evidence as to what was said and done, to decide the effect which that would have had, in their opinion, upon a reasonable man. Although the husband had purchased a revolver and sought out the appointment with the lover, the jury, after listening to the whole story of the relationship of the parties concerned in the tragedy, and of what the husband had said and done and what was said and done to him, acquitted him of murder, and the prosecution, upon whom rests the burden to prove the absence of provocation, decided not to challenge the defence of provocation. In another recent case a mistress, learning that her lover was not to marry her, stabbed him to death. Again, after hearing the defence, the jury acquitted the woman of murder and convicted her of manslaughter. Of course, each particular case involves its own particular circumstances, but since 1957 this widening of the province of the jury in cases of this kind, so that they are now permitted and entitled to take into account broader and wider considerations, has surely prised open this branch of the criminal law so as to provide these ordinary, everyday, judges of the fact with greater opportunity of deciding for themselves the degree of blame which should rest upon the killer of another human being. In 1955 Mr. Melford Stevenson, Q.C. (now Mr. Justice Stevenson), for the defence of Ruth Ellis, was unable to address the jury after Mr. Justice Havers had ruled that there was not sufficient material even on a view of the evidence most favourable to the accused to support the verdict of manslaughter on the ground of provocation. That might not have been the case today, for although Ruth Ellis may have had "time to cool" from the time when she placed the revolver in her handbag, travelling thereafter several miles to Tanza Road, and the time when she eventually shot David Blakely, it could be (although I express no opinion as to the probability) that the jury might have found that the "things done" by David Blakely previously and at Tanza Road by going to and coming from the public-house, by seeing her and by turning away from her, combined with things previously said, did amount to provocation, and that in such circumstances Ruth Ellis was not guilty of murder but guilty of manslaughter. If s. 3 of the 1957 Act had then been law, might not Ruth Ellis have put in evidence before the jury, for them to believe or disbelieve, things said and things done which could have reduced the degree of culpability? For it is surely now open to anyone accused of murder to lay before a jury a wretched and possibly tragic recital of circumstances which preceded the killing. So a balance has shifted from the judge of the law to the judges of the fact, and with that shift of balance a greater opportunity is presented to the advocate. Madam Fahmy, with her husband crouching before her ready to spring like an animal, was acquitted of murder when her defence was self-defence. If she was tried today would the alternative be other than manslaughter? When Marshall Hall defended her, would he have not been more confident if, for his second barrel, he could have relied upon s. 3 of the Homicide Act, 1957?

Thus it appears that this modern English legislation has given greater power to the jury at a time when juries, apart from the war years, have never played so little part in civil law. They can be flattered, as they are properly flattered, by both judges and counsel, but they will surely take this new opportunity and use it sensibly, humanely and justly. So, for all that, le crime passionnel still remains inexorably alien, a colourful and romantic conception. While the arts of the Great Advocate associated with crimes of passion must yet be left in the capable hands of Mr. Charles Laughton and Mr. Michael Dennis.—S.J.

REPORTS

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL CIVIL.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. M. C. Chagla, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice S. T. Desai.

v.

A. V. VENKATESWARAN.*

Sea Customs Act (VIII of 1878), Secs. 87, 29, 29B, 30, 39, 182, 188, 191—Constitution of India, Art. 226—Assessment order under s. 87 whether administrative order or quasi-judicial order—Difference between administrative and quasi-judicial orders—Assessing authority to give reasons for making particular assessment order or for issuing short notice levy—Whether Court can consider affidavit disclosing such reasons in absence of reasons in order of assessment itself—Court's power to entertain writs when alternative remedy available to petitioner—Whether customs authority in determining real value of goods bound by price shown on invoice—Evidentiary value of invoice—Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Secs. 23(3), 37.

An assessment order made under s. 87 of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, is an administrative order and not a quasi-judicial order.

The difference between an administrative and a quasi-judicial order does not lie merely in this that in the case of a quasi-judicial order a writ of certiorari can be issued. The more fundamental difference between the two orders is that in the case of a quasi-judicial order the Court must require and demand from the authority exercising his functions that he will conform to the judicial process.

affidavits at the trial, then the Court could look into those reasons and consider those reasons as if they were the reasons embodied in the order itself.

The reason why the Courts refuse to entertain writs when an alternative remedy is available is that the Legislature has set up tribunals for decision in appeals and that the remedy which the Court could give, the petitioner could obtain from these tribunals. But whether the petitioner should be disentitled to maintain the petition or not is a matter of discretion with the Court, and if the Court is satisfied that the petitioner will not get justice from the appellate tribunal or that he would have no confidence in the decision of the tribunal or that the appeal would be nothing more than an appeal from Caesar to Caesar, then the Court is not bound to accede to the submission of the State that it should not hear the petitioner and the petitioner should be referred to the appellate tribunal set up under the Act.

In determining the real value of goods for the purposes of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, the Customs authorities are not bound by the price shown on the invoice by the importer. The invoice is an important piece of evidence to determine what the real value is. But that piece of evidence may be discarded if the authorities take the view that it is not a genuine document or if they take the view that over and above the price which is being paid some other consideration has passed under the document.

Section 30(b) of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, does not in any way import into its construction any consideration as to the character of the importer. What is emphasised is the cost of the goods, whoever the importer may be.

In order to test the genuineness of the invoice the customs authorities may requisition to their aid any other facts, but only for that purpose. They may consider if they like the cost in Europe, cost of production, or any other factor. But all those considerations must ultimately be directed to the determination and ascertainment of the only fact which has got to be determined and ascertained under s. 30(b) of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, which is the cost of the goods of like kind and quality at the place of importation.

The facts appear in the judgment.

H. M. Seervai, Advocate General, with R. J. Joshi and N. A. Palkhivala, for the appellants.

Sir Nusserwanji Engineer, with V. J. Taraporevala, for the respondents.

CHAGLA C.J. Although the ultimate question that we have to decide in this appeal lies in a very narrow compass, it raises certain questions of considerable public importance. The appellants before us are a company registered in India and they deal in anti-biotics, pharmaceuticals and foods, and for the purpose of their business they have been importing into India since about February 1951 large quantities from Glaxo Laboratories Ltd., U.K., of vitamin B.12 in bulk of the value of several lakhs of rupees every year. The appellant company admittedly is a subsidiary company of the English company. From February 1951 to May 1955, the appellants entered in their bill of entry for the purpose of customs duty the invoice value of the goods. Between June 1955 to May 1956, they showed the real value of the goods as the wholesale price of the goods in the United Kingdom, and after May 1956 they reverted to their original practice of showing the invoice value. In this appeal we are concerned in all with ten consignments. The first six consignments arrived in India in April 1956 and September 1956 and the value of these consignments was shown in the bill of entry as £72-3-9 per gram. This was the invoice price. The Customs authority did not accept the invoice value and assessed these six consignments on the basis of the price of £87-10-0 per gram and levied assessment on that basis. Thereupon the appellants made applications for refund claiming the difference between £87-10-0 per gram and £72-3-9 per gram. The Customs authority on its part issued what has been described as short levy notices. These notices were in respect of liability to pay a larger amount and it was stated in these short levy notices that pending finalisation of the investigation an amount was mentioned as an anticipated less charge. After the six consignments had arrived, the price of vitamin B.12 was reduced from £72-3-9 to £65-2-3. The seventh consignment arrived in November 1956, the eighth in December 1956 and the ninth in February 1957, and the appellants prepared their bill of entry with regard to these three consignments on the basis of the invoice price. In respect of these three consignments short levy notices were issued by the Customs authority on the basis that the appellants were liable to pay 12½ per cent. in addition to the invoice price. The goods were passed on the basis of the amount entered in the bill of entry by the appellants, but the assessment was not accepted by the Customs authority, and therefore the short levy notices were issued. With regard to the first six consignments prior to the date of the petition which the appellants filed, the short levy notices were withdrawn and as a matter of fact a certain amount was refunded by the Customs authority because it was found that even on the basis that they had adopted the amount at which the goods had been assessed was not the proper amount. With regard to the short levy notices in respect of consignments 7, 8 and 9, they were followed up by a demand notice which called upon the appellants to pay the amount in respect of which the short levy notices were issued. The tenth consignment with which we are concerned is the consignment of March 10, 1957, and, without going into unnecessary details, as far as this consignment was concerned the final order of assessment was made by the Collector himself on April 15, 1957, and the assessment of this consignment was also made on the basis that the appellants were liable to pay 12½ per cent. more than the invoice value. The invoice value, which was accepted for the purpose, as we shall presently point out, was the invoice of Messrs. Voltas Ltd. This petition was filed challenging the order of assessment with regard to the six consignments and for a direction that the refund application made by the appellants should be disposed of by the Customs authority. With regard to the seventh, eighth and ninth consignments, the challenge was made against the short levy notices which were served upon the appellants and, as pointed out, in respect of which a notice of demand had been sent by the Customs authority. With regard to the tenth consignment, the challenge was against the order of assessment passed, as pointed out, by the Collector.

The narrow issue that arises in this case for our determination, and which is a matter of controversy between the appellants and the Customs authorities, is this. What the Customs authorities have done and what they seek to justify is that they have taken into consideration identical goods vitamin B.12 manufactured by Glaxo Ltd. of United Kingdom and imported by Voltas Ltd. and added to the invoice price shown in the invoice of Voltas Ltd. 12½ per cent. discount, and the question that we have to decide is whether, looking to the language of the statute and the liability of the appellants to pay customs duty, this assessment is in accordance with law.

The first and the most important question that has been debated at the Bar is whether the order made by the Customs authorities is an administrative order or a quasi-judicial order. The consequences of holding the order to be quasi-judicial are important and serious, because the consequence is not merely this that in this particular case we would be in a position to issue a writ of certiorari against the Customs authorities and to correct any error of law apparent on the face of the record. If the consequences stopped at that, even then we would have to seriously consider the arguments advanced by the Advocate General and Sir Nusservanji Engineer. But the consequences are much more far-reaching, because if we were to hold that when the Assistant Collector or the Appraising Officer assessed goods imported into India to customs duty he is performing a quasi-judicial function, then it must follow as a necessary and inevitable consequence that in assessing the goods of every importer he must observe the rules of natural justice. In other words, his assessment must be in accordance with what is known as the judicial process. Administrative and executive processes are very different from judicial processes. A Court or a body which is acting judicially has to conform to certain judicial standards. There are certain rules which are known as rules of natural justice which have got to be conformed with. A decision cannot be given behind the back of the party affected. The Court or the authority or the tribunal cannot take into consideration evidence without giving the party affected an opportunity to explain that evidence. Therefore, the difference between an administrative and a quasi-judicial order does not lie merely in this that in the case of a quasi-judicial order a writ of certiorari can be issued. The more fundamental difference between the two orders is that in the case of a quasi-judicial order the Court must require and demand from the authority exercising his functions that he will conform to the judicial process.

In deciding whether this order made by the Customs authorities is a quasi-judicial order or not, a large number of authorities were cited by the Advocate General. As far as India is concerned, the test that has got to be applied is the test which was laid down by the Supreme Court in *Province of Bombay v. Khushaldas Advani*¹, and it has not been suggested and it cannot be suggested that the Supreme Court in any subsequent decision has revised or reviewed that case. But what is urged by the Advocate General is that the law has developed since Advani's case was decided and there is nothing in subsequent decisions which is contrary to what was laid down in Advani's case, but the subsequent decisions clarify and to a certain extent simplify what was stated by the learned Judges of the Supreme Court in that case. Now, Advani's case, with respect, did not lay down anything new. It laid down a test which has become a locus classicus in any decision dealing with quasi-judicial or administrative orders, and the test is the famous test laid down by Lord Justice Atkin in Rex v. Electricity Commissioners: London Electricity Joint Committee Co. (1920), *Ex parte*², and the test is—if repetition may be forgiven—

“Wherever any body of persons having legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of subjects, and having the duty to act judicially, act in excess of their legal authority they are subject to the controlling jurisdiction of the King's Bench Division exercised in these writs.” (p. 205)

Therefore, this definition lays down three tests. You must have a body of persons who must have legal authority to determine questions, the second test is that the questions which they have to determine affect the rights of subjects, and the third test is that a duty must be imposed upon this body of persons to act judicially. There can be no doubt in this case that the first two tests are satisfied. The Customs officer who makes the assessment has to determine certain questions. There is also no doubt that these questions affect the rights of subjects and affect them very seriously because on the determination of the Customs officer depends the liability of the assessee to pay certain customs duty. But the difficulty is caused, as it was caused in Advani's case, with regard to the third test. Is there a duty cast upon the Customs officer to act judicially? Therefore, however serious the question may be which the officer has to decide, however much it may affect the rights of subjects, if the Court cannot find a duty imposed upon the officer to act judicially, the act will not be a quasi-judicial act but an administrative act. This third test was emphasised in the majority judgment and especially in the judgment of Chief Justice Kanja. At p. 6 the learned Chief Justice says:

“...It seems to me that the true position is that when the law under which the authority is making a decision itself requires a judicial approach, the decision will be quasi-judicial.”

Therefore, we must look at the statute which sets up a tribunal or which provides for certain decisions by officers, to see whether that statute requires the tribunal or the officer to act judicially. It is perfectly true that no statute will provide that the tribunal or the officer shall act judicially. If there was such an express provision, no difficulty whatsoever would arise in construing provisions of a statute. But the difficulty arises because the statute in express terms does not impose the duty of acting judicially. One has got to look at the various provisions of the statute in order to come to the conclusion whether considering those provisions it was incumbent upon the authority or the tribunal to act judicially.

1 (1950) 53 Bom. L.R. 1, S.C.

Now, as we shall presently point out, in no subsequent case in India or in England this third test laid down by Lord Justice Atkin has ever been departed from. The Advocate General's contention is this that what the recent English decisions have laid down is that in order to apply the third test a simple method has been devised and that simple method is to find out whether the particular authority or tribunal has to ascertain facts according to law, and if that tribunal or authority has to ascertain facts according to law and in ascertaining those facts that authority cannot be influenced by any considerations of policy or expediency, then you must infer and must come to the conclusion that that tribunal or authority has to act judicially. If that were the true test, undoubtedly the task of the Courts would be considerably simplified. Take this very case. It is perfectly true that the Customs authorities have to ascertain facts according to law. The Customs authorities have to determine what the nature of the goods is and what is the duty which the importer has to pay according to the provisions of the Sea Customs Act. It is equally clear that in ascertaining those facts the Customs authorities have not got to be influenced by any questions of policy or expediency. They must do their duty honestly and impartially. Therefore, if the test suggested by the Advocate General were sound, then without considering the other provisions of the statute we must come to the conclusion that the Customs authorities in passing orders of assessment must act judicially and that an order of assessment is a quasi-judicial order. But unfortunately such simple tests are always denied to Courts of law. When we look at the English decisions on which the Advocate General has relied, it will be found that the learned Judges there had emphasised the fact that each case must be considered on its own merits, that in each case the act or the statute must be looked at, and taking the circumstances of each case and the provisions of the statute the Court must come to the conclusion whether a particular order is an administrative order or a quasi-judicial order. If all that had to be done was to apply the test as suggested by the Advocate General, then it would be unnecessary for the Courts in England to have emphasised the necessity of considering each case on its own merits. In Advani's case it was pointed out that in applying this test it made no difference whether a decision of an officer was a subjective decision or an objective decision. The Advocate General sought to distinguish Advani's case on the ground that under the Requisition Act it was the subjective determination of the officer for the purposes of requisitioning which largely influenced the Supreme Court in coming to the conclusion that the requisitioning order was an administrative order, and it is pointed out that in the Sea Customs Act the decision is not a subjective determination but it is an objective determination. The Customs officer has objectively to find facts. He has not to import any subjective influence or attitude or outlook into his determination, and it is said that the principle laid down in Advani's case cannot possibly apply to the Sea Customs Act. It seems to us a rather difficult proposition to accept that whenever an officer is acting objectively and whenever he is required to act impartially and not to be influenced by policy or expediency, his order must in every case and of necessity be a quasi-judicial order. As one of the Judges in England has said, even an administrative officer not acting judicially may act reasonably, and we may say that even an administrative officer not acting judicially must act honestly and impartially. But to suggest that whenever there is a duty to act impartially and honestly, to be loyal to facts and not to persons, it converts the decision of an officer into a quasi-judicial order, is a proposition which on the authorities we find it difficult to accept.

The decision which has been most strongly relied upon is the decision in •

*R. v. Manchester Legal Aid Committee.*¹ That was rather an unusual case and such a case could only have arisen in England. The question was with regard to legal aid and a debtor applied for legal aid and a certificate for legal aid was given to him. The debtor then became insolvent and the trustee in bankruptcy then applied for the legal aid certificate which had been given to the debtor. The legal aid certificate was given to the trustee to continue the bankrupt's claim against the defendant which happened to be a company. Thereupon the company applied for an order of certiorari on the ground that the committee, under the Legal Aid and Advice Act of 1949 which had issued the certificate, had no power to grant a certificate to a trustee in bankruptcy, and the question that was raised and discussed at great length was whether the order passed by this committee was an administrative order or a quasi-judicial order, because a writ of certiorari could not have been issued unless it was held that the order passed by the committee was a quasi-judicial order. At pages 415 and 416 the provisions of the Legal Aid and Advice Act are set out, and in his able argument Sir Hartley Shawcross points out that it would be shocking if a committee consisting entirely of lawyers had not to make its decisions judicially. Therefore, here we have a law by which lawyers had to decide whether a particular person was entitled to legal aid or not, and it was this decision which was being considered by the English Court as to whether it was a quasi-judicial decision or an administrative decision, and it is in this context and with this background that one must look at the observations made in the judgment. At page 428, in the judgment of Mr. Justice Parker, what is emphasised, and with respect we agree, is that it is not necessary that there should be a formal lis before it could be said that the decision of the authority is a quasi-judicial decision. It is sufficient if there are proposals and opposition and evidence has to be taken by the authority. But at the end of page 428 Mr. Justice Parker says:

"The true view, as it seems to us, is that the duty to act judicially may arise in widely different circumstances which it would be impossible, and, indeed, inadvisable, to attempt to define exhaustively. Where the decision is that of a Court, then, unless, as in the case, for instance, of justices granting excise licenses, it is acting in a purely ministerial capacity, it is clearly under a duty to act judicially. When, on the other hand, the decision is that of an administrative body and is actuated in whole or in part by questions of policy, the duty to act judicially may arise in the course of arriving at that decision. Thus, if, in order to arrive at the decision, the body concerned had to consider proposals and objections and consider evidence, then there is the duty to act judicially in the course of that inquiry."

Therefore, far from laying down a simple and invariable test, Mr. Justice Parker is at pains to emphasise not only that it will be impossible but it would be inadvisable to attempt to define exhaustively the circumstances in which it could be said that it was the duty of an authority or a tribunal to act judicially. Then comes the passage at page 431 which has been most strongly relied upon by the Advocate General, and which is the whole basis of his argument, and this is what the learned Judge says:

"The present case, as it seems to us, is an a fortiori case. Though the local committees may be said to be administrative bodies in the sense that they are responsible for administering the Act, they are quite unconcerned with questions of policy. They cannot refuse legal aid because the fund is becoming depleted or because they think that certain forms of action should be discouraged. They have to decide the matter solely on the facts of the particular case, solely on the evidence before them and apart from any extraneous considerations. In other words, they must act judicially, not judiciously."

It is perfectly true that in the context of this case, considering the provisions of the Act, Mr. Justice Parker did attach great importance to the fact that the committee had to decide the matters on facts and evidence without permitting extraneous considerations to affect their decision. But to say that in this passage the English Court has laid down an unfailing and unvarying test, is to read this passage out of its context. This passage must be read with the caution which the learned Judge has administered earlier to which reference has been made.

A decision of the Privy Council was also strongly relied upon and that is the case of *Secretary of State v. Mask & Co.*¹ There is a passage in the judgment of the Privy Council which, divorced from its context, may lead to the conclusion that where tribunals are set up which may be considered as statutory tribunals, it is the duty of these tribunals to act judicially. What the Privy Council there said was that even if jurisdiction is so excluded (dealing with the Sea Customs Act which excluded the jurisdiction of the civil Courts) the civil Courts had jurisdiction to examine into cases where the provisions of the Act had not been complied with, or the statutory tribunal had not acted in conformity with the fundamental principles of judicial procedure; and the Advocate General says that if we find that the Customs officer has not acted in conformity with the fundamental principles of judicial procedure, we have a right to interfere, and he says that fundamental principles of judicial procedure is merely a paraphrase of rules of natural justice and therefore the Privy Council held that there was a duty cast upon the authority set up under the Sea Customs Act to act judicially. It should be borne in mind that what was challenged before the Privy Council was not the original order of the Customs authorities but the order in appeal. An appeal had been preferred, a revision had also been preferred, and after exhausting all the legal remedies the matter had come before the Privy Council. It is perfectly clear, as has been pointed out in R. v. Manchester Legal Aid Committee that there may be stages laid down by a statute which would provide that at a particular stage the officer or the tribunal acts in his executive capacity or in his administrative capacity and at a different stage he has got to act judicially or quasi-judicially, and as we will point out when we examine the provisions of the Sea Customs Act, under that Act also it is quite possible to take the view that although the Customs officer when he passes the order of assessment is acting administratively, when the matter goes in appeal to the higher authority, at that stage, the authority set up under the Act, has got to act quasi-judicially. Therefore, we do not read this judgment of the Privy Council, and indeed we cannot, as laying down an all embracing principle that wherever statutory tribunals are set up it is their duty to act in conformity with fundamental principles of judicial procedure. The Privy Council could not have overlooked the test laid down by Lord Justice Atkin and could not have decided that whether there was a duty cast upon the tribunal to act judicially or not, the mere fact that a statutory tribunal was set up was sufficient for a Court to take the view that it was the duty of that tribunal to act in conformity with the fundamental principles of judicial procedure.

Reliance was also placed by the Advocate General on a decision of the Calcutta High Court in *Assistant Collector v. Soorajmull*². That is a judgment of Chief Justice Harries and Mr. Justice Banerjee, and a passage in the judgment of the learned Chief Justice which is relied upon for another purpose and in another context is that appeals and revisions provided under the Sea Customs Act are in the nature of appeals from Caesar to Caesar and might not be regarded with any great confidence by persons in the position of the respondents in the case. But on the point that we are at present considering, reliance was placed on the judgment of Mr. Justice Banerjee and Mr. Justice Banerjee, with respect, with admirable research has set out all the relevant decisions on the point, he has also told us what the qualifications of a Judge should be, quoting Dr. Robson, but after all this he comes to the conclusion that he has simply applied the law laid down in Advani's case. So we go back, after learned discussion, to Advani's case and the test we have to apply is the test laid down in Advani's case. It may be noted that that particular case on the facts turned not on an order of assessment but it was a case where the

2 (1952) 56 C.W.N. 452

Customs authorities levied additional duty and imposed fine, and the question was whether that particular order of the Customs authorities was a quasi-judicial order, and, as we shall point out, it is now beyond controversy that such an order is a quasi-judicial order.

It has been pointed out to us by the Advocate General that the decision in *B. v. Manchester Legal Aid Committee*¹ has been favourably considered by this Court in Pandyan Ins. Co. v. K. J. Khambata,² and has received the approval of the Supreme Court in two cases—*Express Newspaper Ltd. v. Union of India*³ and *Nagendra Nath v. Commr. of Hills Division*⁴, and it is said that whatever Advani's case might have decided, the Supreme Court as recently as this year has given its imprimatur to the decision of the English Court in B. v. Manchester Legal Aid Committee. But we do not read the decision in B. v. Manchester Legal Aid Committee to lay down any law different from the law laid down in Advani's case. It is perhaps, with respect, a fuller and a more elaborate exposition of the law, and therefore when the Supreme Court cites this decision with approval it does not mean that the Supreme Court in 1958 took a different view of the law from the view taken by the Supreme Court in Advani's case.

Reference was also made to a decision in Nakkuda Ali v. M. F. Des. Jayaratne.⁵ That is the decision of the Privy Council and there the Privy Council was dealing with the Controller of Textiles in Ceylon and the Privy Council held that the Controller in acting under a certain regulation was not acting judicially and that regulation dealt with the cancellation of licenses. Lord Radcliffe delivering the judgment of the Committee has reviewed all the authorities. At p. 75 the learned Law Lord rightly emphasises that the status of the person or body who passed the order has nothing to do with the question as to whether he has to act judicially or not. This is what he says (p. 75):

"...In truth, the only relevant criterion by English law is not the general status of the person or body of persons by whom the impugned decision is made but the nature of the process by which he or they are empowered to arrive at their decision. When it is a judicial process or a process analogous to the judicial, certiorari can be granted." And at p. 77 he poses the question:

"But it does not seem to follow necessarily from this that the Controller must be acting judicially in exercising the power. Can one not act reasonably without acting judicially?"

And at the same page he emphasises the duty to act judicially by saying:

"...If he is not under a duty so to act then it would not be according to law that his decision should be amenable to review and, if necessary, to avoidance by the procedure of certiorari."

And at p. 78 he cites with approval the judgment of Lord Hewart C.J. in *Rez v. Legislative Committee of the Church Assembly*⁶:

"...In order that a body may satisfy the required test it is not enough that it should have legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of subjects; there must be superadded to that characteristic the further characteristic that the body has the duty to act judicially."

Having cited this passage the learned Law Lord went on to examine the provisions of the Ceylon Act with which the Committee was dealing and this is what he says (p. 415):

"It is that characteristic that the Controller lacks in acting under reg. 62. In truth, when he cancels a licence he is not determining a question: he is taking executive action to withdraw a privilege because he believes, and has reasonable grounds to believe, that the holder is unfit to retain it. But, that apart, no procedure is laid down by the regulation for securing that the licence holder is to have notice of the Controller's intention to revoke the licence, or that there must be any inquiry, public or private, before the Controller acts. The licence-holder has no right to appeal to the Controller or from the Controller. In brief, the power conferred on the Controller by reg. 62 stands by itself on the bare words of the regulation and, if the mere requirement that the Controller must have reasonable grounds of belief is insufficient to oblige him to act judicially, there is nothing else in the context or conditions of his jurisdiction that suggests that he must regulate his action by analogy to judicial rules."

The Advocate General is quite right that the provisions of the Sea Customs Act are different from the provisions which Lord Radcliffe was considering. As we shall point out, the question here is not the subjective question of whether licence should be withdrawn from a particular person or not. There is a right of appeal provided under the Sea Customs Act. But the Sea Customs Act approximates to regulation 62 which the learned Law Lord was considering to this extent that no regulation is laid down for securing that the assessee should have notice or that there should be an inquiry public or private before the Customs authorities can act. But it would be unsafe and even erroneous to apply a decision, however weighty, on a construction of a particular statute to the construction of an entirely different statute, and the Advocate General is right that although the Privy Council might have held that the Controller of Textiles in Ceylon is not acting judicially, the Customs authorities under the Sea Customs Act may have to act judicially and to observe the judicial process. But for that purpose we must look to the provisions of the Sea Customs Act itself.

We now, therefore, turn to consider what the Sea Customs Act lays down. The charging section is s. 20:

"Except as hereinafter provided, customs-duties shall be levied at such rates as may be prescribed by or under any law for the time being in force,...."

Then we have s. 22 which confers upon the Central Government the power to fix tariff values on any goods exported or imported by sea on which customs duties are by law imposed. This is a very important power because not only has Government a right by law to fix the duty which an importer has to pay, but under this section the Central Government has been given the power and the authority to fix the value artificially of the goods which are imported. In other words, the Central Government could say that the value of vitamin B.12 shall be so many pounds per gram for the purpose of customs duty. Of course, we agree with the Advocate General that this power under s. 22 has to be exercised taking into consideration the international obligations into which India has entered and which India always respects. But apart from international obligations there is nothing to prevent the Central Government from fixing artificially any tariff value in respect of any goods which are imported. This is rather important to bear in mind when we come to consider the merits of the matter. Then we have s. 29 which provides:

"On the importation into, or exportation from, any custom-port of any goods, whether liable to duty or not, the owner of such goods shall, in his bill of entry or shipping bill, as the case may be, state the real value, quantity and description of such goods to the best of his knowledge and belief, and shall subscribe a declaration of the truth of such statement at the foot of such bill."

It is this obligation which was cast upon the appellants which they had to discharge by showing in their bill of entry the real value of vitamin B.12 which they imported into India. The real value which they had to show was not the real value determined by any objective standard. The Legislature itself has supplied a definition for the expression "real value" because in s. 30 it is provided: "For the purposes of this Act the real value shall be deemed to be..." In using this expression the Legislature is introducing a legal fiction. Whatever real value in fact may be, for the purpose of this Act the real value shall be what the Legislature has defined it to be, and that definition is:

"(a) the wholesale cash price, less trade discount, for which goods of the like kind and quality are sold, or are capable of being sold, at the time and place of importation •

or exportation, as the case may be, without any abatement or deduction whatever, except (in the case of goods imported) of the amount of the duties payable on the importation thereof: or

(b) where such price is not ascertainable, the cost at which goods of the like kind and quality could be delivered at such place, without any abatement or deduction except as aforesaid."

We shall have much more to say with regard to this section when we come to deal with the question in controversy between the parties as to what duty the appellants are liable to pay. Turning back to s. 29, the second paragraph of that section provides:

"In case of doubt, the Customs-collector may require any such owner or any other person in possession of any invoice, broker's note, policy of insurance or other document, whereby the real value, quantity or description of any such goods can be ascertained, to produce the same, and to furnish any information relating to such value, quantity or description which it is in his power to furnish. And thereupon such person shall produce such document and furnish such information:"

Considerable emphasis was placed by the Advocate General on this part of s. 29 and what was urged is that this is an indication of the judicial process which the Customs Collector has to follow because if he has any doubt as to the real value, power has been conferred upon him to requisition the necessary materials not only from the owner of the goods but also from any other person, and therefore it is suggested that the Legislature did not desire that the Customs Collector should decide matters ex parte but that he should call for the necessary materials and evidence, decide on those materials and evidence, and therefore decide judicially and in accordance with the well-known rules of natural justice. It is pointed out that this paragraph also casts a duty upon the person to produce the document and to furnish the information when he is called upon to do. In our opinion, this only deals with cases where the Customs Collector feels doubt. Normally Customs Collectors are so constituted that they do not feel doubt and if they do not there is no obligation cast upon them by this section to call for the documents or information which this section empowers them to do. Besides, it would not be proper in this context to read the expression "may" as "shall" or "must". It is a discretionary power conferred upon the Customs Collector, and the power is undoubtedly very wide, because under this power not only the owner or the importer but also any other person is bound to produce materials, information and documents which the Customs Collector requires.

Attention was also drawn to the new section which has been incorporated in the Sea Customs Act by the Sea Customs (Amendment) Act (XXI of 1955) and that is s. 29B and that section now empowers the Customs authorities to make a provisional assessment of duty. An interesting argument was advanced before us that the short levy notices were not according to law because they were in fact provisional assessments of duty and not short levy notices contemplated by s. 39 to which we shall refer. But fortunately, as we shall point out when we come to the end of this judgment, it is not necessary to decide this question in appeal. Turning to s. 39, it gives power to the Customs authorities, when customs duties or charges have not been levied or have been short-levied through inadvertence, error, collusion or misconception on the part of the officers of Customs, or through misstatement as to real value, quantity or description on the part of the owner, or when any such duty or charge, after having been levied, has been, owing to any such causes erroneously refunded, to call upon the person concerned to pay the duty or charge or deficiency or to repay the amount paid to him in excess, on a notice of demand being issued to him within three months from the relevant date as defined in sub-s. (2), and the relevant date is the date of the assessment. Then we come to s. 86 which obliges the importer to enter in the bill of entry the goods which have been imported. Then comes s. 87 which is the material section for the purpose of assessment. That section says:—

sed, and the owner of such goods may then proceed to clear the same for home-consumption, or warehouse them, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained."

A striking feature of this section, as compared with other taxing statutes to which we shall presently turn, is the almost extreme simplicity in which the power to assess has been conferred upon the relevant authority. The Legislature has given no direction whatever in this section as to how the assessment should be made, whether any notice should be given to the assessee, whether any inquiry should be held, and except the barest of language used, the section contains no indication that the assessing authority has to proceed to assess according to judicial process or that while assessing it is the duty of the assessing authority to act judicially. It is very pertinent in this connection to turn to s. 182 which deals with penalties, and to note the language used by the Legislature in this section in contrast to the language used in the assessing s. 87. Section 182 provides:

"In every case, except the cases mentioned in section 167, Nos. 28, 72, and 74 to 76, both inclusive, in which, under this Act, anything is liable to confiscation or to increased rates of duty; or any person is liable to penalty, such confiscation, increased rate of duty or penalty may be adjusted—" and then follows the jurisdiction conferred upon various authorities. Therefore, the Legislature expressly required the authorities, who were empowered to impose penalties, to adjudge whether a person was liable to the penalty or not, and implicit in the expression "adjudged" is the duty to act judicially; the duty to act as a Judge and not as an administrative or executive officer. It is by reason of this that although some doubt was expressed by the Supreme Court earlier, the Supreme Court has now finally held that under s. 182 the decision of the officer is a quasi-judicial order. See *P. N. Roy v. Collector of Customs, Calcutta*¹, affirmed in Leo Roy Frey v. Superintendent, Dt. Jail.² Section 188 deals with appeals and gives the right to any person who is aggrieved by any decision or order passed by a Customs officer to appeal to any officer of Customs not inferior in rank to a Customs Collector and empowered in that behalf by name or in virtue of his office, or to the Chief Customs authority; and as far back as Secretary of State v. Mask & Co., the Privy Council held that an appeal lay not only from an order passed under s. 182 but it lay against any order passed under the Sea Customs Act including an order of assessment. Section 191 deals with the revisional power of the Central Government.

Now, having considered the scheme of the Sea Customs Act, in our opinion it is difficult to take the view that the statute imposes any obligation upon the assessing authority to act judicially. Although that duty may be imposed in a case of an adjudication under s. 182 and also a decision of an appeal under s. 188, it does not necessarily follow that at the initial stage of assessment when an assessment is made under s. 87 the assessment order is a quasi-judicial order. In this connection it would not be out of place to compare the parallel provisions of the Income-tax Act. Mr. Seervai is right that in a sense the Sea Customs Act is in pari materia with the Income-tax Act. Both are taxing statutes. The Court in both cases must be anxious to construe provisions of the law in favour of the subject and try and see that the subject is not denied any right which the Court can possibly ensure to him. Turning to the Income-tax Act, it is now settled law that an assessment made by the Income-tax Officer under s. 23(3) is a quasi-judicial proceeding, and when we look at the language of that section we find that the statute has provided:

"On the day specified in the notice issued under sub-section (2), or as soon afterwards as may be, the Income-tax Officer, after hearing such evidence as such person may produce and such other evidence as the Income-tax Officer may require, on specified points, shall, by an order in writing, assess the total income of the assessee, and determine the sum payable by him on the basis of such assessment."

When one compares the language of this sub-section with the language of s. 87 of the Sea Customs Act, the contrast is not only apparent but striking. Sub-section (3) of s. 23 makes it obligatory upon the Income-tax Officer to hear the evidence as may be produced by the assessee. Sub-section (2) makes it obligatory upon the Income-tax Officer to issue a notice; and the whole language of sub-s. (3) clearly indicates that the Legislature intended that the Income-tax Officer should follow the judicial process in arriving at his conclusion. No such indication is given in s. 87 of the Sea Customs Act. The next section in the Income-tax Act to which attention might be drawn is s. 37. That section deals with the power of the Income-tax authorities and it provides:

"The Income-tax Officer, Appellate Assistant Commissioner, Commissioner and Appellate Tribunal shall, for the purposes of this Act, have the same powers as are vested in a court under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, when trying a suit in respect of the following matters,..."

and power is given for discovery and inspection enforcing the attendance of any person, of compelling the production of books of account, issuing commissions, and there is also power conferred upon the various Income-tax authorities to examine persons on oath. The Advocate General said that we find corresponding powers in the second paragraph of s. 29 of the Sea Customs Act. In our opinion, the ambit of the powers of the Income-tax authorities under s. 37 is much wider than the ambit of their powers under the second paragraph of s. 29, and the wide ambit conferred upon the Income-tax authorities under s. 37 is a further indication that the Legislature intended the Income-tax authorities to act as a Court in the sense of adopting and observing the substantial principles of judicial procedure which a Court follows and observes.

Before we pass from this subject, a passing reference may be made to two judgments which were referred to at the Bar. One is the judgment in what has come to be known as "the fountain pen case" in *B. N. Banerjee, Collector of Customs, Bombay v. Ramchand Sobhraj*¹, and from the judgment it appears that the appellate Court took the view that the order of assessment passed by the Customs authorities was an administrative order. But we agree with the Advocate General that that observation was not based upon any argument advanced before the Court as to whether the order was administrative or quasi-judicial. In that case the Court assumed that the order was an administrative order, and that decision, as rightly observed by the Advocate General, is no authority for the proposition that this Court has held that an assessment order is an administrative order. The other case is the Ball-bearing case in Bombay Business House v. S. Venkatesan.² In that case my brother Mr. Justice S. T. Desai dismissed the application for a writ against the Customs authorities. All that we emphasised in that judgment was that whether it was a writ of certiorari or a writ of mandamus the questions of fact could not be gone into by this Court and this Court could not constitute itself into a Court of appeal.

If then the order of assessment is an administrative order and not a quasi-judicial order, the other head of the argument which was submitted to us by the Advocate General, that there is an error apparent on the face of the record, does not survive. We may point out that we listened to a very interesting argument and in this respect also our attention was drawn to the progress that the law has made in England and how the Courts have extended the jurisdiction in cases where the Courts in the earlier days would not have thought of issuing a writ of certiorari, in respect of a matter where no question of jurisdiction arose but the question was confined to an error of law committed by a judicial or quasi-judicial authority acting within jurisdiction.

The order made by the assessing authorities is also challenged on the ground that the order, although it is appealable, gives no reasons for the decision. Except in the case of the 10th consignment where the Collector ultimately made his order on April 15, 1957, it is not disputed that in making the assessment or in issuing the short levy notices no reasons were vouchsafed to the appellants as to how and why the assessing authorities came to a particular conclusion or assessed the appellants in a particular manner. It is again well settled law (see *C. R. H. Readymoney Ltd. v. State of Bombay*¹, a judgment of this Court, and also a judgment of the Supreme Court in *Nagendra Nath v. Commr. of Hills Division*²) that when a law confers a right of appeal, the Legislature intends that that right should be an effective right and that right can only be an effective right if the officer or authority from whose order an appeal lies gives reasons for his decision. It is only then that the appellate Court can properly discharge its function. It is only then that the appellate Court could consider whether the decision of the lower authority was correct or not. Now, as already pointed out, under s. 188 a right of appeal is conferred upon the assessee against the assessment order made by the assessing authorities. But notwithstanding this right of appeal, the assessing authorities have not thought fit, except in the case of the 10th consignment as pointed out, to give reasons for their decision. It would have been open to us to take the view that the matter should go back to the assessing authorities with a direction that they should give reasons for the decision and then those reasons could have been tested by this Court if the requisite writ could have lain. But we have agreed to the procedure suggested by the Advocate General, a procedure indeed which has been followed in English Courts, that even where reasons are not given, if the reasons are disclosed in affidavits at the trial, then the Court would look into those reasons and consider those reasons as if they were the reasons embodied in the order itself. Here we have a long and argumentative affidavit from the Collector which gives reasons for the decision and therefore instead of sending the matter back with a direction to the assessing authorities to give reasons for their decision, we have agreed to consider the reasons given by the Collector in the affidavit as if they were the reasons embodied in the order.

One other matter which may be considered and disposed of before we come to the merits is the question as to whether we should entertain this writ in view of the fact that the assessee had a right of appeal under s. 188, and Sir Nusservanji has strongly argued that we have always taken the view that if effective alternative and adequate remedy is open to the petitioner, the Court will not grant him relief under its extraordinary jurisdiction under art. 226 of the Constitution. The position here is rather unusual. In the nine consignments the order of assessment was made by the Customs Collector and under s. 188 the appeal lay to the Collector. But when the Collector passed an order of assessment with regard to the 10th consignment, he clearly indicated what his view on the merits of the petitioner's case was and we agree with the Advocate General that the Collector clearly pre-judged the decision of the appeal. It is quite true that we cannot judge administrative officers discharging judicial functions with the same strictness that we would judge a Judge sitting in Court. A Judge has to maintain certain standards of detachment and objectivity, apart from being impartial. But an administrative officer has to do a considerable amount of administrative work, decide questions of policy, give directions, give instructions, which would be intolerable if they were done by a Judge sitting in Court. But making all possible concession for an administrative officer and the Collector of Customs, we cannot possibly countenance the position urged by Sir Nusservanji that although he may clearly express his opinion, although he may emphatically indicate what his views are, the assessee must still be compelled solemnly to go before him in appeal to hear in appeal the decision which he has practically already given. The reason why the Courts refuse to entertain writs when an alternative remedy is available is that the Legislature has set up tribunals for decision in appeals and that the remedy which the Court could give the petitioner could obtain from these tribunals. But whether the petitioner should be disentitled to maintain the petition or not is a matter of discretion with the Court, and if the Court is satisfied that the petitioner will not get justice from the appellate tribunal or that he would have no confidence in the decision of the tribunal or that the appeal would be nothing more than—to use the language of Sir Trevor Harries—an appeal from Caesar to Caesar, then the Court is not bound to accede to the submission of the State that it should not hear the petitioner and the petitioner should be referred to the appellate tribunal set up under the Act. With regard to the 10th consignment, it is true that in that case the appeal lay to the Central Board of Revenue. But even there the Advocate General has pointed out that Government have issued specific instructions with regard to this particular case. When discussions were going on between the petitioners and the Collector, a particular interview is recorded by the petitioners in their letter of August 3, 1956, and the correctness of the facts set out in that letter has not been denied by the Customs authorities, and this is what the letter states:

“The Collector stated that there was no point in arguing the matter further—the Customs House had received orders from the Government of India in this sense and they were bound to follow such orders.”

This was in connection with the assessing of the petitioners' goods. Well, if the Customs authorities had to carry out the orders of Government, then very little would be left either of judicial process or the doing of justice in the sense that justice not only should be done but should seem to be done. While not in any way deviating from the principle we have laid down in writ cases, in our opinion in this particular case under the special circumstances of the case we will not refuse to entertain the petition on the ground that the appellants have had recourse to the appellate tribunal set up under the Sea Customs Act.

Coming to the merits of the matter, if the order of assessment is an administrative order, there can be no doubt that by a writ of mandamus we could compel the assessing authorities to act according to law. But before such a writ could be issued, it must be clear on the language of the statute itself that the action of the authorities was in contravention of the law. The petitioners must satisfy us that there was a clear duty incumbent upon the assessing authorities to act in accordance with certain specific provisions of the law and that they had failed to discharge that duty and have acted in contravention of the law. What is urged by the petitioners in this case is that in assessing the goods of the petitioners, the assessing authorities have taken into consideration matters which are extraneous matters which the law does not permit them to take into consideration. What is pointed out is that under s. 30(b) in order to determine the real value what the assessing authorities have to do is to ascertain the cost at which goods of the like kind and quality could be delivered in Bombay, and in so ascertaining the cost the Customs authorities can only take into consideration matters which are relevant and germane to that question and not matters which are entirely foreign to the consideration of that question. In this case it is clear that the case does not fall under s. 30(a) and the goods of the appellants are to be ascertained on the basis of s. 30(b). Looking at the language of that sub-section it is clear that what the assessing authorities have to do is to find out goods which are of the like kind and quality which are imported into Bombay and determine the cost at which they could be delivered in Bombay. In most cases there would be no difficulty in finding goods of like kind and quality, but we may have a case where goods are sui generis and you have only one importer importing those goods, and then the question may arise how are you going to find the cost of the goods of like kind and quality when no other goods are available in the market or no other goods have been imported in the country?

Now, this problem came up before the Privy Council and the Privy Council resolved this problem in Ford Motor Company of India Limited v. Secretary of State,¹ by holding that cl. (a) of s. 30 can be applied distributively to each of the Ford motor cars contained in a particular consignment. There the question was of assessing the Ford motor cars to duty and a Ford motor car cannot be compared with a motor car of any other make, and the Privy Council said, "take any one motor car, find out what the cost would be to deliver it at the place of import, and that would be the real value for the purpose of s.30(a)". Therefore, the decision of the Privy Council was that the goods under assessment themselves may under cl. (a) be considered as members of their own class even though at the time and place of importation there are no other members. The decision of the Privy Council was under cl. (a) of s. 30, but the language for the purpose of this discussion was the same as the language used in cl. (b), viz., goods of the like kind and quality, and what fell for construction before the Privy Council was the expression which we are construing. In this particular case this difficulty does not arise because, as we shall presently point out, although the case of the Customs authorities is that vitamin B.12 manufactured by Glaxo Ltd. in the United Kingdom and imported into India are goods which are sui generis, admittedly, there is another importer besides the appellants and that is Voltas Ltd. and the whole basis of the assessment made by the Customs authorities is the cost at which these goods were delivered to Voltas Ltd. We have a clear indication of the case of the Collector of Customs in the letter of April 15, 1957, to which reference has been made, and this is what the Collector says:

"It has been found that goods of like kind and quality are being imported by another importer, M/s. Voltas Ltd., Bombay, under a sole distributors' agreement entered into by them with the same suppliers. It has also been found necessary to enhance the invoice values charged by the suppliers to M/s. Voltas in the proportion of 87.5 to 100 in order to arrive at the assessable value under section 30(b) Sea Customs Act."

The whole of the controversy between the parties which we said at the outset is in a very narrow compass, is this. The appellants have no grievance, and they can have no grievance, to the Collector assessing the goods imported by the appellants on the basis of the goods imported by Voltas Ltd. because they are identical goods. The grievance of the appellants is that there is no justification on the part of the Collector and no warrant in law to add 12½ per cent. to the invoice value of the goods imported by Voltas Ltd.

We must now try and point out how this 12½ per cent. came to be added. It appears that there was an agreement between Voltas Ltd. and Glaxo Laboratories Ltd. of U. K. dated March 12, 1955, and the relevant provision of that agreement was:

"On all sales to you of the 1 gm. pack of bulk Glaxo Vitamin B.12 we undertake to allow you a discount of 12½% when the c.i.f. price is £ 87 10s. per gm., provided that in the event of any alteration in the said c.i.f. price or when in Glaxo's opinion changes in Indian commercial circumstances justify Glaxo doing so we shall have the right to reduce the discount to 10%."

Therefore, on the goods imported by Voltas Ltd. under this agreement, although the price was £ 87-10-0 they were allowed a discount of 12½ per cent. Therefore, the price as far as Voltas Ltd. was concerned was £ 87-10-0 less 12½ per cent. The Customs authorities then took the view, and rightly, that they were not concerned with this 12½ per cent. discount and that the price must be fixed on the basis of £ 87-10-0 and not on the basis of £ 87-10-0 less 12½ per cent. discount. Then there came a modification of this agreement on August 1, 1956, and by that modification Glaxo Laboratories Ltd., England, agreed to supply to Voltas Ltd. bulk Glaxo vitamin B. 12 at net f.o.b. prices without any trade discounts allowable whatsoever. Therefore, by this modification Voltas Ltd. did not get any discount or commission and they paid the price fixed by Glaxo Ltd. without getting any concession. Shortly put, the whole of the contention of the Customs authorities is that they are entitled to add back or to load the invoice price of Voltas Ltd. by 12½ per cent., and therefore in the consignments with which we are concerned in this appeal what the authorities have done is that they have looked at the invoice of Voltas Ltd. and added to the price shown 12½ per cent., and the question that falls for our determination is whether this is in accordance with law.

Now, we entirely agree with Sir Nusservanji that in determining the real value the Customs authorities are not bound by the price shown on the invoice by the importer. It would be an impossible position as far as the revenue of this country is concerned, if the Customs authorities had to accept whatever invoice was produced for their inspection and to determine the real value on the basis of that invoice. In fact, s. 30(b) does not refer to the invoice at all. The invoice is an important piece of evidence to determine what the real value is. But that piece of evidence may be discarded if the authorities take the view that it is not a genuine document or if they take the view that over and above the price which is being paid some other consideration has passed under the document. Take this very case. Although the invoice of Voltas Ltd. may show "X" pounds as the price of one gram of vitamin B.12 if the Customs authorities were satisfied that Voltas Ltd. were receiving 12½ per cent. discount and that discount was being paid to them and that that discount was not shown in the invoice but they had reason to believe that such a discount was credited to Voltas Ltd. in some way or other, then undoubtedly they would be entitled to say that the invoice price shown is not the proper price for the purpose of determining the real value. But if the Customs authorities come to the conclusion that the price shown in the invoice of Voltas Ltd. is the real price, that there is no other consideration which flows from Glaxo Ltd. to Voltas Ltd., then it is not open to the Customs authorities to take into consideration other extraneous factors which the law does not permit them to do. We are told by the Advocate General that apart from Voltas Ltd. and the appellants, there are other importers in Bombay who are importing vitamin B.12. It would be open to the Customs authorities to compare the cost at which these various importers have imported this particular commodity. We are told that it was suggested to the Customs authorities to take up this line and find out what the actual cost is, but they rejected it on the ground, as already pointed out, that the goods imported by the appellants were sui generis and they had instructions from Government to treat these goods as sui generis. Therefore, if the authorities have taken up that attitude, then they must determine according to law what the goods cost to Voltas Ltd. and that cost cannot be increased by any factor or any circumstance which does not fall within the purview of s. 30(b).

Now, we must say that the attitude taken up by the Collector in his affidavit seems to be a little inexplicable. As already pointed out, in the letter of April 15, 1957, the case of the Collector was clearly and explicitly set out that he had found that there were goods imported by another importer Voltas Ltd. and it had been found necessary to enhance the invoice value by 12½ per cent. This letter does not state why it was found necessary to enhance this value, but the reason now appears in the affidavit filed by the Collector. In para. 10 of that affidavit the Collector dealing with para. 22 of the petition says:

"I am not aware of and do not admit that between April and September 1956 and November 1956 to March 1957, Messrs. Voltas Ltd. did not in fact receive any discount in respect of the price of £72-3-8 per gm. F.O.B. Further, the Distributors' Agreement dated 18th March 1955 and the modification letter dated 1st August 1956 will also not be deemed to be admitted. I maintain that an agent is entitled to a commission on goods imported and if the invoices do not indicate the commission, it is proper to interpret that the value shown in the invoices is the net value after the deduction of the commission. The 'real value' of the goods in question was equal to the invoice value plus the undisclosed amount of the commission."

Now, here, we have in this affidavit a series of statements unwarranted by law, unwarranted by facts, and which disclose a complete confusion of thought. In the first part of this paragraph the Collector does not say that Voltas Ltd. received any commission in respect of the invoices after the modification of their agreement with Glaxo Ltd. after August 1, 1956. He merely takes up the technical attitude that he is not aware of and does not admit. Then he takes up rather this curious attitude that he does not admit the agreement and the modification with Voltas Ltd., although the very assessment of the petitioners was on the basis of the agreement between Glaxo Ltd. and Voltas Ltd. Then he propounds a statement of law which is erroneous that an agent is entitled to commission on goods imported. Surely, this is not a principle of law but a matter of agreement. There is no obligation on an agent to receive commission. An agent may or may not take commission and it is purely a question of fact and not a matter of law. Then he goes on to make this rather startling statement:

"...if the invoices do not indicate the commission, it is proper to interpret that the value shown in the invoices is the net value after the deduction of the commission."

We do not know what canon of construction has been adopted in order to consider these invoices. Then he ends up by saying:

"The real value of the goods in question was equal to the invoice value plus the undisclosed amount of the commission."

After having said that he was not aware and did not admit that Voltas Ltd. received any commission, here he seems to suggest that there was an undisclosed amount of commission which Voltas Ltd. had received.

Now, there does not seem to be any warrant on the record for the suggestion that Voltas Ltd. had received any commission which had not been disclosed. We would not have proceeded further in the matter if the Collector had told us that on the evidence or on the information he had come to the conclusion that Voltas Ltd. had received commission from Glaxo Ltd. which had not been disclosed and that he had added this commission to the invoice value of the goods consigned to Voltas Ltd. But as pointed out, he does not take up this attitude in the earlier part of para. 10 of his affidavit. It is more a case of suspicion and surmise. It is a case of willing to wound but afraid to strike. We do not think that this is a fair attitude for the Collector to take. We are all the more surprised because in all cases we have been dealing with under the Sea Customs Act in this Court, as we told Sir Nusserwanji and the Advocate General, we have always found the Customs authorities taking up a very responsible attitude and always trying to discharge their duty, which is always an unpleasant duty, to the best of their ability and always with due regard to the rights of the assessee under the law. Then we come to para. 12 and this is what the Collector says:

"As regards the case of Messrs. Voltas Ltd. cited by the petitioners, I say that Messrs. Voltas Ltd. were appointed Agents-Distributors of the English company and were allowed for their services, a commission of 12½ per cent. I say that the petitioners are not the Agents-Distributors of the said goods. In the circumstances, I say that in order to ascertain the 'real value' of the said goods, the relevant matter for consideration would be as to what is the gross value shown in the invoices of importers other than the Agents-Distributors, without abatement of the 12½ per cent discount given to Messrs. Voltas Ltd., as the Agents-Distributors."

Now, this is an extraordinary volte face on the part of the Collector, because having based his assessment on the invoices of Voltas Ltd. he here tells us that Voltas Ltd. were Agents-Distributors of the English company and that in order to ascertain the real value of the good what has got to be found is the gross value shown by the importers other than the Agents-Distributors, and again he adds the insinuation "without abatement of the 12½ per cent discount given to Messrs. Voltas Ltd. as the Agents-Distributors." Well, as we pointed out, it was perfectly open to the Collector to have taken into consideration vitamin B.12 imported by different importers. But he came to the conclusion advisedly under instructions from Government that vitamin B.12 imported by other importers were not goods of the like kind and quality as the goods manufactured by Glaxo Ltd. and imported into India. Having come to that conclusion he based his assessment on the invoice of Voltas Ltd. and in this paragraph he turns round and says:

"Messrs. Voltas Ltd. are after all Agents-Distributors and we cannot find the real value by looking at their invoice but we must consider the invoices of other importers."

We agree with the Advocate General that s. 30(b) does not in any way import into its construction any consideration as to the character of the importer. What is emphasised is the cost of the goods, whoever the importer may be. It may be said that goods may be subsidized or they may be dumped on the Indian market. But for that purpose the Customs authorities have not been given the right to take that factor into consideration under s. 30(b). The remedy for that evil is action by Government under s. 22. As already pointed out, subject to international obligations it is open to Government, if they find that goods are being brought to Bombay at a cost less than its actual cost, to fix the tariff value of these goods, and the Advocate General has drawn our attention to some notifications issued by Government where in fact they have done so. Therefore, where at one stage the Collector of Customs wanted to find out what the goods cost in England and at what price they were exported to Europe, these factors are not relevant for the purpose of deciding that the goods are being dumped or subsidized in the Indian market. The Customs authorities may take that into consideration in order to determine whether the invoice price shown by the importer is the real cost at which goods of like kind and quality could be delivered, or, let us put it this way, in order to guide the Customs authorities in assessing the goods of the appellants and other goods in future. The invoice is prima facie evidence. It is not conclusive evidence. If the Customs authorities accept the invoice, there is an end of the matter. If they do not, then in order to test the genuineness of the invoice they may requisition to their aid any other facts, but only for that purpose. They may consider if they like the cost in Europe, cost of production, or any other factor. But all those considerations must ultimately be directed to the determination and ascertainment of the only fact which has got to be determined and ascertained under s. 30(b), which is the cost of the goods of like kind and quality which could be delivered in Bombay. In this connection, in para. 7 of his affidavit the Collector has also drawn attention to the relation subsisting between the English company and the appellants, and he has pointed out that the Indian company is a subsidiary company and that under an agreement between them a certain amount has to be remitted out of the profits to the English company. It is also pointed out that the Indian company has purchased the Glaxo trade marks at a certain price and these are being written off from time to time in the balance-sheet of the Indian company. These are all very important considerations for assessing the Indian company to income-tax, but they do not seem to have much relevance to the question which the Customs authorities had to decide as to what the goods cost in Bombay. If the suggestion is that the English company sent goods to the Indian company at a cheaper value or cheaper price because of the fact that these relations subsisted between the English company and the Indian company then, as already pointed out, unless this relationship has some bearing on the question of the determination of the real value it cannot be taken into consideration for the purpose of assessing the goods of the petitioners. Sir Nusserwanji says that there may be a special contract arrived at under special circumstances between the Glaxo Company in England and Voltas Ltd. and that the assessing authorities were entitled to take those circumstances into consideration. Now, both the agreement and the modification are before the Court and were before the assessing authorities and the assessment has been based simply on the ground that because Voltas Ltd. charged 12½ per cent. commission at one time, therefore the authorities will assume that they continued to charge that commission and because in law agents are entitled to charge commission. That is, we think, a correct summary of the attitude taken up by the assessing authorities as appears on the record.

In this connection it may be pointed out that Voltas Ltd. on April 10, 1957, wrote to the Assistant Collector of Customs stating:

"It has been necessary for the supplier to reduce the price to us and, in order to allow us to make our own selling prices to meet competition in India, it was agreed that the basis of our invoice prices would be a nett figure, decided upon, from time to time, after reviews of the competitive position vis-a-vis world prices. It was a result of a review of such factors which took place in Bombay with one of the Directors of Glaxo Laboratories, U.K. who was on a visit to India, that clause 7 of the Agreement dated 18th March, 1955 was amended from its original form to its present form."

The grievance of Sir Nusserwanji is that no further evidence and documents were produced by Voltas Ltd. in support of their contention that there was a modification of the original agreement. But the Advocate General rightly complains that whatever the attitude of Voltas Ltd. might have been, it was after all their goods which were being assessed to duty and at no time have they asked to request the English company to produce any documents if there were any in connection with this modification, and the Advocate General has made the offer that he is quite prepared to get an affidavit made by a responsible officer of the English company that after the modification no discount whatever was paid to Voltas Ltd. and the modification represents a genuine transaction. The learned Judge on this point allowed certain evidence. The appellants were compelled to call a Director of Voltas Ltd. because the agreement and modification were not admitted by the Collector, and Sir Nusserwanji wanted to take us through the cross-examination of that witness to show us that on the face of it it seemed curious that a modification of this sort should have been brought about without any correspondence, without any resolution being passed by the Board of Directors of Voltas Ltd., or by Glaxo Ltd. in England. We have not permitted him to do so because, in our opinion, on this writ application we must decide the question on the record and not by evidence led in Court. The question that we have to decide is: What was the position at the date of the petition? Were the assessing authorities justified in adding 12½ per cent. to the invoices of Voltas Ltd. for the reasons stated by them on record? In our opinion, it is patent that the reasons given by the authorities are not reasons which can be supported in law.

A question was also argued with regard to the validity of the short levy notices to which references has been made. The learned Judge has taken the view that those notices are valid and the Advocate General wanted to satisfy us that they did not fall within the purview of s. 39. We must not be considered to have upheld the view of the learned Judge because, in our opinion, it is unnecessary to decide the question in view of the order we are proposing to pass.

Sir Nusserwanji on behalf of the Customs authorities agrees that the Customs authorities will dispose of the refund applications in respect of the first six consignments in the light of this judgment. In other words, the Customs authorities will consider whether they were justified in assessing the appellants on the invoice of Voltas Ltd. plus 12½ per cent. If they come to the conclusion in the light of our directions and observations that they were so justified, then the refund applications will be dismissed. If, on the other hand, they come to the conclusion that the assessment must be on the basis of the invoice, then the appellants would be entitled to succeed with regard to the whole claim made by them. If, on the other hand, they come to the conclusion that the assessment should be reduced partially, then the appellants would succeed partially with regard to the refund applications. We wish to make it clear that this has nothing to do with the refund already paid by the Customs authorities in respect of the first six consignments under the circumstances to which we have already adverted earlier in the judgment.

With regard to the 7th, 8th and 9th consignments, a demand has been made with regard to the short levy notices issued in respect of these three consignments. Sir Nusserwanji agrees on behalf of the Customs authorities that with regard to these notices also the Customs authorities will decide in the light of our judgment what is the proper assessment to be made on the appellants. If they come to the conclusion that the assessment should be maintained, then the short levy notices will stand. If, on the other hand, they come to the conclusion that the 12½ per cent. addition is not justified, they will withdraw the short levy notices. If, on the other hand, they come to the conclusion that the amount of the assessment should be reduced, the short levy notices will be suitably amended.

With regard to the 10th consignment, as we have not gone beyond the stage of assessment made by the Collector, Sir Nusserwanji agrees on behalf of the Customs authorities that that assessment order will be set aside and the Customs authorities will reconsider the matter in the light of our judgment and make the assessment order in accordance with the directions given by us in this judgment.

Sir Nusserwanji agrees that for the purpose of appeal under s. 188 and revision under s. 191, the orders made by the Customs authorities on these 10 consignments in the light of this judgment will be considered to be original orders of assessment and the petitioners will have a right of appeal within the period of limitation fixed under the relevant sections on the basis that the order of assessment was made when the decisions were given by the Customs authorities on these consignments.

With regard to the 10th consignment, we have already directed that the Collector will review in the light of this judgment the order of assessment made by him on April 15, 1957. If on this review it is found that the appellants are entitled to any refund, he will make the order of refund, because under an interlocutory order passed by this Court the goods covered by the 10th consignment were passed on to the appellants paying the full amount of assessment under protest and without prejudice to their rights.

The result is that the decision of the learned Judge dismissing the petition with costs will be set aside and the directions mentioned in the judgment will be given on this petition to the respondents.

On the question of costs, the Advocate General submits that in view of the fact that the Collector of Customs has agreed through his counsel to give effect to the directions contained in this judgment and the appellants have also agreed to abide by the decision of the Collector subject to the right of appeal and revision or any other remedy in law, the proper order would be that there should be no order as to costs throughout. We accept that submission and direct that there will be no order as to costs throughout.

Liberty to the appellants' attorneys to withdraw the sum of Rs. 500 deposited in Court.

KUMAR SHRI BHOJRAJJI KARANSINHEJI v. SAURASHTRA STATE.*

Saurashtra Adjudication of (Special Courts) Suits Ordinance, 1949 (No. LXXII of 1949), Sec. 4—Saurashtra Suits against Government (Abatement and Adjudication) Act (IV of 1951), Sec. 3(1)—Constitution of India, Art. 363—Suits contemplated by s. 4(1)(i) of Ordinance, nature of—Contractual obligation undertaken by Ruler of State previous to its merger with State of Saurashtra—Whether suit to enforce such contract falls within s. 4(1) of Ordinance—Abatement of such suit by virtue of s. 3(1) of Act IV of 1951—Suit whether barred under art. 363 of Constitution—Liability of merging State taken over by successor State under covenant—Whether covenant can be looked upon as waiver by succeeding State of its right to ignore private rights of citizens of merging State.

Section 4(1) of the Saurashtra Adjudication of (Special Courts) Suits Ordinance, 1949, contemplates suits which sound in tort and not suits in contract.

Where the Ruler of a State, previous to its integration with the State of Saurashtra, had entered into a contract with the plaintiff and the plaintiff filed a suit against the State of Saurashtra to enforce the contractual obligation undertaken by the Ruler, *Decided, August 27, 1958. First Appeal Wadalla, Civil Judge, Senior Division, Surendranagar, in Civil Case No. 37 of 1950. No. 12 of 1958, from the decision of M. B.

on the question whether the suit fell within the ambit of s. 4(1) of the Saurashtra Adjudication of (Special Courts) Suits Ordinance, 1949:—

Held, that the expression "anything done or omitted" in s. 4(1)(i) of the Ordinance means anything done or omitted unilaterally, that what was done by the Ruler was to enter into a contract with the plaintiff which was a bilateral act and the enforcement was not of any right or remedy in respect of anything done or omitted to be done, but the suit was for the enforcement of the contract entered into between the plaintiff and the Ruler, and hence the suit did not fall within s. 4. of the Ordinance, and that, therefore, the suit did not abate by reason of the provisions of s. 3(1) of the Saurashtra Suits against Government (Abatement and Adjudication) Act, 1951.

When a citizen seeks to enforce his contractual right or his rights under the ordinary law of the land, merely because he is asserting those rights against the State, the State cannot rely on the provisions of art. 363 of the Constitution of India for contending that because the liability was taken over by the State from the merging State under a covenant, the right of the citizen cannot be adjudicated in a civil Court as provided by art. 363 of the Constitution. The covenant itself may be looked upon as a waiver by the Covenanting State of its right to ignore private rights of the citizen of the State of which it is the successor.

Bholanath J. Thaker v. State of Saurashtra,¹ followed.

West Rand Central Gold Mining Company v. Rex,² referred to.

Onn Bhojrajji (plaintiff), who was the second son of the ex-Ruler of the State of Sayla, was a cadet of the Sayla State and as such, according to the law and custom governing the rights of the cadets of the State, he was entitled to Giras by way of maintenance and residential quarters suitable to his status or sufficient amount of cash to enable him to build such quarters. On July 21, 1945, by an order the Thakore Saheb of Sayla, the father of the plaintiff, in his capacity as the Ruler of the State, directed that a sum of Rs. 80,000 should be paid to the plaintiff for building a Darbargadh in the plaintiff's Giras village Dhedhuki. The order provided that the amount of Rs. 80,000 should be paid to the plaintiff within five years. Pursuant to this order the plaintiff was paid Rs. 6,000 in the year 1946 and Rs. 6,000 in the year 1947. The sum of Rs. 18,000 remained unpaid and in the meantime the Sayla State integrated with the United States of Saurashtra. The plaintiff applied to the Chief Secretary of the United States of Saurashtra for payment of Rs. 18,000, but he was informed that the amount would not be paid to him and liability to pay it was denied. On February 2, 1950, the plaintiff filed the present suit against the United States of Saurashtra in the Court of the Civil Judge at Surendranagar claiming the balance of Rs. 18,000. The trial Court dismissed the suit on the ground that the suit had abated under the Saurashtra Suits against Government (Abatement and Adjudication) Act, 1951. The plaintiff appealed to the High Court of Saurashtra. The appeal came up before M. C. Shah and J. A. Baxi JJ. who referred it to a full bench. Baxi J. delivered the following referring judgment on July 1, 1954:—

Baxi J. This appeal arises out of a decree of the Civil Judge, Senior Division, Surendranagar, dismissing the suit filed by the appellant, who is the son of the Ruler of the Sayla State, against the respondent State. In this suit he claimed Rs. 18,000 on the strength of an order dated July 21, 1945, passed by the Thakore Saheb of Sayla. By this order the Thakore Saheb directed the payment to the appellant of Rs. 80,000 for constructing a Darbargadh in the village Dhedhuki in yearly instalments and further directed that the amount should be paid to him in full within five years. The appellant has been paid Rs. 12,000 in two instalments by the Sayla State. Before any further payment could be made that State was integrated with the Saurashtra State. The appellant, thereupon, claimed from the Saurashtra State the payment of the balance of Rs. 18,000, but his claim was rejected by it. The appellant, therefore, filed the suit against the State. The suit was resisted by the State on various grounds, and objection against the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain the suit was also taken in the written statement. During the pendency of the suit, Act IV of 1951, known as "The Saurashtra Suits against Government (Abatement and Adjudication) Act, 1951," was passed and it was contended on behalf of the State that the suit had abated under the provisions of s. 3(1) of that Act. The learned Civil Judge held that the Court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit and found in favour of the appellant on all other points raised on behalf of the State. But he held that the suit had abated under Act IV of 1951 mentioned above and dismissed the suit. The appellant has preferred this appeal against the learned Civil Judge's decree.

The appellant had contended that the liability of the former Sayla State to pay the balance of Rs. 18,000 under its order was transferred to the Saurashtra State under art. 6(1)(c) of the Covenant. The contention on behalf of the State was that this question was not justiciable by virtue of art. 363 of the Constitution and consequently the Court had no jurisdiction to try the suit. The learned Civil Judge relying upon a Full Bench decision of this Court in *State v. Bholanath*¹ rejected this contention and held that the article had no application to the present suit and he had jurisdiction to try the same. In Bholanath's case the claim against the State was for compensation for premature retirement of a servant from civil service. Bholanath was a member of the permanent civil service of the former Wadhwan State. After signing the Covenant, the Ruler of that State passed a law which fixed the superannuation age for the State's civil servants at 60. After the Ruler made over the administration of the Wadhwan State to the Saurashtra State in pursuance of the terms of the Covenant, Bholanath was retired from service by the Saurashtra State on the ground that he had passed the age of superannuation which was taken at 55. Bholanath filed the above suit relying on cl. 16 of the Covenant, under which the Saurashtra State had undertaken to absorb. He also relied on the law passed by the Wadhwan State. The suit was contested on behalf of the States inter alia on two grounds; firstly that after the Ruler of the Wadhwan State had entered into the Covenant, it was not competent for him to enact any law, which could bind the Saurashtra State, and secondly that, as the dispute arose out of the Covenant, the jurisdiction of the Court was barred by art. 363 of the Constitution. The Full Bench held that the Ruler had lost legislative competence after he signed the Covenant and could not enact the law, under which Bholanath claimed to be retained in service till 60. As regards the application of art. 363, it held that the article applied to disputes arising out of the Covenant between the Covenanting Rulers on the one hand and the State or the Union Government on the other, but not to suits where one of the parties to the dispute was a private party. The case went in appeal to the Supreme Court in Bholanath v. State of Saurashtra (Civil Appeal No. 170 of 1954). The Supreme Court reversed the Full Bench decision as it did not accept the view that the Ruler had lost legislative competence after signing the Covenant and before making over the administration in pursuance thereof. The law under which Bholanath claimed was, in their Lordships' view, good law, and continued to be good law under the terms of the Covenant after the merger and Bholanath's rights under that law could be enforced by means of a suit. In that view of the matter, their Lordships held that art. 363 could not be invoked by the State. There was, therefore, no authoritative pronouncement of the Supreme Court on this question and the view expressed by the Full Bench is at the present moment the last word on the point.

The learned Advocate General, however, contended that the view of the Full Bench about the scope and the applicability of this article was not correct. He argued that if the parties to the Covenant could not agitate in a Court of law disputes arising out of the Covenant, it was illogical to hold that persons, who were not parties thereto, could do so, even though they might be regarded in some way as beneficiaries under the Covenant. According to him, the language of art. 363 was very clear and barred the adjudication of the dispute by a Court irrespective of the parties to it.

The learned Advocate General's contention is not without force. But as the question has been discussed by the Full Bench at some length, we would have hesitated to make another reference to the Full Bench on the same point. However, we are referring this appeal to the Full Bench on other points and the correctness of its view in Bholanath's appeal about the scope of art. 363 will no doubt be reconsidered by it.

Before proceeding to the other points raised in this appeal, it will be convenient to notice the provisions of Ordinance 72 of 1949 and Act IV of 1951. The Saurashtra Adjudication of (Special Courts) Suits Ordinance, 1949, (Ordinance No. 72 of 1949) was enacted to provide for the adjudication of suits triable by special Courts in the Western India and Gujarat States region and the Covenanted States, Talukdars and Estates. Clause (i) of s. 3 of the Ordinance provides that subject to the provisions of s. 4, all suits or proceedings of any description, whether civil or political, which were, before the date of the coming into force of the Ordinance, triable by Special Courts constituted or established by or under the authority of the Government of India or the Crown Representative or the Rulers of the Covenanted States or the Talukdars etc. shall be tried and disposed of by civil Courts. Clause (ii) provides for transfer by the Government of the above suits and proceedings to civil Courts. Section 4 of the Ordinance is a saving clause and exempts from the application of s. 3 suits against the Government of the nature described in cls. (i) and (ii) of that section. Clause (i) refers to suits for the enforcement of any right or remedy in respect of anything done by or under the authority of any Ruler of a Covenanted State or any Talukdar etc. before April 15, 1948, while cl. (ii) refers to suits in respect of any dispute between the Government and any landholder arising out of a provision of any treaty, engagement or other instrument, which was executed or entered into by a Ruler of the Covenanted State, Talukdar etc. before the integration of his State, Estate or Taluka into the State of Saurashtra. Act IV of 1951 was next passed and cl. (i) of s. 3 of the Act provides for the abatement of the suits described in cl. (i) of s. 4 of the Ordinance and cl. (2) provides that the suits of the nature described in cl. (ii) of s. 4 of the Ordinance shall be tried by a Special Officer.

The net result of these two pieces of legislation is that the civil Court's jurisdiction was extended to all suits and special proceedings, which were formerly triable by Special Courts and over which the jurisdiction of the civil Courts was barred. But suits against the Government of the nature described in cls. (i) and (ii) of s. 4 of the Ordinance were exempted from the jurisdiction of the civil Courts. No alternative forum was, however, provided by the Ordinance for the trial of the suits so exempted from the civil Court's jurisdiction, though the former Special Courts had ceased to function. Act No. IV of 1951 was, therefore, passed, which put an end to suits of the nature described in cl. (i) of s. 4 of the Ordinance by providing for their outright abatement and set up a special forum in respect of other class of suits by providing that they should be tried by a Special Officer.

Reverting to the discussion of the present appeal, the learned Civil Judge relying upon a decision of this Court in *State of Saurashtra v. Haji Ismail*¹ held that the Ordinance applied to suits which were instituted before the date of the Ordinance and were pending on that date, and as the present suit was filed after the Ordinance it did not apply to it and the jurisdiction was not barred by the provisions of s. 4(i) of the Ordinance.

Mr. M. O. Shah supported this finding. The learned Advocate General argued that s. 4 applied to all suits triable by Special Courts whether they were pending on the date of Ordinance or instituted subsequently. He pointed out that cl. (i) of s. 3 of the Ordinance gave jurisdiction to civil Courts in respect of all suits triable by Special Courts irrespective of whether they were pending on the date of the Ordinance or not and cl. (1) of s. 3 would apply to a suit instituted after the date of the Ordinance and the civil Court would have jurisdiction to try them. Provisions for pending suits were made by cl. (ii) of s. 3. But s. 4 exempted all suits against Government mentioned in s. 3 and not merely suits mentioned in cl. (ii) of s. 3 and, therefore, the view of the Bench in Civil Appeal No. 16 of 1952 was erroneous and should be reconsidered. We are inclined to the view that s. 4 of the Ordinance refers to suits of the nature described both in cls. (i) and (ii) of s. 3 of the Act and applies to suits pending on the date of the Ordinance as well as to suits filed subsequently, and the question requires to be considered by the Full Bench.

Mr. M. O. Shah also argued that cl. (i) of s. 4 of the Ordinance was not applicable to this suit and consequently whether the suit was pending or not on the date of the Ordinance, the civil Court's jurisdiction was not barred. He submitted that cl. (i) of s. 4 of the Ordinance referred to suits in respect of anything done by or under the authority of a Ruler before April 15, 1948, i.e., suits arising out of indefensible acts of malfeasance or nonfeasance of the Rulers and referred to para. 3 of the Statement of the Objects and Reasons appended to the Bill No. XIII/1950 published at p. 463 of the Saurashtra Government Gazette, Part I-A, 1950, which Bill was subsequently enacted into Act IV of 1951. As the present suit was for enforcement of liability in respect of a legitimate grant by the Ruler of the former Sayla State, Mr. Shah argued, it was not covered by cl. (1) of s. 4 of the Ordinance and consequently the Court's jurisdiction was not barred. The learned Advocate General, while not conceding the point, admitted that the provisions of cl. (i) of s. 4 of the Ordinance were susceptible of the construction, which Mr. Shah was placing upon it, and if the High Court accepted that construction, the jurisdiction of civil Courts would not be barred by the provisions of cl. (i) of s. 4 of the Ordinance. We are inclined in favour of the construction that Mr. Shah places on the scope of cl. (i) of s. 4 of the Ordinance. That clause is intended to bar the jurisdiction of civil Courts over suits in respect of autocratic acts of malfeasance or non-feasance of the Ruler, leaving such suits to be dealt with by subsequent legislation, but the Legislature could not have intended to exempt from the jurisdiction of civil Courts, suits in respect of legitimate liability incurred by a Covenanting State before integration. Such a construction would be repellent to the fundamental principle of devolution of liability under art. 6 of the Covenant. Therefore, cl. (i) of s. 4 of the Ordinance could not apply to suits against Governments which though triable by Special Courts, did not arise out of acts of malfeasance or nonfeasance by the Rulers and consequently the Court's jurisdiction cannot be barred. The present suit does not arise out of any such act of malfeasance or nonfeasance by the Ruler and consequently s. 4 of the Ordinance does not apply to it and the jurisdiction of the Court is not barred.

The learned Civil Judge held that the suit had abated by virtue of cl. (i) of s. 3 of Act IV of 1951. If, however, the present suit is held to be outside the scope of s. 4 of the Ordinance, Act IV of 1951 cannot apply to it and the suit cannot abate. The decision on this question will, therefore, depend upon whether the present suit is governed by cl. (i) of s. 4 of the Ordinance and will have to be determined by the Full Bench.

In the result, we direct that the appeal be referred to the Full Bench.

The appeal was heard by a Full Bench composed of Chagla C.J. and S. T. Desai and K. T. Desai JJ.

CHAGLA C.J. When Mr. Justice M. C. Shah and Mr. Justice Baxi of the Saurashtra High Court heard First Appeal No. 12 of 1952, certain important questions of law arose before them and they thought it necessary to refer those questions to a Full Bench. This matter has now come before us.

In order to understand the question that we have to decide, a few facts must be stated. The plaintiff is the second son of the ex-Ruler of Sayla and on July 21, 1945, the Thakore Saheb of Sayla, the then Ruler, agreed to give to the plaintiff a sum of Rs. 30,000 in lieu of residence and this came to be given under the following circumstances. The Thakore Saheb was the karta of an impartible estate and both under the custom and the rule of Hindu law the impartible estate would go to his eldest son, but the younger sons have a right of maintenance and residence. Certain provision was made with regard to the maintenance of the plaintiff, but with regard to the residence, that claim was commuted for the amount of Rs. 30,000. Pursuant to this arrangement two sums of Rs. 6,000 each were paid in 1946 and 1947. It may be stated that the order of the Thakore Saheb provided that the sum of Rs. 30,000 was to be paid by five instalments. On March 15, 1948, the United States of Kathiawar came into existence, the State of Sayla having merged in these United States on March 7, 1948. The United States of Kathiawar ultimately gave place to the State of Saurashtra and under the States Reorganization Act of 1956 the State of Saurashtra became a part of the Bombay State, and the plaintiff filed the suit against the State of Saurashtra on February 2, 1950, claiming the balance of Rs. 18,000. The trial Court, which gave its judgment on November 20, 1951, held in favour of the plaintiff on all points, but came to the conclusion, by reason of certain provisions of law to which we will presently make reference, that the suit had abated and dismissed the suit. An appeal was carried to the High Court of Saurashtra and a Division Bench of that High Court, as just pointed out, made this reference to the Full Bench on July 1, 1954.

The first question is whether the suit filed by the plaintiff has abated. In order to understand this contention and also the second contention which arises out of certain provisions of the Constitution, let us try and clearly understand what the nature of the suit was which the plaintiff had filed. He was enforcing against a State a contractual obligation undertaken by the Ruler of Sayla. It was an agreement arrived at between the Thakore Saheb of Sayla and the plaintiff that in lieu of the plaintiff's right to residence, which it has been found by the trial Court existed under both Hindu law and custom prevalent in the State, he should be given Rs. 30,000 by the Ruler of Sayla. Therefore, the Thakore Saheb of Sayla had undertaken a contractual obligation in consideration of the plaintiff giving up his right of residence to pay this sum of Rs. 30,000. Whatever form the plaint might have taken, in substance this was the suit that the plaintiff filed. He contended that he had been paid Rs. 12,000 and the balance of Rs. 18,000 remained to be paid under this contract.

The first piece of legislation we have got to look at is Saurashtra Ordinance No. 72 of 1949 and s. 3 of that Ordinance provides:

"(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in any law or instrument for the time being in force, but subject to the provisions of section 4, all suits or proceedings of any description, whether civil or political, which were, before the date of the coming into force of this Ordinance triable by Special Courts constituted or established by, or under the authority of, the Government of India, as then constituted, or the Crown Representative, or the Rulers of the Covenanted States, or the Talukdars or Estate-holders of Agreeing Talukas or Estates shall be tried and disposed of by civil Courts."

This Ordinance, as the marginal note to s. 3 and the preamble makes it clear, relates to certain suits which were triable by Special Courts and these Special Courts are Courts set up in the Western India and Gujarat States region. There is no clear evidence on the record which goes to show that the suit of the plaintiff, with which we are dealing, was a suit which would have been cognizable by a Special Court if the merger of States had not taken place. But for the purpose of this argument we will assume that the Ordinance applies and that the suit which the plaintiff filed, if the State of Sayla had not joined the Saurashtra State, would have been tried by the Special Court mentioned in the Ordinance. Therefore, what s. 3(1) provides is that all these suits shall be tried and disposed of by civil Courts. In other words, the Special Courts are done away with and the jurisdiction of civil Courts is restored. But there is an exception to this provision and that exception is contained in s. 4, and we are concerned with cl. (1):

"Nothing contained in section 3 shall apply to any suit against the Government in respect of—

(i) the enforcement of any right or remedy in respect of anything done or omitted to be done by or under the authority of any Ruler of any Covenanting State or any Talukdar or Estate-holder of any Agreeing Taluka or Estate before April 15, 1948."

This Ordinance was followed by Act IV of 1951 and sub-s. (1) of s. 3 provides:

"(1) All suits of the nature described in clause (i) of section 4 of the Saurashtra Adjudication of (Special Courts) Suits Ordinance, 1949 (No. LXXII of 1949) (hereinafter referred to as the said Ordinance), pending in any Court or before any authority on the date of the coming into force of this Act shall abate."

The narrow question that arises for our decision on this head of argument is whether this particular suit falls within the ambit of s. 4(1) of the Ordinance. If it does, then the suit abates by reason of the provision in Act IV of 1951 and the trial Court was right in holding that the suit had abated. Now, what is the nature of the suits contemplated by s. 4(1)? It is a suit against the Government in respect of the enforcement of any right or remedy in respect of anything done or omitted to be done by or under the authority of any Ruler of any Covenanting State. It is clear on a plain construction of this provision that the suits contemplated by this sub-section are suits where the plaintiff makes a grievance of anything done or omitted to be done by or under the authority of any Ruler and in respect of that grievance he seeks to enforce some right or remedy. Therefore, the complaint must be that the Ruler has done something which is wrong or erroneous or has omitted to do which he was bound to do. Now, this suit, far from making any such complaint or ventilating any such grievance, stands by the decision taken by the Ruler and wishes that decision to be enforced. The complaint of the plaintiff is not that the Ruler has done anything wrong or has omitted to do anything which he should have done. On the contrary, his complaint is that the successor State has failed to honour and observe the terms of the contract entered into by the Ruler and the grievance is against the successor State and not against the Ruler of the Covenanting State.

The Government Pleader says that the plaintiff is seeking a right or remedy in respect of an order passed by the Ruler and we must hold that a suit of that nature would fall within the expression "any right or remedy in respect of anything done by the Ruler," and the Government Pleader urges that the Ruler has done something, which is passing the order, that the right of the plaintiff flows from that order, and therefore he is enforcing that right. In our opinion, that suggested construction is entirely untenable. The expression "anything done or omitted" clearly means anything done or omitted unilaterally. There is no act or omission on the part of the Ruler which is unilateral in respect of which any right or remedy is sought. What is done by the Ruler is to enter into a contract with the plaintiff. So the act is a bilateral one which has resulted in a contract, and the enforcement is not of any right or remedy in respect of anything done or omitted to be done, but the suit is for the enforcement of a contract entered into between the plaintiff and the Ruler. Therefore, it is clear that really what was contemplated by s. 4(1) were suits which sound in tort and not suits in contract, and the present suit, as already pointed out, is a suit in contract and not a suit which sounds in tort. Therefore, as far as the first question is concerned, we are of the opinion that the suit does not abate by reason of the provisions of Ordinance 72 of 1949 and Act IV of 1951.

The next question is the proper interpretation of art. 363 of the Constitution. That article, as the marginal note correctly indicates, constitutes a bar against civil Courts with regard to disputes arising out of treaties, agreements and covenants entered into before the commencement of the Constitution by the Ruler of an Indian State with the Government of the Dominion of India or any of its predecessor Governments, and what is urged on behalf of the State is that what the plaintiff is seeking to enforce is a liability undertaken by the State under the Covenant, and in order that the plaintiff should succeed not only the Covenant will have to be construed but the question that the Court will have to consider is a question with regard to a dispute arising out of this Covenant.

* Now, certain legislative history is necessary to be considered in order to appreciate this point. The first Constitutional document is the Covenant entered into between the various merging States to constitute the United States of Kathiawar and that Covenant was signed on April 15, 1948, and art. VI(1)(c) of that Covenant provides:

"all the assets and liabilities of the Covenanting State shall be the assets and liabilities of the United States of Kathiawar."

We have then Ordinance I of 1948 which Ordinance gave the name of Saurashtra to the United States of Kathiawar which set out art. VI of the Covenant and provided by cl. 3(1):

"When in pursuance of paragraph 1 of Article VI of the Covenant, the administration of any Covenanting State has been taken over by the Raj Pramukh, the fact shall be notified in the Saurashtra Government Gazette and thereupon the provisions of clauses (a), (b) and (c) of paragraph 1 of Article VI shall immediately come into force."

This Ordinance was published in the Gazette on March 1, 1948, and the Sayla State was taken over on March 7, 1948. Therefore, on that date, as far as the Sayla State is concerned, cl. (c) of art. VI(1) with which we are concerned came into force, viz., that all the assets and liabilities of the Covenanting State, which in this case is Sayla, became the assets and liabilities of the State of Saurashtra. A proclamation was also issued on April 1, 1948, which was published in the Saurashtra Government Gazette on April 5, 1948, and this proclamation also mentions that all the assets and liabilities of the said States and Talukas have become the assets and liabilities of the State of Saurashtra. On January 26, 1950, India became a Republic and the Constitution came into force and art. 295(2) provided:

"Subject as aforesaid, the Government of each State specified in Part B of the First Schedule shall, as from the commencement of this Constitution, be the successor of the Government of the corresponding Indian State as regards all property and assets and all rights, liabilities and obligations, whether arising out of any contract or otherwise, other than those referred to in clause (1)."

And Saurashtra was shown as one of the States in Part B of the First Schedule. Therefore, Saurashtra became the successor State to the corresponding Indian State both with regard to assets and liabilities, and the corresponding Indian State to Saurashtra mentioned in Part B was the State of Saurashtra which was brought into existence in 1948 by the Proclamation and Ordinance I of 1948. Then we have the reorganization of the States as recently as 1956 and s. 91 of the States Reorganization Act provided:

"The benefit or burden of any assets or liabilities of an existing State not dealt with in the foregoing provisions of this Part shall—

(a) if there be only one successor State, pass to that State."

So we have a clear chain carrying forward the assets and liabilities of the original State in Kathiawar to the present reconstituted State of Bombay. We start with the liability of the State of Sayla incurred under this document which conferred upon the plaintiff certain contractual rights. That liability was taken over by the covenant by the United State of Kathiawar, it was re-emphasised by the Ordinance referred to, further emphasised by the Proclamation, and provision was made with regard to it by the Constitution, and ultimately we have the States Reorganization Act which saves the rights and liabilities of the original existing State.

In view of this history, can it be said that the question that has got to be considered in this suit is a question which relates to any dispute arising out of any provision of a treaty, agreement, covenant, engagement or other similar instrument which was entered into or executed before the commencement of this Constitution by any Ruler of an Indian State and to which the Government of the Dominion of India or any of its predecessor Governments was a party? We will consider this question from two aspects. The first aspect is this. If the matter had stood merely at the covenant entered into between the different States to set up the United State of Kathiawar, what is urged by the Government Pleader is that the liability undertaken by the new State was a liability under the covenant, the plaintiff was not a party to that covenant, and it is well-settled that the rights arising out of the covenant must be adjudicated as between the high contracting parties to the Covenant, and a stranger to the Covenant has no right to claim any benefit conferred under the Covenant. So what is urged is that although the United State of Kathiawar may have undertaken the liabilities of the Sayla State, inasmuch as the plaintiff was not a party to the Covenant, he cannot claim the benefit of that Covenant. Now, in the first place, it is not quite true to say that the plaintiff is seeking to enforce a right which arises under the Covenant. His right, in the first instance, arises under the Hindu law or Hindu custom, and secondly it arises out of the contract which commutes his right of residence under Hindu law for a fixed sum of Rs. 30,000. Therefore, what he is seeking to enforce is his rights under private law, and it is a difficult proposition to accept that when a citizen seeks to enforce his contractual right or his rights under the ordinary law of the land, merely because he is asserting those rights against the State, the State can rely on the provisions of art. 363 for contending that because the liability was taken over under the original covenant the right of the plaintiff cannot be adjudicated in a civil Court as provided by art. 363.

But the matter is no longer now a matter of controversy because the Supreme Court has taken the view in Bholanath J. Thaker v. State of Saurashtra,¹ that the Covenant itself may be looked upon as a waiver by the Covenanting State of its rights to ignore private rights of the citizen of the State of which it is the successor. It is true that under international law when there is a cession or a succession or a conquest, the State which benefits by the cession or succession or conquest is not bound to recognize the rights of the citizens of the State which it has absorbed. The recognition must be either by law or by proclamation. But as the Court of Appeal pointed out in West Rand Central Gold Mining Company v. Rex,² that the law as laid down by the Privy Council was that the new sovereign State may choose to waive its rights and recognise titles and rights as they existed at the date of cession, and it is in the light of this observation of the Privy Council that Mr. Justice Bhagwati in the case just referred to has stated (p. 682):

"There was in fact no such legislation and therefore his rights remained and the Municipal Courts would be entitled to examine the contract and apply the Dhara No. 29 of St. 2004 and enforce whatever rights the appellant had under that Dhara and his contract of service.... The Covenant could be looked at to see whether the new sovereign had waived his rights to ignore rights given under the laws of the former sovereign. The terms of the Covenant showed that the existing laws were to continue and whatever the rights of the appellant were under the existing laws were available for enforcement to the appellant and there was no bar to the Municipal Courts entertaining a suit to enforce such rights.

In this view of the matter Art. 363 of the Constitution could not be invoked by the respondent. There was no dispute arising out of the Covenant and what the appellant was doing was merely to enforce his rights under the existing laws which continued in force until they were repealed by appropriate legislation. This ground therefore could not avail the respondent."

As a matter of fact, in our case the position is much stronger. The observations of Mr. Justice Bhagwati, with respect, would apply even if the matter rested at the covenant and nothing more had happened. But here we have an Ordinance passed by the new State which is the law of that State and under that law the liabilities of the merged State are taken over. Therefore, what the plaintiff is seeking to enforce is not any right under the covenant. He is seeking to enforce a right conferred upon him by the law of the Saurashtra State constituted by the Ordinance just referred to. Therefore, it is difficult to understand how in any view of the case art. 363 comes into question. The Saurashtra State went far beyond the stage of the covenant. It gave its imprimatur to the covenant and recognised the rights of the subjects of the merged States and assumed the liabilities in respect of those States by passing an Ordinance which incorporated in it relevant provisions of the covenant.

The Government Pleader wanted to argue that even assuming the suit was maintainable and had not abated and even assuming that the Court had jurisdiction and the jurisdiction had not been ousted by art. 363, even so this was not a liability which the State had taken over under the provisions of the Covenant and the Ordinance. We have prevented the Government Pleader from going into that matter because it is clear on the record that that contention was never raised either in the trial Court or in the Court of appeal of the Saurashtra High Court. All that the State contended was that the suit was not maintainable by reason of the fact that it had abated and also by reason of the fact that the jurisdiction of the civil Court had been ousted by art. 363 of the Constitution. If the State failed in these two contentions it was not its further contention that notwithstanding the fact that the suit was maintainable it was not liable to discharge this liability on any construction of the Ordinance or on any principle of international law.

It is unnecessary to consider another question that was referred to us by the Division Bench of the Saurashtra High Court as to whether s. 4 of the Ordinance applies to suits pending on the date of the Ordinance as well as to suits filed subsequently. As we have held that the suit does not fall at all within s. 4, this question does not arise.

We must send this matter back to the Division Bench to dispose of the appeal on merits in the light of this judgment. But we would like to say this, and we have said this to the Government Pleader, that the plaintiff has been seeking to establish his right since 1950, we are now in 1958, and as far as one can gather from the judgment of the trial Court and even of the High Court, there is very little on merits to justify the State in resisting the claim of the plaintiffs. This is not one of those cases where an order in favour of a son of a Prince was passed on the eve of the merger. The order was passed as far back as 1945, it is based on a right under Hindu law which was honoured by the State itself by paying two instalments of Rs. 6,000 each, and we do feel that this is a case where the State will sympathetically consider the claim of the plaintiff and not insist upon having this appeal argued on merits before the Division Bench.

Order accordingly.

CRIMINAL REVISION.

Before Mr. Justice Datar and Mr. Justice Tarkunde.

DEOMAN SHAMJI PATIL v. THE STATE.*

Bombay Prohibition Act (XXV of 1949)—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Secs. 157, 4(1)—Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), Secs. 353, 352, 97, 99, 52—Whether police officers empowered by law to forcibly take person suspected or accused of offence under Prohibition Act for medical examination—Person forcibly taken for such examination, whether can exercise right of private defence—Whether such person in so exercising his right can be convicted under s. 353 or 352 of I.P. Code—Section 157 of Cr. P. Code whether grants on investigating officers general over-riding power to act in curtailment of rights and liberties of subject for purposes of investigation—Applicability of exception in first para. of s. 99, I.P. Code—Police officers acting outside scope of their powers whether can be said to have acted in "good faith."

In the case of a person suspected or accused of an offence under the Bombay Prohibition Act, 1949, the police officers are not empowered by law to take that person, against his will, to a doctor for medical examination. If force is sought to be used by the police officers in taking such a person to a doctor, he can lawfully exercise the right of private defence against them under s. 97 of the Indian Penal Code, and if he does so exercise the right, he cannot be convicted either under s. 353 or 352 of the Indian Penal Code.

Section 157 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, lays down some of the duties, and none of the rights, of an officer in charge of a police station. That section has no relevance whatever to the consideration of the extent to which a police officer can act in curtailment of the rights of the subject as regards his person or his property.

Bhondar v. Emperor,¹ agreed with.

The exception contained in the first paragraph of s. 99 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, applies where a public servant acts irregularly in the exercise of his powers, and not where he acts outside the scope of his powers.

State v. Yamanappa Limbaji,² explained.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

S. G. Patwardhan, for the petitioner.

Y. V. Chandrachud, Government Pleader, for the State.

TARKUNDE J. Two interesting questions of law arise in this case. One is whether police officers are empowered by law, in the case of a person suspected or accused of an offence under the Bombay Prohibition Act, to take that person, against his will, to a doctor for medical examination. The second question arises if the first is answered in the negative, and that question is whether such a person can lawfully exercise the right of private defence against the force sought to be used in taking him to a doctor.

This being a criminal revision application, the facts are no longer in dispute. The petitioner, who will be referred to hereafter as the accused, is a resident of Satana in the Nasik district. On the date of the offence, information was received at the police station at Satana that the accused was behaving in a disorderly manner in a public street under the influence of drink. Thereupon some police constables went to the spot and brought the accused to the police station. They tried to make a panchanama about the physical condition of the accused, but could not get any panchas. Then Head Constable Wagh, who appears to have been in charge of the police station, asked five or six constables to take the accused to the local dispensary for his examination by the medical officer. On the way, the accused refused to go any further, and resisted the attempts of the constables to drag him to the dispensary. While so resisting, he gave a blow to constable Thakaji and another to constable Madhav, and made good his escape. He ran inside a house and chained the door from within. Some days later, he surrendered to the police. Two cases were then launched against him. One was for an offence under s. 85 of the Bombay Prohibition Act. He was acquitted in that case. The other was for an offence under s. 353, Indian Penal Code, of assault and use of criminal force to deter public servants from discharging their duty. He was convicted of the offence and the conviction was upheld in appeal. He has come in revision from the order of conviction and sentence.

*Decided, September 11, 1958. Criminal Revision Application No. 685 of 1958, from the orders of conviction and sentence passed by L.M. Paranjape, Sessions Judge, Nasik, in Criminal Appeal No. 60 of 1958, reducing the

On behalf of the accused, Mr. S. G. Patwardhan has advanced a plea which was not taken in the Courts below, but which is consistent with the facts proved by the prosecution. Mr. Patwardhan says that the action of the constables in dragging or attempting to drag the accused towards the dispensary was itself illegal, that the constables were obviously not doing their "duty" while acting illegally, and that the conduct of the accused cannot, therefore, constitute an offence as defined in s. 353, Indian Penal Code. Two reasons are urged by Mr. Patwardhan in support of the plea that the action of the constables was illegal. He says, in the first place, that there is no legislative sanction which enables police officers in the course of investigation to require an unwilling person to submit to medical examination, so that the employment of force or show of force by the constables against the accused amounted to use of criminal force or to assault, and was an offence under s. 352, Indian Penal Code. He says, secondly, that even if such legislative sanction were shown to exist, the conduct of the constables violated cl. (3) of art. 20 of the Constitution which provides that "no person accused of any offence shall be compelled to be a witness against himself", and which was interpreted by the Supreme Court in M. P. Sharma v. Satish Chandra, District Magistrate, Delhi,¹ to mean, in broad terms, that no person against whom an accusation has been made shall be required to furnish, by any positive volitional act, any material which can be used as evidence against him.

Dealing with the first part of Mr. Patwardhan's argument, we have been unable to find any statutory provision which renders lawful the coercion exercised or threatened by the constables in order that the accused may be medically examined. The powers which may be exercised by police officers in the course of investigation have been specified in several sections of the Criminal Procedure Code, and supplemental provisions in that behalf are found in Chap. VI of the Bombay Police Act, 1951, and, in so far as the investigation relates to offences under the Bombay Prohibition Act, in Chap. IX of that Act. Although no power has specifically been conferred on investigating officers to compel a person to submit to medical examination, the learned Government Pleader argues that the power has been impliedly conferred by s. 157 of the Criminal Procedure Code. That section provides that, in certain circumstances, an officer in charge of a police station shall proceed, or shall depute one of his subordinate officers to proceed, to the spot "to investigate the facts and circumstances of the case, and, if necessary, to take measures for discovery and arrest of the offender." Section 4(1) of the Code provides that the word "investigation", where it occurs in the Code, "includes all the proceedings under this Code for the collection of evidence conducted by a police officer..." The learned Government Pleader says that when, in the case of a person suspected of an offence under the Bombay Prohibition Act, a police officer proceeds to secure expert medical opinion about the physical condition of that person, he conducts a "proceeding for the collection of evidence", that the proceeding therefore amounts to "investigation", and that it is the duty of the police officer concerned to carry out this investigation under s. 157 of the Code. The learned Government Pleader further argues that the Code does not purport to lay down all the various modes in which investigation may have to be carried out in different cases, so that the expression "proceedings under the Code" occurring in the above definition of "investigation" is not confined to specific proceedings authorised by the Code, but extends to all the proceedings which the officer, who is authorised to investigate a case, finds it necessary to adopt for the purpose of investigation. The argument in substance is that s. 157 of the Code authorises an investigating officer to collect evidence in any manner that he may find expedient, and that this authority over-rides the rights and liberties of the subject to the extent necessary for the purpose of investigation.

The short answer to this rather specious argument is that s. 157 of the Code lays down some of the duties, and none of the rights, of an officer in charge of a police station. That section has no relevance whatever to the consideration of the extent to which a police officer can act in curtailment of the rights of the subject as regards his person or his property. Since a part of the investigation in every case can obviously be carried out by doing what an ordinary individual can do, the Legislature did not find it necessary to lay down, in a positive form, all the things that may be done by an investigating officer in collecting evidence. But to the extent to which the Legislature found that curtailment of the rights and liberties of the subject was necessary for a proper investigation into offences, to that extent the Legislature has made positive and specific provisions. Such provisions are found in the Criminal Procedure Code as well as in other Acts. For instance, ss. 51 to 53 of the Code relate to search of arrested persons, ss. 96 to 99 and s. 165 to search of places, ss. 160 to 162 to interrogation of witnesses, etc. If investigating officers had a general over-riding power to do whatever is found necessary for investigation, all these provisions would be redundant. The learned Government Pleader suggests that these provisions have been made, not by way of granting to investigating officers some limited powers of interference with the rights and liberties of the subject, but by way of imposing limitations on the over-riding power of investigating officers to interfere with such rights and liberties. This argument is untenable, firstly because the said sections positively confer certain limited powers and do not purport to limit some general power otherwise existing, and, secondly because in the absence of positive legislative enactment a general power to interfere with individual rights and liberties cannot be simply assumed. Law on the contrary assumes—and this was so even before the commencement of the Constitution—the existence of individual rights and liberties, and steps in for regulating those rights and liberties in the interest of social living.

That the Code of Criminal Procedure has not granted to investigating officers an over-riding power such as is claimed by the learned Government Pleader is further illustrated by the Identification of Prisoners Act passed by the Central Legislature in 1920. The preamble of the Act shows that its object was "to authorise the taking of measurements and photographs of convicts and others". Among other things, the Act requires any person arrested in connection with certain types of offences to allow his measurements to be taken in the prescribed manner on the direction of a police officer. The Act also authorises Magistrates to direct measurements and photographs to be taken of any person if that is found expedient "for the purposes of any investigation or proceeding under the Code of Criminal Procedure". Section 6 of the Act makes it lawful to overcome any resistance to the taking of measurements and photographs under the Act, and also makes the resistance itself an offence under s. 186 of the Indian Penal Code. The Act was passed several years after the Code of Criminal Procedure, and it shows that the Code did not grant to investigating officers a general over-riding power to act in curtailment of the rights and liberties of the subject for the purpose of investigation.

A question was raised before us whether the accused in this case was formally arrested before he was sought to be taken for medical examination. We did not find it necessary to decide this question because, even if he was taken in custody, the police constables had no legal authority to require him to submit to medical examination. It is obvious that the arrest and detention of a person under the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code do not deprive the person of such of his rights and liberties as are unconnected with his confinement.

A view similar to the one which we are adopting in this case was taken by a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Bhondar v. Emperor.¹ It was held in that case that it was not permissible under the Criminal Procedure Code to take hold of a prisoner forcibly and to examine his body medically without his consent for the purpose of qualifying some medical witness to give evidence in the case against him, and that any such examination without the consent of the accused amounted to an assault. It was further held in that case that the medical evidence so obtained is not admissible, but we are not required to express any opinion as regards that conclusion.

We find that the English law on this question is also the same. This can be seen from the following passage in Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd edn., Vol. X, at p. 742:—

"Without the consent of a prisoner, a judge or magistrate has no power to order an examination of his person, and if in pursuance of such an order an examination is made, the person who made the order and the person who makes the examination are guilty of an assault; but if the prisoner consents, even under a misapprehension as to the power to make such an order, the consent is an answer to the charge of assault."

It is thus clear that the police constables in this case were not doing their duty in taking the accused against his will towards the dispensary and that the accused cannot be convicted under s. 358 of the Indian Penal Code.

In view of this conclusion, we do not find it necessary to decide whether, as contended by Mr. Patwardhan, the act of the police constables amounted to the exercise of testimonial compulsion and violated cl. (3) of art. 20 of the Constitution. That question may fall for determination if the Legislature makes a provision requiring a person to submit to medical examination so that the evidence thus obtained may be used against him.

It is next argued by the learned Government Pleader that, even if the accused is not guilty of the aggravated offence under s. 358 of the Indian Penal Code, his action in giving two blows to the police constables amounts to an assault punishable under s. 352 of the Indian Penal Code. Now, as held above, it was the police constables who initially assaulted the accused by attempting to drag him forcibly to the dispensary, and prima facie the accused had the right of private defence against that action under s. 97 of the Indian Penal Code. It does not appear to us, nor was it urged before us by the learned Government Pleader, that the accused inflicted more harm than was necessary for the purpose of preventing the constables from taking him to a doctor. The learned Government Pleader, however, says that the accused was not entitled to act in the exercise of the right of private defence because of para. 1 of s. 99, Indian Penal Code, which runs as follows:—

"There is no right of private defence against an act which does not reasonably cause the apprehension of death or of grievous hurt, if done, or attempted to be done, by a public servant acting in good faith under colour of his office, though that act may not be strictly justifiable by law."

Now, the expression "good faith" as used in the Indian Penal Code has a technical meaning, for s. 52 of the Indian Penal Code says that

"nothing is said to be done or believed in 'good faith' which is done or believed without due care and attention."

It is obviously the duty of all police officers to acquaint themselves with at least the general scope of their powers. Since the action of the police constables in this case was altogether outside the scope of their powers, it cannot be said that they acted with "due care and attention" and therefore in "good faith". Generally speaking, the exception contained in the first para. of s. 99 of the Indian Penal Code applies where a public servant acts irregularly in the exercise of his powers, and not where he acts outside the scope of his powers.

The learned Government Pleader, however, points out that the police constables were merely carrying out the order given by the head constable in taking the accused to the medical dispensary, and he argues that they were protected by the first para. of s. 99 irrespective of whether the order of the head constable was wholly illegal. In support of this argument the learned Government Pleader relies on a recent decision of a Division Bench of this Court in State v. Yamanappa Limbaji.¹ Now, in the first place, it cannot be held that the police constables were carrying out the order of the head constable in dragging the accused to the dispensary against his will. The evidence shows that the head constable had merely asked the police constables to take the accused to the dispensary, and that the accused offered resistance on the way to the dispensary in the absence of the head constable. Since the occasion to exercise force against the accused arose in the absence of the head constable, it is not correct to say that the head constable had directed the constables to exercise force against the accused. Secondly, even if the order of the head constable amounted to a direction to take the accused to the dispensary by force if necessary, we do not think that the mere fact that the constables were carrying out an order of their superior officer, however illegal that order might have been, had the effect of depriving the accused of the right of private defence.

The decision in State v. Yamanappa Limbaji does not, in our opinion, support that view. In that case, the accused was a dismissed police constable, and he failed, even after dismissal, to vacate the quarters which had been provided to him during his term of service. The District Superintendent of Police gave a notice to the accused to vacate the premises, and on his failure to do so, directed a Sub-Inspector of Police to dispossess him. The accused offered resistance to the Sub-Inspector and assaulted him, and was then prosecuted for an offence under s. 332 of the Indian Penal Code. The Court held, relying on para. 1 of s. 99 of the Indian Penal Code, that the accused was not entitled to act in the exercise of the right of private defence. The notice issued by the District Superintendent of Police to the accused calling upon him to vacate the premises was under s. 31(1) of the Bombay Police Act, and the subsequent direction of the District Superintendent of Police requiring the Sub-Inspector to secure vacant possession of the premises fell under s. 31(2) of that Act. Both the sub-sections of s. 31 require that the officer taking action thereunder should have been authorised to do so by the State Government. Now, the District Superintendent of Police had an authority from the State Government, but the Court found that that authority enabled the District Superintendent of Police to take action under s. 31(1) only, and not under s. 31(2) as well. It was under these circumstances that the Court held that, although the direction of the District Superintendent of Police was not in accordance with law, the Sub-Inspector of Police was protected by para. 1 of s. 99 of the Indian Penal Code against the exercise of the right of private defence by the accused. The judgment of the Division Bench was delivered by Vyas J., and in the course of the judgment the learned Judge observed (p. 559):

"...The District Superintendent of Police's order dated July 29, 1954, was not such as would prima facie appear to be a defective or bad order. It would have been a different matter if on the face of the order itself it had appeared defective or incorrect. If ex facie the order had been such that the Sub-Inspector should or could have known that he was asked to do something which was contrary to law, it might have raised a different question..."

In another part of his judgment, with reference to the position of a public servant carrying out an order of his superior officer, the learned Judge said (p. 561):

"...He is not expected to test and satisfy himself as to the technical propriety of the order which he is called upon to enforce. For instance, in this case he could not be expected to apprehend a fine distinction between an authorisation contemplated by s. 31, sub-s. (1), cl. (b), and an authorisation under s. 31, sub-s. (2). He could not be blamed if he did not see a distinction between the scope and extent of sub-s. (1) and sub-s. (2) of s. 31...."

It is clear that the learned Judges who decided that case did not lay down any general proposition to the effect that the right of private defence cannot be exercised against public servants who carry out the orders of their superiors, however manifestly illegal the orders may be. It was because the order which the Sub-Inspector of Police was carrying out in that case was apparently lawful, but was found to be unlawful on account of a technical defect, that the learned Judges held that the accused was deprived of the right of private defence by para. 1 of s. 99 of the Indian Penal Code. In the present case, the order of the head constable, if it is construed as an order authorising the police constables to use force against the accused, was wholly beyond the powers of the head constable, and the accused had the right of defending himself against the force sought to be illegally exercised against his person in pursuance of that order.

The result is that the accused is not guilty either under s. 353 or under s. 352 of the Indian Penal Code. Accordingly we make the rule absolute, set aside the order of conviction and sentence, and acquit the accused. The fine, if paid, should be refunded. The bail bond is cancelled.

Conviction and sentence set aside.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

[NAGPUR BENCH]

Before Mr. Justice Mudholkar and Mr. Justice Kotval.

JAIRAM CHANDRABHAN MAHAR v. THE STATE.*

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860); Sec. 300, Exception 1—Accused tried for murder of his wife stating that he had seen her coming out of her paramour's house on the night previous to offence—Accused further stating that on his questioning her about it the following morning, the deceased threatening to go and live with her paramour, using foul language and kicking accused—Accused thereupon striking her with knife and causing her death—Whether case of accused fell under Exception 1 to s. 300—Burden of proof of exception whether discharged on bare word of accused person.

The accused, who was tried for an offence under s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code for the murder of his wife, in his defence stated that he had seen his wife coming out of the house of her paramour on the night previous to the offence, that when he saw her the following morning working in a field and questioned her about it, she talked to him impertinently, threatened to go and live with her paramour and used foul language, that when he caught her hand she kicked him and that, thereupon, he lost his self-control, took out a small pen-knife and dealt five or seven blows with it on his wife's person. On the question whether Exception 1 to s. 300 of the Code was available to the accused:—

Held, that the incident which the accused alleged had occurred in the field in the morning was not sufficient in law to constitute grave and sudden provocation within the meaning of that expression used in Exception 1 to s. 300 of the Indian Penal Code.

It is extremely hazardous to apply Exception 1 to s. 300 of the Indian Penal Code to a case like the above merely on the ground that offences against marital rights are made punishable in India. What has to be considered in a case of this kind is whether provocation which was offered was of a kind which would cause a reasonable man belonging to the same social stratum as the accused person to lose his power of self-control.

*Decided, June 30, 1958. Criminal Appeal No. 65 of 1958, against the order of conviction passed by G. G. Bhograj, Additional Sessions

Holmes v. Director Public Prosecution' and Murugien, In re,' referred to.

The bare word of an accused person is not sufficient to discharge the burden of proof of an exception. There must be some corroboration, direct or indirect, of the statement of the accused person.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

B. B. Ranade, for the appellant.

W. B. Pendharkar, Special Government Pleader, for the respondent.

MUDHOLKAR J. The appellant was tried for the offence of murder of his wife committed at Takali, district Buldana, on or about August 20, 1957. The learned Additional Sessions Judge who tried the appellant convicted him under s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code but instead of awarding the maximum sentence awarded the lesser penalty under the law.

It was not in dispute before the learned Additional Sessions Judge nor is it in dispute before us that the appellant and his deceased wife Tulsabai used to quarrel quite often. The appellant is a resident of Telhara. Two or three days prior to the Akshaya Tritiya of the year 1957, the appellant along with Tulsabai and their children went to Takali where his mother-in-law Muktabai lived. He stayed there for two or three days and returned alone to Telhara. Tulsabai continued to stay on in Takali till her death on August 20, 1957. It may be mentioned that the appellant visited Takali a few days before Nag Panchami and again visited Takali two weeks before the Pola of that year. His object in visiting Takali was to induce his wife to return with him to Telhara.

The incident out of which this appeal arises occurred during the third visit of the appellant to Takali. On the morning of August 20, 1957, the appellant went to a field at Takali where Tulsabai was carrying on weeding operations along with her mother Muktabai (P.W. 4), her aunt Janabai (P.W. 7), her sisters-in-law Renuka (P.W. 8) and Bhikabai (P.W. 9) and a number of other women and men including Pandurang (P.W. 11) and Wasudeo (P.W. 10). When the appellant saw Tulsabai he talked with her. In the course of that talk he struck Tulsabai five or seven times with a knife causing serious injuries to her person as a result of which she expired on that very day.

The appellant's defence is that Tulsabai was a woman of loose character as she was carrying an intrigue at that time with one Pundya, who though a resident of a different village, had gone to Takali after Tulsabai went to stay there; that on the night of August 19, he saw Tulsabai entering the house of one Purnya, a relation of Pundya, who was staying at Takali at that time, that he also saw Tulsabai coming out of that house at about 1 a.m. and thereafter returned home; that next morning he went to the field where Tulsabai was working and asked her whether she had gone to Purnya's house on the previous night; that Tulsabai thereupon said "Yes, I will go; it is my sweet will. If you feel it so much, then I will begin residing with Pundya" (sic). The appellant added that though he tried to persuade Tulsabai to improve her ways she declined to do anything. On the contrary she said: "If you are so much ashamed, then get away from here. Why have you come here?" and also used foul language. This enraged the appellant and that he thereafter caught her hand. Tulsabai retaliated by kicking him, whereupon, he lost his self-control, took out a small pen-knife which was with him and dealt five or seven blows with it on Tulsabai's person.

As already stated the appellant does not dispute the essential facts that Tulsabai met her death as a result of several knife injuries received by her and that these injuries were caused by the appellant alone. The question which remains to be decided, therefore, is what offence was committed by the appellant.

If the defence of the appellant is accepted then the case would fall under the first Exception to s. 300 of the Indian Penal Code and the offence would amount to culpable homicide not amounting to murder punishable under s. 304 of the Code. The first Exception to s. 300 of the Indian Penal Code reads thus:

"Culpable homicide is not murder if the offender, whilst deprived of the power of self-control by grave and sudden provocation, causes the death of the person who gave the provocation or causes the death of any other person by mistake or accident."

The question is whether the facts alleged by the appellant can be deemed sufficient to bring the case under the aforesaid Exception, assuming for the moment that the facts were as stated by the appellant. Had the appellant attacked the deceased in the way he did at 1 a.m. on the morning between August 19-20, while she was coming out or after she had come out of Purnya's house, the first Exception may have been available to him. But can it be said that that Exception was available to him later on the morning of August 20, and that too after the appellant had slept over the provocation alleged to have been given to him by Tulsabai by misconducting herself. It must be remembered that even according to the appellant he was quite calm and collected when he talked with Tulsabai while she was working in the field that morning along with other womenfolk. According to him, Tulsabai talked to him impertinently and also threatened to go and even live in the house of Pundya whom he regarded as her paramour.

Shri Ranade who appears for the appellant points out that apart from talking in this manner the deceased kicked the appellant and that, therefore, this circumstance entitled the appellant to the benefit of the First Exception to s. 300. It must be remembered that what the deceased did in the night was something far more serious than what, according to the appellant, she said and did in the field that morning. If the appellant was sufficiently strong willed not to lose his self-control even though he saw his wife coming in the early hours of the morning out of the house of her paramour, it is difficult to accept the statement that the appellant lost that power by reason of something less grave which happened in the field later in the morning. Apart from that, it seems to us that what occurred in the field in the morning cannot ordinarily be regarded as grave and sudden provocation to justify the killing of a person. We may cite the following observations from the decision in *Holmes v. Director of Public Prosecutions*¹ (p. 127):

"The whole doctrine relating to provocation depends on the fact that it causes, or may cause, a sudden and temporary loss of self-control whereby malice, which is the formation of an intention to kill or to inflict grievous bodily harm, is negatived. Consequently, where the provocation inspires an actual intention to kill, or to inflict grievous bodily harm, the doctrine that provocation may reduce murder to manslaughter seldom applies. Only one very special exception has been recognised, viz., the actual finding of a spouse in the act of adultery. This has always been treated as an exception to the general rule:... But it has been rightly laid down that the exception cannot be extended,..."

"... a sudden confession of adultery without more can never constitute provocation of a sort which might reduce murder to manslaughter."

This passage has been cited by Basheer Ahmed Sayeed J. in his judgment in Murugion, In re.² In the course of his judgment the learned Judge has observed (at p. 15):

"But it should be noted that these decisions apply to the society in England and countries of western culture and civilization. It is well known that in western societies, marital laws and violations thereof are looked upon with such (sic) greater latitude and the award of damage in Civil Courts would constitute sufficient redress. Adultery is not made punishable as it is in our country where a more serious view is taken of offences against marital rights."

In our opinion, it would be extremely hazardous to apply the first Excep- tion to s. 300 to a case of the kind we have here merely on the ground that offences against marital rights are made punishable by the law in India. What has to be considered in a case of this kind is whether provocation which was offered was of a kind which would cause a reasonable man belonging to the same social stratum as the accused person to lose his power of self-control. Bearing in mind the fact that adultery though frowned upon in our country is not uncommon in the village community and bearing also in mind the fact that even before the law made a provision for obtaining a divorce, a customary form of divorce has prevailed in the village communities, it would not be right to hold that the reaction of an Indian spouse from such a community would be different from that of one in the Western countries. We are, therefore, of the view that the incident which the appellant alleged occurred in the field on the morning of August 20, was not sufficient in law to constitute grave and sudden provocation within the meaning of that expression used in the first Exception to s. 300.

Apart from that, we have only the word of the appellant to the effect that conversation of the kind stated by him took place between him and Tulsabai and that in the course of the incident she kicked him after filthily abusing him. Now, if there was any truth in this he would have made a statement about it before the committing Magistrate. On the other hand, when he was asked by the committing Magistrate: "When the females doing the weeding had gone two or three fields ahead did you deal three blows on her head with a dagger?" His answer was: "I did not strike her. I tried to catch hold of her hand and she fell down on the sickle in her hand." Then he was asked: "After you beat her, did she shout and did her mother Muktabai come there running?" His answer was: "Yes, she came running." To the question, "When Muktabai intervened did you push her aside and deal three blows with the dagger on her stomach?" his answer was, "I do not state anything here. I will tell everything in Sessions Court."

Now, we would have expected the appellant to make a clean breast of the whole thing before the committing Magistrate if in point of fact whatever he did was done under grave and sudden provocation. Again, in that case, he would have never thought it necessary to invent a false defence to the effect that the injuries were caused by the sickle which Tulsabai herself was holding in her hand. We may further mention the fact that not one of the several eye-witnesses examined in the case has been questioned about the conversation which is said to have taken place and particularly about the kicks which Tulsabai is said to have administered to the appellant. It is, therefore, clear that the defence which was set up before the Sessions Court was only an after-thought. Now, the law requires that where an accused person pleads an exception he has to prove it. In the instant case, there is no proof. There is only the word of the appellant. According to Shri Ranade the word of the appellant should be accepted as was done in the Madras case (cit sup). We cannot accept the principle that in every case the bare word of an accused person is sufficient to discharge the burden of proof of an exception. There must be some corroboration, direct or indirect, of the statement of the accused person. Apart from that, in the instant case, as we have already shown, the statements made by the appellant in his examination are patently untrue and cannot be accepted. Upon this view, we negative the contention of Shri Ranade that the offence is anything less than murder. We, therefore, affirm the appellant's conviction under s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code.

He has already been awarded the lesser sentence and, therefore, there is nothing more that can be done.

The appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

[NAGPUR BENCH]

Before Mr. Justice Mudholkar and Mr. Justice Kotval.

MANAGER, RAMKRISHNA RAMNATH BIDI FACTORY,
 . ANDHALGAON v. FIRST CIVIL JUDGE, 1ST CLASS, NAGPUR.*

Payment of Wages Act (IV of 1936), Sec. 18—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XI—Whether Authority under Act has jurisdiction to order party to make discovery of documents in his possession—Section 18 whether controlled by s. 15(3).

The Authority under the Payment of Wages Act, 1936, has under s. 18 of the Act jurisdiction to order a party before it to make discovery of the document in his possession.

The words "all the powers of a Civil Court under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, for the purpose of...compelling the production of documents" in s. 18 of the Payment of Wages Act, 1936, refer to the provisions of O. XI of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, which deals with discovery, inspection and production of documents.

Section 15(3) of the Payment of Wages Act, 1936, does not control the powers granted to the Authority under s. 18 of the Act.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

M. N. Phadke, for the petitioner.

D. B. Bhagade, for opponents Nos. 2 and 3.

KOTVAL J. This matter arises out of proceedings taken under the Payment of Wages Act before opponent No. 1 who is the Authority appointed under the Payment of Wages Act.

Opponent No. 2 Hiranman, who was a bidi worker in the factory of the petitioner, made an application along with his counsel (opponent No. 3) for payment of delayed wages and also for compensation under the provisions of ss. 15(2) and (3) of the Act. The petitioner raised several defences including the defence that the application was barred under the provisions of the Act. During the pendency of the proceedings an application on behalf of opponent No. 2 Hiranman was moved on October 5, 1957, praying that the petitioner should be directed to make discovery of certain documents for the relevant period for which the wages were claimed. In that application Hiranman stated that the petitioner maintained a register of workers and a payment register in which the wages disbursed to the workers were mentioned. Therefore, those registers were relevant for deciding the quantum of the delayed wages due to Hiranman. The petitioner opposed this application and alleged that it was not made in accordance with any provision of law, that the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure did not apply to the proceedings under the Payment of Wages Act, and that the Authority had therefore no jurisdiction to pass any order upon Hiranman's application. The Authority rejected the petitioner's contentions and allowed the application for discovery of documents by its order dated November 8, 1957. This is the order impugned in the present petition.

Mr. M. N. Phadke, appearing on behalf of the petitioner, has reiterated the contention that the Authority under the Payment of Wages Act had no jurisdiction to pass an order for discovery of the particular documents required before it. The relevant provision is contained in s. 18 of the Payment of Wages Act, 1936. The section runs as follows:—

"Every Authority appointed under sub-section (1) of section 15 shall have all the powers of a civil Court under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, for the purpose of taking evidence and of enforcing the attendance of witnesses and compelling the production of documents,..."

*Decided, July 9, 1958. Special Civil Application No. 379 of 1957.

Apart from any other power under s. 18, the authority has

"all the powers of a civil Court under the Code of Civil Procedure...for the purpose of...compelling the production of documents."

In our opinion, by these words the Legislature intended to refer to the provisions of O. XI of the Code of Civil Procedure which deal with discovery, inspection and production of documents. In its first eleven rules O. XI deals with the delivery of interrogatories, a subject with which we are not here concerned. Then it makes provision for the discovery of documents in rr. 12 and 13. After discovery is provided for, it deals with the subject of production of documents in r. 14. Then provision is made for the inspection of the documents produced in rr. 15, 17 and 18 of the Order.

Reading the Order as a whole it seems to us clear that the provisions made in the Order for discovery and inspection are only provisions made in order to aid the production of documents before the Court, particularly the provisions regarding "discovery". These provisions would therefore squarely fall within the ambit of the words used in s. 18 of the Payment of Wages Act, viz.

"all the powers of a civil Court under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, for the purpose of...compelling the production of documents."

Inspection is only a step-in-aid of the final production of the documents. Upon this view, therefore, the Authority under the Payment of Wages Act had the jurisdiction to order the petitioner to make discovery of the documents in his possession.

Mr. Phadke then raises another contention. He referred to the provisions of s. 15(3) of the Payment of Wages Act and he urged that such an order could only be passed after the Authority "entertained" the application. Subsection (3) of s. 15 merely confers jurisdiction on the Authority to hear the application under the Act and grant certain reliefs, and it can have no reference to the procedural power which is prescribed under s. 18. In our opinion s. 15(3) of the Act cannot control the powers granted to the Authority under s. 18.

In any event, it is clear upon the allegations made by the petitioner himself in the present petition that the Authority had "entertained" the application before it. We hold that the order passed, calling upon the petitioner to make discovery of documents in his possession, was a valid order passed with jurisdiction by the Authority.

Upon this view the petition fails and is dismissed with costs.

Petition dismissed.

TARABAI MADHAORAO DESHMUKH v. THE BOMBAY REVENUE TRIBUNAL, NAGPUR.*

Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act (XXIV of 1951), Secs. 8, 9, 19(2)—Lease terminated by landlord under s. 9(1) on ground that land required for personal cultivation—Possession delivered by lessee—Application by lessee under s. 9(6) stating that land leased out by landlord to another person—Maintainability of such application—Whether operation of s. 8 excluded when lease terminated on ground that landlord requiring land for personal cultivation.

The operation of s. 8 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951, is altogether excluded in the one case contemplated by s. 9(1) of the Act, viz. where the lease was terminable on the ground that the landholder required the land for cultivating the land personally.

The words in s. 8(1)(g) of the Act "as provided in s. 9" only qualify the word "notice" occurring in that clause of s. 8(1). Therefore s. 8(1)(g) merely refers to the notice and its various requirements mentioned in s. 9(1) and to nothing further. It has no reference to the remaining sub-sections of s. 9.

Under ss. 8(1)(g) and 9 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951, so far as termination of any lease of land held by a protected lessee is concerned the landholder has two options: (a) to terminate by notice on the ground that he requires the land for cultivating it personally, [s. 9(1)], and (b) to terminate by notice in other cases, [s. 8(1)(g)]. In the former case, he need not have recourse to any authority or obtain orders of a Revenue Officer, but the right is given in such a case to the tenant to challenge the notice on the two grounds mentioned in s. 9(3) and in that event the Revenue Officer has to adjudicate in accordance with sub-ss. (3) to (9) of s. 9. The notice in this case must fulfil the requirements of s. 9(1). In the latter case, the notice also must fulfil all the requirements of s. 9(1) excepting obviously the requirement as to the landholder requiring the land for cultivating it personally. In this case the landholder must obtain the orders of the Revenue Officer to terminate the lease.

Uttamrao v. Sahurao,¹ disapproved.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

B. K. Thakur, for the petitioner.

B. N. Deshpande, for the respondents.

KOTVAL J. The order in this Special Civil Application shall also govern the disposal of Special Civil Application No. 60 of 1958. The facts as also the points arising in both these Special Civil Applications are common and a common argument was addressed by consent of counsel concerned. It will be sufficient to state the facts in Special Civil Application No. 59 of 1958.

Respondent No. 4 Ganesh was a protected lessee of the petitioner. On December 23, 1952, the landholder gave him notice terminating his lease under the provisions of s. 9(1) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act on the ground that the former required the land for cultivating it personally. In pursuance of this notice, respondent No. 4 consented to the delivery of possession and possession was delivered to the landholder on April 1, 1953. A few months later, on August 23, 1954, the former protected lessee Ganesh put in an application under s. 9(6) of the Act against the petitioner and three other persons who were impleaded because there was some dispute as to who was the landholder. By that application, respondent No. 4 prayed that field No. 111 of which he was the former protected lessee should be placed in his possession because the landholder had instead of cultivating the field at home as stated in his notice under s. 9(1) leased it out to another person Kashirao,

Application No. 59 of 1958 (with Special Civil Application No. 60 of 1958) 1 [1958] N. L. J. 182 respondent No. 7. The application was heard by the Sub-Divisional Officer, Achalpur, who dismissed it, and in appeal the Additional Deputy Commissioner maintained the dismissal of the application. In second appeal a Division Bench of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal set aside the decisions of the Sub-Divisional Officer and the Additional Deputy Commissioner and allowed the application. The short question which arises for decision upon this petition may now be stated.

Section 8(1)(g) of the Act runs as follows:

"Notwithstanding any agreement, usage, decree or order of a court of law, the lease of any land held by a protected lessee shall not be terminated except under orders of a Revenue Officer made on any of the following grounds, namely—...

(g) he has been served with a notice by the landholder as provided in section 9."

Section 9(1) runs as follows:

"Notwithstanding anything contained in section 8 the landholder may terminate the lease of a protected lessee by giving him notice in writing delivered not less than three months before the commencement of the next agricultural year stating therein the reasons for such termination and the description of the area in respect of which it is proposed to terminate the lease, if the landholder requires the land for cultivating the land personally."

The other provisions of s. 9 give the protected lessee a right to question the notice served under s. 9(1) if it is not bona fide and also give the lessee an option to give up some other land than the land regarding which notice has been given. With these provisions we are not immediately concerned. But s. 9(6) provides as follows:

"If on re-entering upon any land after termination of the lease of a protected lessee in accordance with this section, a landholder fails at any time during such period as may be prescribed to utilise the land for the purpose for which the lease was terminated, the dispossessed lessee may apply to the Revenue Officer to put him in possession of the land from the commencement of the agricultural year next following; and the Revenue Officer shall, after hearing the landholder and making such enquiry as he deems fit, put the lessee in possession of the land if he is satisfied of the failure and also award him such sum by way of compensation as the Revenue Officer may consider sufficient."

The application which was preferred was expressly made under s. 9(6) of the Act. The view which prevailed with the Sub-Divisional Officer as also the Additional Deputy Commissioner was that the landholder had taken possession in contravention of the provisions of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act and, therefore, since the protected lessee had been dispossessed he could make an application under s. 19(2). This was one of the questions raised by Mr. R. K. Thakur appearing on behalf of the petitioner. The other question raised by Mr. Thakur was that in the present case the landholder had not terminated the lease under the provisions of s. 9(1) and therefore s. 9(6) would be inapplicable. He urged that the termination was with the consent of the protected lessee and not under the orders of a revenue officer as required by s. 8(1)(g) read with s. 9(1) and therefore an application under s. 9(6) would not lie. He has derived support for his contention from a decision of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal in Uttamrao v. Sahurao.¹ The view which the Bombay Revenue Tribunal has taken in the present case is however directly contrary to the view taken in that case.

An examination of the provisions of ss. 8(1)(g) and 9(1) independently of each other no doubt reveals an apparent conflict between the two provisions. Section 8(1)(g) enjoins that a lease of a protected lessee shall not be terminated except under orders of a Revenue Officer, while s. 9(1) lays down no such condition but, on the other hand, permits termination of a lease by giving the protected lessee a notice in writing delivered under certain conditions. Mr. Thakur urged that since s. 9 is referred to in s. 8(1)(g) the provisions of s. 8(1)(g) would govern s. 9(1) and therefore in the present case since the lease was not terminated under orders of a Revenue Officer but only by private treaty the provisions of s. 9(6) would not be attracted. That was also the construction placed on these provisions of law by the Bombay Revenue Tribunal in Uttamrao v. Sahurao.

It is no doubt true that s. 8(1)(g) lays down as one of the conditions for the termination of a lease, that a notice shall have been served by the landholder as provided in s. 9; but s. 9 makes no reference to the obtaining of orders of a Revenue Officer for the termination of a lease as such except in the case provided in s. 9(3) where the tenant has to initiate certain proceedings.

In this apparent conflict it seems to us that the decisive provision is contained in the opening clause of s. 9(1). The provisions of s. 9(1) are preceded by the non-obstante clause "Notwithstanding anything contained in section 8" and having regard to the normal purpose of such a clause we must give it due effect. It seems to us that it was clearly the intention of the Legislature to exclude the operation of s. 8 altogether in the one case contemplated by s. 9(1), viz. where the lease was terminable on the ground that the landholder required the land for cultivating the land personally. The reason for such an exclusion is not far to seek because that particular ground of termination of the lease is specifically and in great detail dealt with exclusively in s. 9. Therefore, so far as that particular ground of terminating a lease of a protected lessee is concerned, the Legislature obviously intended that the provisions of s. 9 should operate untrammelled by the provisions of s. 8. This does not mean as was held in Uttamrao's case that upon this interpretation the lessee would be left to the mercy of the landholder. The lessee has a valuable protection still conferred on him. The protection is that he can apply under s. 9(3) that the notice is not bona fide or that he should be permitted to give up some other land in lieu of the land mentioned in the notice.

It was then argued that if this be the interpretation of s. 9(1) then s. 8(1)(g) would be deprived of all meaning because s. 8(1)(g) states, as one of the grounds for terminating a lease under orders of a Revenue Officer, that the lessee "has been served with a notice by the landholder as provided in section 9." The argument is that the words "as provided in section 9" show that the whole of s. 9 would apply and therefore s. 9 is subject to s. 8.

We cannot accept this contention. The words in s. 8(1)(g) "as provided in section 9" only qualify the word "notice" occurring in that clause of s. 8(1). Therefore s. 8(1)(g) merely refers to the notice and its various requirements mentioned in s. 9(1) and to nothing further. It has no reference to the remaining sub-s. of s. 9.

We are unable to accept the interpretation of the non-obstante clause in s. 9 as given in Uttamrao v. Sahurao.

The cumulative effect of the provisions of s. 8(1)(g) and s. 9 indicates that so far as termination of any lease of land held by a protected lessee is concerned the landholder has two options: (a) to terminate by notice on the ground that he requires the land for cultivating it personally [s. 9(1)] and (b) to terminate by notice in other cases, [s. 8(1)(g)]. In the former case, he need not have recourse to any authority or obtain orders of a Revenue Officer, but the right is given in such a case to the tenant to challenge the notice on the two grounds mentioned in s. 9(3) and in that event the Revenue Officer comes into the picture and he has to adjudicate in accordance with sub-ss. 8 to 9 of s. 9. The notice in this case must fulfil the requirements of s. 9(1) i.e. (i) it must be in writing, (ii) must be delivered not less than three months before the commencement of the next agricultural year, (iii) state therein the reasons for termination, (iv) the description of the area, in respect of which it is proposed to terminate the lease, and (v) the fact that the landholder requires the land for cultivating the land personally.

In the latter case, the notice also must fulfil all the above requirements excepting obviously the 5th requirement mentioned above. That, in our opinion, is the only meaning of s. 8(1)(g). In that case it is the landholder who must obtain the orders of the Revenue Officer.

The reasons for thus distinguishing between the two categories of termination by notice are not far to seek. Under general law, in the absence of a contract to the contrary a landlord can always terminate a lease by notice. The rule is recognised by the Act, but is qualified. Where the landlord needs the land for his own cultivation, the Act does not go so far as to say that his needs shall be subordinated to the needs of the tenant. In such a case the landlord may take back the land by his own volition by giving a notice subject only to the safeguards in favour of the lessee in s. 9(3). But where the landlord desires to eject the lessee when he does not need the land for himself but on other grounds (and it is to be noted that cls. (a) to (j) all contemplate some case or the other where the tenant is at default or blameworthy) then the procedure is more stringent and the landlord cannot evict without an order from a Revenue Officer.

The Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act was only passed to provide for long term leases of agricultural land, to ensure fixity of tenure in the interest of efficient agriculture in Berar. It gave lessees certain additional rights, protected them against rack-renting and indiscriminate ejectment but certainly contained nothing to abrogate the law relating to landlord and tenant as it stood prior to its enactment. We cannot conceive that it was the intention of the Legislature to make it impossible for a landholder to terminate voluntarily a tenant's lease under any circumstances. That is also inconsistent with the object of the legislation.

We hold, therefore, that in the present case the application made by Ganesh, the protected lessee under s. 9(6) was correctly made under that provision of law even though the lease was not terminated by the orders of a Revenue Officer.

Another contention urged on behalf of the petitioner by Mr. Thakur related to limitation. That question no longer remains for decision in the view we have taken.

In the result, therefore, we affirm the decision of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal in both the cases and dismiss both the Special Civil Applications with costs.

Applications dismissed.

Saurashtra Land Reforms Act (XXV of 1951), Secs. 2(15), 12, 18, 19, 20, 23(1), 39—Lands granted as 'giras' by former Ruler of State to petitioner continued by United State of Saurashtra on condition that petitioner not to evict tenants on lands—Government of Saurashtra by notification under Act declaring petitioner 'girasdar' and incorporating in notification condition that petitioner not to evict tenants—Application by petitioner for allotment of "gharkhed land" under s. 19 of Act—Whether petitioner's application could be granted—Whether there is conflict between s. 12 and s. 18—Whether Government can impose restrictions upon rights of girasdar.

The former Ruler of a State in Saurashtra granted certain agricultural lands as 'giras' to the petitioner who was a junior member of the ruling family. After the administration of the State was taken over by the United State of Saurashtra, an agreement was arrived at between the Ruler and the Government of India under which the lands were regarded as lawfully granted to the petitioner but subject to the restriction that the grantee was not to evict the tenants on the lands. After the coming into force of the Saurashtra Land Reforms Act, 1951, the Government of Saurashtra by a notification dated July 20, 1954, declared the petitioner a girasdar subject to the provisions of s. 18 of the Act, and conditions imposed by the Government of India that he could not evict tenants were incorporated in the notification. In the meanwhile on March 21, 1952, the petitioner applied for an order of allotment of "gharkhad land" under s. 19 of the Act read with r. 4. On the question whether the petitioner's application could be granted:—

Held, that as the condition incorporated in the agreement arrived at between the Ruler and the Government of India was accepted by the petitioner, who had knowledge of it, it ensured for the benefit of the tenants for whose benefit it was imposed, that as the notification which declared the petitioner a girasdar, expressly preserved the rights of the tenants and imposed a disability upon the petitioner preventing him from evicting the tenants in the lands of which he was declared a girasdar, that declaration also ensured for the benefit of the tenants under s. 18 of the Saurashtra Land Reforms Act, 1951, and that, therefore, the petitioner's application could not be granted.

The rights which a tenant has and which are not limited or abridged under s. 18 of the Saurashtra Land Reforms Act, 1951, are to be regarded as enforceable so long as the tenancy is subsisting. Therefore, where there is statutory determination of tenancy under s. 12 of the Act as a result of an order of allotment of land to the girasdar passed by the Mamlatdar, the girasdar becomes an occupant of the land under s. 39 of the Act and the rights of the tenant holding that land are extinguished.

There is nothing in the Saurashtra Land Reforms Act, 1951, which requires the Government when declaring a landlord a girasdar, not to impose any conditions upon him, or not to declare the rights of the tenants in the land of which the landlord is declared a girasdar.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

A. B. Baxi, for the applicant.

C. N. Shah, for opponents Nos. 1 and 7.

B. D. Shukla, for opponents Nos. 2 to 6, 17, 18.

B. R. Sompura, Special Government Pleader, for opponents Nos. 26, 27.

SHAH J. This Special Application raises a question as to the interpretation of certain provisions of the Saurashtra Land Reforms Act, No. XXV of 1951. The lands in dispute were within the jurisdiction of the former Virpur State. One Hamirsinhji Thakore of Virpur died in 1937, leaving him surviving his son Dilipsinhji who succeeded to the Virpur Gadi according to the custom of primogeniture. Dilipsinhji died in the year 1945 and he was succeeded to the gadi by his son Narendrasinhji. On June 1, 1947, Narendrasinhji granted certain agricultural lands as "giras" to the petitioner Digvijaysinhji who was the grantor's paternal uncle. These lands were situate in the villages of Matiya and Gunda. On February 11, 1948, an exchange was effected between Narendrasinhji and the petitioner whereby the lands in Matiya and Gunda were returned to Narendrasinhji and the petitioner was granted certain lands at Kharedi which are the subject-matter of this petition. On February 17, 1948, entries were posted in the "Hak Patrak" of the Virpur State which evidenced the grant of the lands to the petitioner. On March 8, 1948, the administration of the Virpur State was handed over to the United State of Saurashtra. In February 1949, Mr. V. P. Menon, Secretary to the Ministry of States, Dominion of India, held a conference at Jamnagar to discuss the questions relating to private properties of the Rulers and certain formulæ were evolved for granting recognition to the claims of the erstwhile Rulers to their private properties. Thereafter an agreement was arrived at between Narendrasinhji and the Government of India, under which the lands at Kharedi were regarded as lawfully granted to the petitioner but subject to the restriction that the grantee was not to evict the tenants on the lands. The arrangement between the Government of India and Narendrasinhji was set out in a letter dated November 2, 1949, which states inter alia:—

"According to the Jamnagar Conference decision as this grant was an exchange, it was acceptable after verification regarding reasonableness of the exchange. It having been decided on enquiry that the exchange was reasonable, the grant is accepted subject however to the liability of the grantees (a) to pay 12½% as assessment, (b) to see that no cultivator shall be evicted from the land."

The letter also requested that intimation be given to the petitioner about the assessment charged under the agrarian law and that he should be put in possession of the land subject to the liability specified in the letter.

The Saurashtra Land Resumption Ordinance No. 84 of 1949, making provision for resumption of certain lands was issued by the Raj Pramukh in 1949. It is undisputed, however, that the lands in dispute in this application are not included in the schedule to that Ordinance. The State of Saurashtra then passed the Saurashtra Land Reforms Act, 1951, which was enacted for "improvement of land revenue administration and for ultimately putting an end to the Girasdar system"

and

"to regulate the relationship between the Girasdars and their tenants and to enable the tenants to become occupants of the land held by them and to provide for the payment of compensation to the Girasdars for the extinguishment of their rights."

The expression 'Girasdar' was, by s. 2(15) of that Act, defined as meaning any talukdar, bhagdar, bhayat, cadet or mulgirasia and included any person whom the Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, declare to be a Girasdar for the purposes of this Act. The petitioner, though a junior member of the Virpur family, was not a girasdar as a cadet bhayat or mulgirasia. On January 29, 1954, the Government of Saurashtra declared the petitioner for the purposes of the Act, a "girasdar" but subject to the provisions of s. 18 of the Act. By a notification dated July 20, 1954, the earlier notification of January 29, 1954, was clarified and it was recited that the petitioner was declared a girasdar subject to the provisions of s. 18 of the Act, i.e., conditions imposed by the Government of India that he cannot evict tenants, should be incorporated in the notification. In the meanwhile, the petitioner had applied on March 26, 1952, for an order of allotment of "gharkhed land" under s. 19 of the Land Reforms Act read with r. 12. The application was resisted by the tenants, who contended that in the lands in dispute, they held "Chav" rights. They also contended that the petitioner was not a "girasdar" and that in any event he could not evict the tenants. The Mamlatdar negatived the contention of the tenants that they held Chav rights in the village Kharedi. He observed that the notification issued by the Government on July 20, 1954, only disabled the girasdar from evicting any tenant, but when the petitioner was declared a girasdar by the Government "for the purposes of the Land Reforms Act," he was entitled to all the privileges of a girasdar under the provisions of that Act; and that the condition attached to the declaration of status of the girasdar being of a date anterior to the enactment of the Act, only operated to disable the girasdar from evicting the tenants but did not disentitle him to the advantages conferred upon him by the Act. The Mamlatdar then proceeded to award to the petitioner land out of the holdings of four tenants. Those tenants were Kanbi Sava Uka, Kanbi Lala Premji, Kanbi Ruda Bhawan and Kanbi Naran Kala. Against the order passed by the Mamlatdar, an appeal was preferred to the Deputy Collector, Eastern Division, Halar. The Deputy Collector agreed with the view of the Mamlatdar that the tenants were not holding "Chav" rights. He further held that there was a difference between eviction and allotment, and inasmuch as the petitioner was not seeking to evict the tenants by exercising the right as a landlord but was seeking to avail himself of the statutory right created in his favour by virtue of the order of allotment, the restriction imposed by the notification dated January 29, 1954, and amended by notification dated July 20, 1951, was ineffective. The tenants then applied in revision to the Revenue Tribunal against the order passed by the Deputy Collector. The Tribunal disagreed with the view of the Mamlatdar and the Deputy Collector on the effect and interpretation of the notification dated January 29, 1954, as amended, and observed that as the petitioner had knowledge of the restriction imposed under the agreement incorporated in the letter dated November 2, 1949, the agreement was binding upon him, and the lands were allotted to him subject to the conditions which were on his behalf assented to by the Ruler of Virpur. They further observed that the rights in the land granted to the petitioner by his declaration as a girasdar were restricted by conditions which were imposed under the letter dated November 2, 1949, which incorporated the agreement between the Government of India and the Ruler of Virpur and also by the conditions which were imposed under the notification dated January 29, 1954, as amended, and the petitioner was accordingly incompetent to evict the tenants who were entitled to take advantage by virtue of s. 18 of the Land Reforms Act, of the conditions imposed upon the petitioner. They, therefore, held that the petitioner was not entitled to any "gharkhed" land from the tenants whose lands were included in the letter dated November 2, 1949. The Tribunal then proceeded to consider whether the tenants had "Chav" rights; and they agreed with the view of the Mamlatdar and the Deputy Collector on that question. On the view taken by them that the rights of the petitioner were restricted by the grant made to him and by the notification declaring him a girasdar he was not entitled to evict the tenants on allotment in his favour of lands referred to in the letter dated November 2, 1949, the application of the petitioner was dismissed. The petitioner has applied to this Court challenging the correctness of that order under art. 227 of the Constitution.

It is urged by Mr. Baxi on behalf of the petitioner that a girasdar under the Land Reforms Act has a statutory right to get an order of allotment of land for personal cultivation, and the restriction, if any, imposed upon his rights as a landlord vanish when the order of allotment is made in his favour by the Mamlatdar, and that the statutory rights of the girasdar cannot by executive orders of the Government be restricted or limited in the absence of an express provision in the statute authorising the Government in that behalf. In other words, it is urged, that the rights of the tenants in the lands before the enactment of the Land Reforms Act must be regarded as subject to the rights conferred by statute upon the girasdar, and once the Mamlatdar, in exercise of his powers under Chap. IV of the Land Reforms Act, allots any land for personal cultivation to a girasdar, the rights of the tenants in the land are extinguished.

In order to appreciate the contention it may be necessary to refer to certain provisions of the Land Reforms Act of 1951. We have already referred to the definition of the word 'Girasdar' in s. 2(15) of the Act. By s. 3, it is provided that the Act is to override all other laws except as otherwise provided by the Act. By s. 6, the persons who are lawfully cultivating the land belonging to a girasdar are, for the purposes of the Act, to be deemed tenants. By s. 12, provision is made for termination of tenancies. Termination may take place on account of default on the part of a tenant or some act done by him which is destructive or permanently injurious to the land comprised in his holding, or by reason of his sub-letting or using the land for purposes other than agricultural. It is also implicit in s. 12 that tenancy may be determined in accordance with the provisions of Chap. IV which deals with allotment of lands. Section 18, on which reliance has been placed by the Tribunal provides that:

"Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to limit or abridge the rights or privileges of any tenant under any usage or law for the time being in force or arising out of any contract, grant, decree or order of a Court or otherwise howsoever."

Chapter IV deals with allotment of land to a girasdar for personal cultivation. By s. 19 it is provided that any girasdar may, at any time within four months from the date of the commencement of the Saurashtra Land Reforms Act, apply to the Mamlatdar for allotment to him of land for personal cultivation. Section 20 contemplates that an enquiry shall be made by the Mamlatdar on the application of the Girasdar, and authorises that officer to make an order of allotment of land for personal cultivation. Under sub-s. (1), the Mamlatdar is required to issue notice to the tenant or tenants concerned and to give them an opportunity of being heard and to make enquiry in the manner prescribed. By sub-s. (2) it is provided that the Mamlatdar, having due regard to provisions of the Chapter, may pass an order allotting to a girasdar such land as may be specified in the order. By sub-s. (3) it is provided that the Mamlatdar shall issue occupancy certificate to a girasdar in respect to his gharkhed and the land, if any, allotted to him. Then a disability is imposed by sub-s. (4) upon the girasdar. He is prohibited from obtaining possession of any land held by a tenant otherwise than in accordance with an order under sub-s. (3). Section 21 provides, insofar as it is material, that a girasdar of class A or class B shall be allotted land for personal cultivation so that added to the area of his gharkhed estate and of khalsa land, if any, in his possession, the total area does not exceed the prescribed area. The remaining provisions of that Chapter are not material in this application. The scheme of Chap. IV is that a girasdar has a statutory right to obtain land for personal cultivation to the maximum extent permissible under s. 21 and for that purpose he may make an application to the Mamlatdar and obtain an order from that officer allotting to him from his tenant land for personal cultivation. Chapter V deals with acquisition of occupancy rights by a tenant and by s. 28, cl. (1), a tenant is authorised to acquire occupancy rights in his holding on payment of such amount as may be equal to six times the assessment payable in respect of agricultural lands included in his holding, by making an application in the prescribed form to the Mamlatdar. Section 29 contemplates the holding of an enquiry by the Mamlatdar and s. 30 provides for the issue of an occupancy certificate to the tenant. Section 31 sets out the consequences of the issue of an occupancy certificate to a tenant. By cl. (a), a tenant in respect of the holding for which a certificate has been issued, becomes an occupant directly from the State and has all the rights and is subject to all the obligations of an occupant under the Act and under the Code in respect of the holding. Section 32 provides that occupancy certificate issued under s. 30 shall be effective from the date specified therein. There is, however, a proviso to cl. (b) which states that where any agricultural land or any portion thereof is allotted to a girasdar under the provisions contained in Chap. IV, either before or after the date on which an occupancy certificate issued to a tenant in respect of such land or a portion thereof has become effective under this section, the occupancy certificate issued to a tenant in respect of such land or portion thereof shall be deemed to have, and to have always had, no effect whatsoever and certain consequences shall then ensue. Section 50, provides for execution of orders for awarding possession or restoration of possession. The order of the Mamlatdar has to be enforced as if it is a decision of the Mamlatdar under Ordinance No. 52 of 1948. In our judgment the combined effect of the provisions of the Act is that tenants who are in possession of land to which the Act applies are entitled subject to certain exceptions on payment of the amount prescribed by s. 28, to be declared occupants. A girasdar is entitled under the Act to claim certain minimum area as gharkhed land, i.e., land for his personal cultivation: and to the extent to which rights are conferred upon the girasdar by the Act, the protection which is conferred upon the tenants and rights conferred upon them, are restricted.

A girasdar, either when so declared or by virtue of his status as defined in s. 2, cl. (15), may make an application for obtaining an order for allotment of land for personal cultivation. When an order of allotment is made, the rights which the tenants hold in the land, will be extinguished. That is made abundantly clear by the proviso to cl. (b) of s. 32. Section 18, however, provides that the rights of occupancy of the tenants which are acquired under any usage or law for the time being in force or arising out of any contract, grant, decree or order of a Court or otherwise howsoever, are not to be limited or abridged by anything contained in the Act. Prima facie, there may arise a conflict between s. 18 and the effect of the order which the Mamlatdar might pass under s. 20 and the consequences which may ensue by reason of the provisions contained in s. 39. But that conflict, in our judgment, is resolved on the view that the rights which a tenant has and which are not to be limited or abridged, are to be regarded as enforceable so long as the tenancy is subsisting. That view is supported by the provision contained in s. 12. The Legislature has in s. 12 set out the circumstances in which a tenancy may be determined and the procedure for determination of tenancy. Section 12 contemplates determination of tenancies at the instance of the landlords and also by statutory operation. Section 18 cannot be isolated from the other provisions of the Act. It is then reasonable to hold, reading ss. 12 and 18 together, that so long as the tenancy subsists, the rights of tenants are not to be limited or abridged notwithstanding anything contained in the Act. Mr. Baxi is, therefore, right in contending that ordinarily there is a statutory determination of tenancy by virtue of allotment of land to a girasdar. It is clear that from the order of allotment flows the consequence that the girasdar becomes entitled to obtain possession of the land allotted consistently with the order of the Mamlatdar and the girasdar becomes, by virtue of the provisions of s. 39, an occupant of the land, and the rights of the tenants holding that land are extinguished.

But, in our view, in the present case, the rights of the tenants which have been declared under the letter dated November 2, 1949, and further confirmed by the order declaring the petitioner a girasdar on January 29, 1954, as amended by order dated July 20, 1954, must prevail. The petitioner claims to be a grantee from the Ruler of Virpur. During the course of the negotiations for surrender of the former Virpur State, the lands at Kharedi were given to the petitioner by the Ruler in exchange for the lands at Matiya and Gunda. Ultimately an arrangement was arrived at between the Government of India and the Ruler of Virpur whereby the exchange was upheld but subject to the restriction that the grantee was not to evict the tenants. The Revenue Tribunal has found that the petitioner had knowledge of this condition; and if knowing this condition he agreed to accept and continued to accept the benefit which was reserved to him under the Merger Agreement, it is not, in our judgment, open to the petitioner to contend that he is not bound by the condition which was imposed. The condition incorporated in the letter dated November 2, 1949, having been accepted by the petitioner it must enure for the benefit of the tenants for whose benefit it appears to have been imposed. Mr. Baxi urged that even if the authority or right conferred upon the petitioner under the agreement dated November 2, 1949, was restricted, once the Land Reforms Act of 1951 was passed, the rights and obligations of the parties have to be adjudged in the light of the Act and not in the light of the agreement incorporated in the letter. But by the very notification declaring the petitioner a girasdar, the rights of the tenants have been expressly preserved and a disability is imposed upon the petitioner which prevents him from evicting the tenants in the land of which he was declared a girasdar. That declaration also enures for the benefit of the tenants under s. 18 of the Act.

We are unable to accept the argument of Mr. Baxi that it is not open to the Government to impose any restrictions upon the rights of a girasdar. In our judgment, there is nothing in the Act which requires the Government when declaring a landlord a girasdar, not to impose any conditions upon him, or not to declare the extent of the rights of the tenants in the land of which the landlord is declared a girasdar. If by the very terms of the declaration the petitioner was incompetent to terminate the tenancy of tenants of the land of which he is declared a girasdar, we are of the view that he cannot achieve that object by obtaining an order for personal cultivation of the land of tenants who are by tenure, grant or contract protected from eviction. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the Tribunal was right in holding that the land of the tenants who were protected from eviction could not be allotted to the petitioner for personal cultivation. In that view of the case, this application fails and the rule is discharged with costs.

Rule discharged.

KANBI CHHAGAN MANJI v. AHER JIVA MALA.*

Saurashtra Barkhali Abolition Act (XXVI of 1951), Secs. 8(1) & (2)(a),† 10—Tenant deprived of entire or part of land in his possession under s. 8(1)—Whether tenant can pre-empt purchaser of land from barkhalidar—Right of tenant to pre-empt whether conditioned by his being in occupation of land adjacent to land sought to be pre-empted.

A tenant who is deprived of possession of land under s. 8(1) of the Saurashtra Barkhali Abolition Act, 1951, whether it is the entire area of the land in his occupation or a part of the land, may pre-empt a purchaser of the land from the barkhalidar, if the purchase or the lease is within ten years from the date on which the order allotting the land under s. 8(1) of the Act is passed.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

V. G. Hathi and R. C. Trivedi, for the petitioner.

J. R. Nanavaty and S. K. Dodia, for the opponents.

SHAH J. One Sindhi Piru Adam was a barkhalidar of a piece of land ad-measuring 8 acres and 6 gunthas bearing survey Nos. 104 and 480 of Agatarai. The barkhalidar applied to the Mamlatdar under s. 8 of the Saurashtra Barkhali Abolition Act XXVI of 1951, for allotment of land for personal cultivation, and an order was passed allotting to him the entire area of the land, survey Nos. 104 and 480, and the barkhalidar was put in possession thereof. The barkhalidar then sold the land to Aher Jiva Mala and Aher Mulji Gokal. The petitioner, who was a tenant on the land before he was dispossessed in consequence of the allotment, then applied to pre-empt the land sold to opponents Nos. 1 and 2. He claimed to exercise the right conferred upon him by s. 8(2)(a) of the Barkhali Abolition Act. The Mamlatdar granted the application of the petitioner. In appeal to the Deputy Collector, the order passed by the Mamlatdar was confirmed. Against that order, a revision application was filed before the Revenue Tribunal. The three Members who constituted the Revenue Tribunal differed in their ultimate conclusion. Two of the Members were of the view that in order that the right to pre-empt a sale or lease of land by the Barkhalidar can be exercised under s. 8(2)(a), the tenant must establish that he is in possession of a part of the land which was originally occupied by him as a tenant. If with the tenant no land out of his original holding has remained, the right to pre-empt cannot be exercised. The third Member of the Bench was of the view that the object of the Act was to settle bona fide girasdars as well as bona fide tenants on the land, and if the interpretation of the word 'pre-emption' in the Act was given as suggested by the majority of the Bench, that "would fundamentally defeat the purpose of the Act and would have grave and serious implications." He was, therefore, of the view that the order passed by the Mamlatdar and the Deputy Collector should be confirmed. The Revenue Tribunal, in accordance

*Decided, August 12, 1953. Special Civil Application No. 19 of 1958.

†The relevant section runs thus:

8 Allotment of land for personal cultivation.—

(1) A Barkhalidar in whose estate the agricultural land is equal to two economic holdings or less and who is not a Chakariat, Dharmada Institution, or Jivaldar for life, shall be allotted land for personal cultivation in the following manner:—

(a) each of his tenants shall first be given half an economic holding, including any Khalea land in possession of such tenant;

(b) if there remains any Barkhali Land, the Barkhalidar shall be given land to make half an economic holding, including Gharkhed and Khalea Land in his possession, if any;

(c) if there still remains any Barkhali Land, it shall be divided half and half between the Barkhalidar and the tenant.

Provided that the maximum land so allotted shall not exceed one economic holding.

(2) (a) The Barkhalidar in respect of land allotted to him for personal cultivation under sub-section (1), and the tenant in respect of land allowed to remain in his possession under the said sub-section, shall have a mutual right of pre-emption for ten years for lease or sale at a price to be determined by the Mamlatdar under the rules made under this Act.

with the decision of the majority of the Members, set aside the order passed by the Deputy Collector and dismissed the application filed by the petitioner for pre-emption. The petitioner has applied to this Court under art. 227 of the Constitution.

Now the Saurashtra Barkhali Abolition Act of 1951 was passed, as the preamble of the Act states, to "provide for certain measures for the abolition of Barkhali tenure" and "for improvement of the land revenue administration and for agrarian reforms." The object of the Act is to abolish barkhali tenure and to confer upon the tenants the rights of occupancy. By s. 10, right is conferred upon every tenant, after commencement of the Act, to apply to the Mamlatdar for acquiring occupancy rights in respect of his holding. But the Legislature, with a view to make equitable distribution of land between barkholidars and their tenants, has enacted that certain barkholidars possessing small holdings may be allotted land from their tenants for personal cultivation. That provision is to be found in s. 8, sub-s. (1) whereof provides that a barkholidar in whose estate the agricultural land is equal to two economic holdings or less and who is not a Chakariat, Dharmada institution, or Jivaidar for life, shall be allotted land for personal cultivation in the following manner:— (a) each of his tenants shall first be given half an economic holding, including any khalsa land in possession of such tenant; (b) if there remains any barkhali land, the barkholidar shall be given land to make up half an economic holding, including gharkhed and khalsa land in his possession, if any; (c) if there still remains any barkhali land, it shall be divided half and half between the barkholidar and the tenant. Evidently, this sub-section applies only in a case where the holding of a barkholidar is two economic holdings or less. By sub-s. (2), cl. (a), a right exercisable within ten years (of allotment or the issue of occupancy certificate) to pre-empt a sale or lease is conferred. We must confess that the phraseology which the Legislature has chosen to use is somewhat ungrammatical and inappropriate and appears more to conceal its import than to express it. Sub-section (2), cl. (a), provides that the barkholidar in respect of land allotted to him for personal cultivation under sub-s. (1), and the tenant in respect of land allowed to remain in his possession under the said sub-section, shall have a mutual right of pre-emption for ten years for lease or sale at a price to be determined by the Mamlatdar under the rules made in that behalf by the Act. We find it difficult to ascertain the precise implication of the expressions "in respect of" and "shall have a mutual right of". It was urged by Mr. Nanavaty, who appears on behalf of the transferees from the barkholidar, that the Legislature intended to confer upon the barkholidar, who has possession of land allotted to him for personal cultivation and the tenant who is allowed to remain in possession of the land under sub-s. (1), a right to pre-empt a sale or lease of land which is part of or is contiguous to the land allotted to the Barkholidar or allowed to remain in the possession of the tenant. In other words, it is urged, that if out of a unit of land a part is allotted under s. 8 to the barkholidar and the balance remains with the tenant, on sale or lease of the holding the transferee from the barkholidar or the tenant may be pre-empted for the benefit of the remaining land of the tenant or the barkholidar. However for so construing, sub-s. (1) may have to be entirely re-written, and several clauses added thereto. Again there is nothing in the provision either express or implied which supports the view that the right of pre-emption can be exercised only by a contiguous owner. Evidently, the sub-section confers the right of pre-emption both upon a barkholidar and a tenant. The section may be divided into its two component parts: (1) the barkholidar, in respect of the land allotted to him for personal cultivation under sub-s. (1), shall have a right of pre-emption for lease or sale, and (2) the tenant, in respect of the land allowed to remain in his possession under the said sub-section, shall have a right of pre-emption for lease or sale. If the barkholidar is given a right of pre-emption for the benefit of the land allotted to him for personal cultivation, the first question which springs to mind is "in respect of what land is the right of pre-emption to be exercised"; and the Legislature does not appear to have furnished an answer or even a clue to that question. Similarly, on the interpretation by Mr. Nanavaty, if the tenant allowed to remain in possession of the land under sub-s. (1) is given the right of pre-emption for the benefit of land remaining in his occupation, we are completely left in the dark as to the land on which such right of pre-emption is to be exercised. The expression "in respect of" is obscure in its import; and we are unable to appreciate the implication of the expression "shall have mutual right of pre-emption...for lease or sale" in the context in which it occurs. It appears, however, having regard to the scheme of the Act, that the Legislature intended that there should be equitable distribution of land on the abolition of barkhali tenure and that the barkhalidars' tenants be made occupants of the lands in their possession subject to the right of certain small-scale barkhalidars to claim land for personal cultivation. The Legislature also intended that if within ten years, the barkhalidar who has obtained possession of land from the tenant for personal cultivation or the tenant who has been allowed to remain in possession of the land under sub-s. (1), transfers the same by lease or sale the other party interested in the land shall have a right to pre-empt such lease or sale, and the exercise of the right of pre-emption is not conditioned by the pre-emptor being in occupation of the land adjacent to the land sought to be pre-empted. In our judgment there is nothing in sub-s. (2) which supports the view that the right which a tenant has for pre-empting a sale or lease by a barkhalidar is restricted to those cases in which the tenant is allowed to remain in possession of land adjacent to the land to be pre-empted. We, therefore, hold that a tenant who is deprived of possession of land under sub-s. (1) whether it is the entire area of the land in his occupation or a part of the land, may pre-empt a purchaser of the land from the barkhalidar, if the purchase or the lease is within ten years from the date on which the order allotting the land under sub-s. (1) is passed. On that view of the case, the order passed by the Revenue Tribunal will be set aside and the order passed by the Deputy Collector restored with costs in this Court.

Application allowed.

"THE CLUB", MAHABALESHWAR v. THE MUNICIPALITY OF MAHABALESHWAR.*

Bombay District Municipal Act (Bom. III of 1901), Sec. 59(1)(xi)—Mahabaleshwar Municipality, Rules & By-laws, r. 1—Municipality under rule providing for levy of tax on hotels, boarding houses, eating houses, restaurants, tea or coffee houses and other places where food, meals, drinks etc. provided on payment of money—Municipality seeking to recover such tax from private members' club—Whether such club a hotel within meaning of rule—Expression "other places" whether means places where public or section thereof has access—Club whether liable under rule to pay tax.

Under a rule framed by a municipality under s. 59(1)(xi) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, the municipality provided for the levy of "a tax in respect of all hotels, boarding houses, eating houses, restaurants, tea or coffee-houses and other places where food, meals, refreshments, tea, coffee or other non-intoxicating drinks are provided on payment of money." The municipality under this rule claimed to levy the tax on an unincorporated private members' club, the property and funds of which belonged to the members for the time being jointly in equal shares, contending that the club was an hotel or that it was covered by the expression "other places etc." appearing in the aforesaid rule:—

Held, that the two elements to constitute an hotel viz. access thereto by the public or a section thereof and supply of articles constituting meals and drinks for a price being absent in the present case, the club was not an hotel within the meaning of the rule framed by the municipality:

*Decided, August 30/ September 2, 1958. Special Civil Application No. 1420 of 1958.

Railway Assessment Authority v. Great Western Railway Co.¹ and Graff v. Evans,² referred to;

that the expression "other places" which follow upon the words "all hotels, boarding houses, eating houses, restaurants, tea or coffee houses" must be interpreted as words describing a place falling within the same genus viz. a place where the public or a section thereof has access, and, therefore, the club falls outside the ambit of the rule, and that, therefore, the club was not liable to pay any tax under the rule.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

Y. V. Chandrachud, Government Pleader, for the petitioner.

M. A. Rane, with C. B. Dalvi, for the respondents.

K. T. DESAI J. The petitioner is a private Club at Mahabaleshwar. The premises of the Club are situate within the municipal limits of the Mahabaleshwar Municipality. Under the provisions of s. 59 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, the Mahabaleshwar Municipality has a right, subject to the sanction of the Commissioner, of levying taxes. Clause (xi) of sub-s. (1) of s. 59 provides that the municipality may levy

"any other tax (not being a toll on motor vehicles and trailers, save as provided by section 14 of the Bombay Motor Vehicles Tax Act, 1935):"

In exercise of the powers conferred by the Bombay District Municipal Act, the Municipality has framed rules levying certain taxes. Rule 1 so framed runs as follows:—

"The municipality shall levy a tax in respect of all hotels, boarding houses, eating houses, restaurants, tea or coffee houses and other places where food, meals, refreshments, tea, coffee or other non-intoxicating drinks are provided on payment of money."

The municipality of Mahabaleshwar, respondent No. 1 before us, contended that "The Club" at Mahabaleshwar was an hotel or that, in any event, it was a place where food, meals, refreshments, tea, coffee or other non-intoxicating drinks were provided on payment of money within the meaning of the aforesaid rule, and claimed to levy the tax on "The Club". "The Club" paid such tax for several years. For the years 1956-57 and 1957-58 "The Club" refused to pay such tax, contending that "The Club" was neither an hotel nor a place where food, meals, refreshments, tea, coffee or other non-intoxicating drinks were provided on payment of money as required under the aforesaid r. 1. The municipality has sought to recover the said tax by coercive process available to the municipality under the Bombay District Municipal Act. "The Club" has thereupon filed the petition, which is now before us, for the issue of a writ of mandamus or a writ in the nature of mandamus or other appropriate writ, direction or order under art. 226 of the Constitution of India restraining the municipality of Mahabaleshwar and its President and the successor in office of the President, their servants and agents from levying and/or collecting and/or recovering from the petitioners any tax called or like the "hotel tax". The petitioner has also prayed that the respondents be directed to refund to the petitioner the tax for the year 1955-56 which, it was alleged, had been wrongly recovered by the respondents from the petitioner. The latter prayer, however, has not been pressed by the learned Government Pleader who appears for the petitioner.

The main question before us is the question relating to the true construction of rule No. 1 quoted above. That rule provides, inter alia, for a levy of tax in respect of all hotels. The expression "hotel" has been defined in the rules and by-laws framed by the municipality. The definition, as it existed at the relevant time, was as follows:

"Hotel means and includes a Boarding House and any place or eating house where strangers, travellers or other persons are provided with meals and drinks for a price." It is urged by the learned advocate for the respondents that "The Club" is an hotel within the meaning of this definition, as travellers or other persons are provided with meals and drinks for a price at the premises of "The Club." He says that every person who goes to Mahabaleshwar for a change is a traveller and that as such traveller he is provided with meals and drinks at "The Club" for a price and that "The Club" is an hotel. The expression "traveller" is applicable to a person whilst he is travelling from one place to another. The moment he reaches his destination, he ceases to be a traveller. People from various places go to Mahabaleshwar for a change and they stay at Mahabaleshwar for a shorter or a longer period. Once they reach Mahabaleshwar and stay at Mahabaleshwar, it is difficult to apply the expression "traveller" to them. The expression "traveller" as used in the definition in connection with an hotel cannot possibly apply to such persons.

It is then urged that the expression "other persons" would equally cover them. Now, the words "other persons" are preceded by the words "strangers, travellers". If the expression "other persons" was intended to cover any and every person other than a stranger or a traveller, there would have been nothing simpler for those framing the rules than to say that an hotel would mean and include any place where any person is provided with meals and drinks for a price. If the expression "other persons" had such a wide meaning, the use of the words "strangers, travellers" preceding them would have been superfluous. In the context in which the expression "other persons" has been used, it cannot include members of a private Club or the guests of such members who are entitled to be served with food or drink under the rules provided for by the Club. That expression is intended to refer to the public or any section thereof which has access to the places referred to in the rule.

In connection with this question, it may not be out of place to refer to a decision of the House of Lords in *Railway Assessment Authority v. Great Western Railway Co.*¹ The question that arose for consideration in that case was whether a railway canteen constituted a "railway hereditament" within the meaning of s. 1, sub-s. (3) of the Railways (Valuation for Rating) Act, 1930. That section provided as under:—

"For the purposes of this Act...Railway hereditament means, subject as hereinafter provided, any hereditament occupied for the purposes of the undertaking of a railway company; Provided that no premises occupied as a dwelling house, hotel or place of public refreshment, or so let out as to be capable of separate assessment, shall be deemed to be, or to form part of a railway hereditament."

Dealing with the argument that the railway canteen constituted an hotel, Lord Thankerton in his speech observes at p. 238 as follows:—

"...An hotel, in my opinion, connotes a building in which an hotel business is carried on, to which the public are entitled to resort for accommodation and refreshment, and to which the edict 'nautes caupones' would apply."

This decision shows that access to the public is an essential requirement in order to constitute a place an hotel.

The other requirement which has to be satisfied before a place can fall under the definition of the word "hotel" is that meals and drinks are provided for a price thereat. When a Club supplies meals and drinks to a member, the question arises whether that is a supply made for a price. The transactions that take place when a Club supplies food or drink to its members came up for consideration before an English Court in the case of *Graff v. Evans*². In that case the Court had to consider the question whether a members' private club did not "sell by retail" intoxicating liquors within the meaning of s. 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872, when it supplied to its members such liquors for consumption on and off the premises of the club at fixed prices, the same being 33 per cent. above the cost price. Field J. at p. 378 of that case observes as follows:—

"...I think the true construction of the rules is that the members were the joint owners of the general property in all the goods of the club, and that the trustees were their agents with respect to the general property in the goods, although they had other agents with respect to special properties in some of the goods... It appears to me immaterial whether the sum a member pays for the liquor is equal to or more or less than the cost price. The transaction does not become the more or the less a sale on that account. It cannot be the true view that if the member pays a sum exactly equal to the cost price there is no sale within the section, but that if he pays more than the cost price there is... A sale involves the element of a bargain. There was no bargain here, nor any contract with Graff (the Manager of the club) with respect to the goods. Foster was acting upon his rights as a member of the club, not by reason of any new contract, but under his old contract of association by which he subscribed a sum to the funds of the club, and became entitled to have ale and whisky supplied to him as a member at a certain price. I cannot conceive it possible that Graff could have sued him for the price as the price of goods sold and delivered. There was no contract between two persons, because Foster was vendor as well as buyer. Taking the transaction to be a purchase by Foster of all the other members' shares in the goods, Foster was as much a co-owner as the vendor. I think it was a transfer of a special property in the goods to Foster, which was not a sale within the meaning of the section."

1 [1948] A. C. 234.

2 (1882) 8 Q. B. D. 373.

The Club at Mahabaleshwar is an unincorporated members' club. In dealing with such clubs, it has been stated in Halsbury's Laws of England, Third edn., Vol. No. V, p. 254, para. 590 as follows:—

"The rights and duties of the members of such a club as between themselves, and the internal arrangements for carrying it on, depend upon the rules. Subject to any rule to the contrary, the property and funds of the club belong to the members for the time being jointly in equal shares; and if provisions are supplied to a member, at a given price, this does not constitute a sale; it is in effect a release by the other members of their interest in the goods supplied."

The principles enunciated above in Halsbury's Laws of England are equally applicable in India.

So far as the rules of the petitioner Club are concerned, they do not contain any provision to the contrary, and the property and funds of "The Club" would belong to the members for the time being jointly in equal shares. A member has an interest in the meals and drinks supplied to him by the club and has an interest in the monies which he pays to the club for the supply of such meals and drinks. It is clear from what is stated above that so far as "The Club" at Mahabaleshwar is concerned, it cannot be said that meals and drinks are supplied by the Club to its members for a price within the meaning of the definition of the expression "hotel" as given in the rules and by-laws framed by the Mahabaleshwar Municipality.

The two elements necessary to constitute an hotel viz. (i) access thereto by the public or a section thereof and (ii) supply of articles constituting meals and drinks for a price are absent in the present case. The municipality itself has not treated this Club as an hotel for the purposes of s. 48(1)(b) (iia) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901. The definition of the expression "hotel" referred to above is made applicable in connection with the by-laws framed under s. 48 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901. Under s. 48 it is provided as follows:—

"48. (1) Every municipality may from time to time with the previous sanction in the case of City Municipalities, of the State Government or in other cases of the Commissioner, make, alter or recind by-laws, but not so as to render them inconsistent with this Act,...

(b) prescribing the conditions on or subject to which, and the circumstances, in which, and the areas or localities in respect of which, licences may be granted, refused, suspended or withdrawn for the use of any place not belonging to the municipality;...

(iia) as a hotel, eating house, tea or coffee shop, restaurant, dining saloon, refreshment room or for a like purpose."

In the exercise of the powers conferred under the said section, the municipality has with the sanction of the Commissioner framed by-laws. By-law No. 1 lays down that no premises within the municipal limits shall be used as an hotel or restaurant without a licence from the President. No such licence has ever been required from "The Club", even though the definition of the expression "hotel" within the meaning of the said by-law is the same as the one applicable in the case of rule No. 1 referred to by me earlier. In our view, "The Club" is not an hotel within the meaning of r. 1.

It is next urged that even if "The Club" is not an hotel, it would be covered by the expression "and other places where food, meals, refreshments, tea, coffee or other non-intoxicating drinks are provided on payment of money," appearing in r. 1. It is urged that the expression "other places" was intended to cover each and every place where food, meals, refreshments, tea, coffee or other non-intoxicating drinks were provided on payment of money. On behalf of the petitioner the learned Government Pleader contended that the expression "other places" appearing in that rule should be construed ejusdem generis having regard to the words "hotels, boarding houses, eating houses, restaurants, tea or coffee houses" which precede it. Reliance was placed on Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 10th edn., p. 337. It is there stated as under:—

"But the general word which follows particular and specific words of the same nature as itself takes its meaning from them, and is presumed to be restricted to the same genus as those words. In other words, it is to be read as comprehending only things of the same kind as those designated by them, unless, of course, there be something to show that a wider sense was intended, as, for instance, a proviso specifically excepting certain classes clearly not within the suggested genus."

The words which precede viz. "all hotels, boarding houses, eating houses, restaurants, tea or coffee houses" belong to one genus viz. a place where the public or a section thereof has access. When the expression "other places" follows upon these words, these words must be interpreted as words describing a place falling within the same genus viz. a place where the public or a section thereof has access. If the words are so interpreted, "The Club" clearly falls outside the ambit of the rule. The rules framed by the municipality throw some light on what was intended. Rule 2 which immediately follows r. 1 provides as follows:—

"The tax shall be assessed at rates given in rule 3 on the annual rental actually paid or where no rent is paid on the annual rental value of the place used as a hotel." This rule indicates that all the places referred to in r. 1 are regarded as covered by the expression "hotel". It cannot be disputed that an hotel is a place where the public or a section thereof has access. The rule relating to assessment, which is r. No. 8, provides as under:—

"Assessment shall be made according to the following scale:

- | | | |
|---|----|-------|
| (a) For an annual rental actual or estimated of Rs. 50 to 100 | .. | Rs. 7 |
| (b) For every additional Rs. 100 of the rental | .. | Rs. 8 |

Provided that if after applying clause (b) above, the remainder of the rental value is below Rs. 50 it shall be neglected and if it is Rs. 50 or above, it shall be taken as Rs. 100 and tax levied."

These rules show that the intention of the Mahabaleshwar Municipality in framing these rules was to tax hotels, and tax them at a rate of assessment dependent upon the annual rental of the place. The municipality has itself referred to this tax as 'Hotel tax' in the municipal bill, which is annexed as exh. No. 1 to the affidavit of S. S. Dighe, Secretary of "The Club". That bill shows the name of the tax as "Hotel Tax" and the amount sought to be recovered under that head is Rs. 639 being the amount claimed in respect whereof the petitioner has come before us. Even in the letter of demand, dated April 11, 1958, addressed by the President of the Mahabaleshwar Municipality which is annexed as exh. No. 2 to the said affidavit, the tax is referred to as "Hotel Tax". Much value cannot be attached to the use of the expression "Hotel Tax" by the municipality, if the tax was in reality a tax not merely on hotels but on other places like the Club at Mahabaleshwar. The intendment of the rule appears to be that only places where the public or a section thereof has access were sought to be taxed, and recognition to that idea has been given by the municipality itself by dubbing the tax as "Hotel Tax" in the printed bills and in the letter of demand. In para. 9 of the petition; it has been stated as follows:—

"A mere cursory reading of the rules and by-laws of the petitioner club will show that the public generally have no right of access to the club. The club is conducted not with a view or desire to do business but merely with the object of satisfying the social needs of its members. In fact, the petitioner club does not do or carry on any business. The petitioner submits that as the entry to the club is not open to the public generally and as the club does not carry on business, it is not a 'Hotel' and is therefore not liable to pay the 'hotel tax'."

The statement that the public do not have any right of access to the Club has not been controverted in the affidavit in reply. The only thing stated in para. 4 of the affidavit in reply is as follows:—

"...the petitioner provides its members and their guests food, meals, refreshments, tea, coffee and other non-intoxicating drinks for a price. The petitioner therefore is covered by the rules and bye-laws and is liable to pay the tax."

Strong reliance has been placed by the learned advocate for the respondents on some of the by-laws of the petitioner Club. By-law 38 provides as follows:—

"38. All meals shall be served in the dining or breakfast room only, provided that a member may have chota hazri and tea served in his room likewise a member who is ill may also have his meals served in his room."

By-laws 40, 41 and 42 are as follows:—

"40. The messing charges inclusive of chota hazri, breakfast, lunch, tea and dinner shall be as fixed by the Committee season by season and notified in separate 'Scale of charges'...

41. The charge for single meals shall be:

						Rs.	a.	p.
Chhota hazri	..	..	..	..	..	0	12	0
Breakfast	..	..	..	..	..	2	8	0
Lunch	..	..	..	..	..	4	0	0
Afternoon tea	..	..	..	..	..	1	0	0
Dinner	..	..	..	..	..	5	0	0

Special dinner, from Rs. 6-8-0 upwards according to the menu ordered.

42. A member entertaining a guest to a meal will pay in addition to above rates, a table fee of four annas per head for reserving a private table. An extra charge of Re. 1-0-0 per head will also be made unless 12 hours notice in writing is given to the Secretary."

By-law 45, which deals with guests, runs as follows:—

"45. A member may entertain guests at breakfast, lunch or dinner, and he shall give notice in writing of his intention to do so at least twelve hours before the entertainment..."

These by-laws, it is urged, show that refreshments, tea, coffee and meals can be had on payment of money and that as these could be had on payment of money, the place where these things are obtainable is one covered by rule No. 1. Reliance was also placed on by-laws Nos. 61 and 62. By-law No. 61 runs as follows:—

"61. A member is permitted to purchase stores, wines, spirits or tobacco to be consumed on or off the premises, provided that the Committee may at any time, without assigning any reason, stop the supply to any member or to all members."

By-law No. 62 runs as follows:—

"62. The Honorary Secretary is authorised on behalf of the Club, to undertake outside contracts for catering at At Homes, weddings, parties or other entertainments, at charges to be fixed from time to time by the Committee..."

It is urged that by-laws No. 61 and 62 show that the Club carries on the business of sale of stores and that it carries on the business of catering. We have been informed by the learned Government Pleader on behalf of "The Club" that in fact during the course of its existence, the Club has never undertaken any catering contract for any person other than a member. The rules, no doubt, provide that the members would be supplied with food and drink at the charges therein set out. The question still remains whether such a supply on payment of charges is a supply "on payment of money" within the meaning of r. No. 1. It is not necessary for the purpose of the present petition to determine that point in view of the fact that we hold that the supply that is being made is only to the members of the club and to their guests and not to the public or any section thereof. Even when any supply is made to the guests, a member has to pay for it, and a guest is not permitted under the rules to make any payment in connection therewith.

Rule No. 1 is a rule which imposes a tax. It is well-established that statutes which impose pecuniary burdens are subject to the rule of strict construction. In Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 10th edn., it is stated at p. 288 as follows:—

"It is a well-settled rule of law that all charges upon the subject must be imposed by clear and unambiguous language, because in some degree they operate as penalties. The subject is not to be taxed unless the language of the statute clearly imposes the obligation. In a Taxing Act one has to look merely at what is clearly said. There is no room for any intendment. There is no equity about a tax. There is no presumption as to a tax. Nothing is to be read in, nothing is to be implied. One can only look fairly at the language used."

On a fair reading of the rule, it is clear that it was not intended to apply to a place where the public or a section thereof has no access.

As the element of access to the public or any section thereof is absent in the case of the petitioner, the petitioner is not liable to pay any tax under r. No. 1 of the rules under which the municipality claims to levy and recover the tax from the petitioner.

In view of our judgment, the petitioner is entitled to the issue of a writ of mandamus requiring the respondents and the successor in office of respondent No. 2, their servants and agents to forbear from levying and/or collecting and/or recovering from the petitioner any tax under rule No. 1 of the rules framed by respondent No. 1 municipality under s. 59 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, and we order accordingly. Respondents to pay to the petitioner the costs of the petition.

Application allowed.

MOBARIK ALI AHMED v. THE STATE OF BOMBAY.*

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), Secs. 2, 3, 4, 34, 420—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Secs. 179, 5(1)—Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), Secs. 16 III. (b), 88—Foreigner committing offences within India though corporeally present outside India at time of offence—Whether Indian Penal Code applies to such person—Exercise of criminal jurisdiction whether dependent on locality of offence or nationality of offender—Authorship of document whether can be proved by contents of the document—Whether permissible to construe Indian Penal Code in accordance with notions of criminal jurisdiction prevalent when Code enacted—How far legitimate to construe Code with reference to modern needs.

Under s. 2 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, the Code applies to a foreigner who has committed an offence within India notwithstanding that he was corporeally present outside India at the time of the commission of the offence.

The meaning of the phrase "every person" in s. 2 of the Indian Penal Code is that it comprehends all persons without limitation and irrespective of nationality, allegiance, rank, status, caste, colour or creed. The section must be understood as comprehending every person without exception barring such as may be specially exempt from criminal proceedings or punishment thereunder by virtue of the Constitution (see art. 361(2) of the Constitution of India) or any statutory provisions or some well-recognised principle of international law, such as foreign sovereigns, ambassadors, diplomatic agents and so forth, accepted in the municipal law.

Exercise of criminal jurisdiction depends on the locality of the offence and not on the nationality of the alleged offender except in a few specified cases such as ambassadors, Princes etc.

The fastening of criminal liability on a foreigner in respect of culpable acts or omissions in India which are juridically attributable to him notwithstanding that he is corporeally present outside India at the time, is not to give any extra-territorial operation to the law; for it is in respect of an offence whose locality is in India, that the liability is fastened on the person and the punishment is awarded by the law, if his presence in India for trial can be secured.

It is implicit in s. 3 of the Indian Penal Code that a foreigner who commits an offence within India is guilty and can be punished as such without any limitation as to his corporeal presence in India at the time.

Macleod v. Attorney-General for New South Wales,¹ S. S. Lotus,² The Queen v. Keyn,³ *Croft v. Dunphy*⁴ and Governor-General v. Raleigh Investment,⁵ referred to.

The authorship of a document may be proved by internal evidence afforded by the contents of the document. This mode of proof may be of considerable value where the disputed document purports to be a link in a chain of correspondence, some links in which are proved to the satisfaction of the Court. In such a situation the person who is the recipient of the document, be it either a letter or a telegram, would be in a reasonably good position both with reference to his prior knowledge of the writing or the signature of the alleged sender, limited though it may be, as also his knowledge of the subject-matter of the chain of correspondence, to speak of its authorship. In an appropriate case the Court may also be in a position to judge whether the document constitutes a genuine link in the chain of correspondence and thus to determine its authorship.

Illustration (b) to s. 16 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, only means that each one of the facts mentioned therein (the fact that a letter was posted in due course and the fact that it was not returned through the Dead Letter Office) is relevant. It cannot be read as indicating that without a combination of these facts no presumption of the receipt of the letter by the addressee can arise.

Although under s. 88 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, no presumption can be drawn as to the person who delivered the message for transmission, the contents of the message received, in the context of the chain of correspondence may furnish proof of authorship of the message at the dispatching end.

Where the charge against the accused is under s. 420 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, but the actual findings support a conviction of the accused under s. 420 of the Code, the conviction of the accused under s. 420 would be valid unless prejudice is shown to have occurred.

*Willie (William) Slaney v. The State of Madhya Pradesh*⁶ and Shreekanth Ramayya Muntipalli v. The State of Bombay,⁷ referred to.

It is not permissible to construe the Indian Penal Code at the present day in accordance with the notions of criminal jurisdiction prevailing at the time when the Code was enacted. It is legitimate to construe the Code with reference to the modern needs, wherever this is permissible, unless there is anything in the Code or in any particular section to indicate the contrary.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

A. P. Gandhi and J. B. Dadachanji, for the appellant.

H. J. Umrigar and R. H. Dhebar, for the respondent.

JAGANNADHADAS J. This is an appeal by special leave. The appellant before us was convicted by the learned Presidency Magistrate, Third Court, Esplanade, Bombay, for the offence of cheating under s. 420 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code on three counts of cheating viz., the first relating to a sum of Rs. 81,000, the second relating to a sum of Rs. 2,30,000, and the third relating to a sum of Rs. 2,36,900. He was sentenced by the learned Magistrate to two years rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 1,000 on the first count, to twenty-two months rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 1,000, on the second count, and two months rigorous imprisonment on the third count. It was directed that the substantive sentences only on the second and third counts are to run concurrently.

The prosecution was initiated on a private complaint filed by one Luis Antonio Correa on June 30, 1952, against four persons of whom the appellant was designated therein as the first accused and one Santram as the fourth accused and two other persons, A. A. Rowji and S. A. Rowji, as second and third accused respectively. Bailable warrants were issued against all the four by the learned Magistrate, but it appears that warrants could not be executed against accused Nos. 2, 3 and 4. They were reported as absconding. The trial was accordingly separated as against them and proceeded only as against (accused No. 1) the appellant herein. The convictions and sentences have been confirmed on appeal by the High Court at Bombay.

The complainant is a business man from Goa and was the Director of a firm in Goa which was trading in the name of Colonial Limitada doing business in import and export. At the relevant time there was severe scarcity of rice in Goa. The complainant was accordingly anxious to import rice urgently into Goa. He got into touch with a friend of his by name Rosario Carvalho in Bombay who was doing business as a Commission Agent. Carvalho in his turn got into touch with one Jasawalla who was also doing business of Commission Agent at Bombay in the name of Universal Supply Corporation. This Jasawalla was previously in correspondence with the appellant about business in rice. The appellant was at the time in Karachi and was doing business in the name of Atlas Industrial and Trading Corporation and also in the name of Ifthiar Ahmed & Co. The telegraphic address of the complainant was Colodringco and that of the appellant was Ifthy. As a result of exchange of telegrams, letters and telephone messages between Jasawalla and the appellant on one side, and Jasawalla and the complainant on the other, followed up by direct contacts between the appellant and the complainant through telephone, telegrams and letters, a contract was brought about for purchase, by the complainant from the appellant, of 1,200 tons of rice at the rate of £ 51 per ton, to be shipped from Karachi to Goa. The contract appears originally to have been for payment of the price in sterling at Karachi. But it is the prosecution case (which has been accepted by both the Courts below) that a subsequent arrangement was arrived at between the parties by which the payment was to be made in Bombay in Indian currency, in view of the difficulties experienced in opening a letter of credit in a Bank at Karachi through the Portuguese Bank at Goa. It is also the prosecution case, which has been accepted, that the understanding was that 25 per cent of the price was to be paid as advance by the complainant to Jasawalla as the agent of the appellant for this purpose and that on receiving intimation thereof the appellant was to ship the rice and that the balance of the purchase money was to be paid on presentation of the shipping documents. It appears that at a later stage the quantity of rice to be supplied was raised to 2,000 tons and advance to be paid to 50 per cent. of the total stipulated price. It is also the prosecution case that the appellant represented at various stages by telephone talks, telegrams and letters, to Jasawalla as well as to the complainant directly that he had adequate stock of rice and that he had reserved shipping space in certain steamers which were about to leave for Goa and that he was in a position to ship the rice on being satisfied that the requisite advance was paid. It is in evidence that on receiving such assurances, the complainant paid moneys as shown below to Jasawalla and obtained receipts from him, purporting to be the agent of the appellant.

- | | | |
|-----------------------|-------|--------------|
| 1. On July 23, 1951 | | Rs. 81,000 |
| 2. On August 28, 1951 | | Rs. 2,30,000 |
| 3. On August 29, 1951 | | Rs. 2,36,900 |

All these amounts are held to have been received by the appellant in due course. It is admitted, however, that no rice was in fact shipped to the complainant and the amounts have not been returned back to the complainant. The defence of the appellant is to the effect that the amounts were not in fact paid to any person who was his agent and not in fact received by him at all and that he was unable to supply the rice as the complainant did not comply with the terms of the contract by opening a letter of credit at Karachi or paying him in Pakistani currency. This defence has not been accepted and the appellant has been found guilty as charged by the Courts below. He was, therefore, convicted and sentenced as above stated.

It is necessary to set out somewhat in detail the essential facts held to have been proved by the Courts below to appreciate the legal contentions that have been urged before us. As previously stated, the complainant got into touch with his friend Carvalho of Bombay to help him in getting rice for consumption in Goa and Carvalho in turn contacted Jasawalla for the purpose. Before that time, Jasawalla, in the course of his usual business, had received a letter, exh. O, dated June 5, 1951, from the appellant offering that he would be prepared to do business in rice if a letter of credit is opened or cash payment is made in Karachi. Carvalho came to know of this from Jasawalla and informed the complainant. Jasawalla also wrote a letter to the complainant. The complainant sent a telegram showing his willingness to open credit, if 1,200 tons of rice could be shipped to Goa. Jasawalla wrote a letter, exh. P, dated June 6, 1951, to the appellant quoting the telegram of the complainant and asking for an offer. The appellant by his letter dated June 10 to Jasawalla, offered to supply as much rice as he wanted and demanded 25 per cent. cash payment as advance. After some tripartite correspondence, the appellant by his letter dated June 26, agreed to accept money in Bombay, at the price of £ 51 per ton of rice. Jasawalla by telegram dated July 5, 1951, informed the appellant that the Goa party accepted the 25 per cent. arrangement. The appellant by a letter dated July 7, accepted the offer but wanted 50 per cent. deposit and gave time till the 10th, suggesting that since the rice was scarce the deal must be finished at once. Jasawalla intimated this to the complainant and asked him to start at once with money and informed him that if there was delay the party at the other end would claim damages. The appellant did not get any information for the next few days. He accordingly sent one Santram (accused No. 4 in the complaint) to Bombay as his agent for discussing the matter in question and authorising him to fix the deal on the spot. Santram appears to have fixed the bargain for shipping 1,200 tons of rice on the complainant paying an advance sum of Rs. 1,50,000 at Bombay as 25 per cent. deposit towards the price of the said 1,200 tons of rice. On receipt of this information the appellant wrote a letter dated July 12, to Jasawalla wherein he confirmed the arrangement arrived at by Santram. Jasawalla was thereupon taken by Santram to accused Nos. 2 and 3. They were introduced to him as the agents of the appellant who were to receive the moneys in this transaction on appellant's behalf. At the same time the appellant was also writing letters to Jasawalla which seem to indicate that he was trying to shift his position by asking for 50 per cent. as advance deposit. For a few days thereafter the complainant did not turn up at Bombay with the funds and the appellant by his telegram dated July 16, asked Jasawalla why there was no further information about the transaction. By a telegram dated July 17, he informed Jasawalla that s.s. Olinda was sailing in a few days and that it would be too late to ship the rice and that the matter should be hurried up. On July 18, the complainant sent a telegram to Jasawalla informing him that he was coming with funds and that if the rice was not shipped it may be shipped by s.s. Olinda which was about to start on July 21. The appellant also sent a telegram to Jasawalla on July 18, asking why the deal was not coming on and that he had already reserved space by the steamer of the 21st. On July 19 again Jasawalla received a telegram from the appellant informing him definitely that space was reserved in the steamer. The complainant also sent a telegram to Jasawalla on the same day informing him that he was coming and that at least 500 tons must be shipped at once. The complainant arrived at Bombay on July 20. The indent, exh. A, was prepared in triplicate and signed by the complainant on the same day. The complainant brought cheques and drafts to the tune of Rs. 81,000. It would appear that at this stage the complainant was asking that he should be allowed (for the time being) to deposit only Rs. 50,000 as deposit for a shipment of 500 tons. But appellant insisted that Rs. 1,50,000 should be paid as advance for 1,200 tons. On or about July 21, the appellant sent a letter to Jasawalla with a pro-forma receipt for Rs. 1,50,000 signed by him to be made use of by Jasawalla in whatever manner he thought proper in connection with the transaction then under way. The said receipt was shown to the complainant who was shown also the other correspondence that was received from the appellant. Jasawalla by his letter dated July 22, to the appellant confirmed the shipment of the deal of 1,200 tons of rice and intimated that some portion of the money was immediately ready and some portion would be brought in a day or two, totalling over Rs. 80,000 and that the balance would be paid after hearing about shipment of 1,200 tons. This was agreed to by the appellant. On July 23, Jasawalla telephoned to the appellant that he was going to pay the money to accused No. 2 as directed by the appellant. In the afternoon of that very day the parties went to the office of accused No. 2 and there was again a further conversation on the phone with the appellant who, on the phone, conveyed the assurance that payment to accused No. 2 would be as good as payment to himself. The complainant and Carvalho were hearing both the morning and afternoon talks between the appellant and Jasawalla, on a second line. Thereupon the complainant paid the sum of Rs. 81,000 to Jasawalla who passed a receipt (exh. B) therefor on behalf of the appellant and the said amount was passed on to accused No. 2. The fact of this payment was intimated to the appellant by telephone as well as by a telegram. A letter was also written on July 24 to the appellant referring to the telephone calls and telegram and informing him that the amount was paid. He was also asked therein to ship the rice at once promising that the balance will be paid in a week. On July 23 itself the appellant sent a telegram saying that he had received the messages and was trying to book 1,000 tons. According to the prosecution case the appellant having received the sum of Rs. 81,000 as above, changed his front from July 24, 1951. The facts held to have been proved in respect of this change of front may now be stated.

On July 24, 1951, the appellant sent to Jasawalla a telegram mentioning difficulties created by the Exchange Controller in shipping the goods. When Jasawalla conveyed his protest and insisted upon the shipping of the goods at once, the appellant sent a telegram on July 25, informing him that the difficulties were of a minor character and that the space for shipping was already booked. Jasawalla by his telegram of the same date asked for confirmation of loading of 1,200 tons by s.s. Olinda and requested him that if the full quantity could not be loaded, a portion thereof might be sent immediately. The appellant by his letter dated July 26, acknowledged Jasawalla's letter dated 23rd (informing him about the payment of Rs. 81,000) and intimated that the rice would be shipped by the next steamer s.s. Umãria sailing for Malaya and that the said steamer can touch Goa if the quantity of rice to be shipped is raised to 2,000 tons. By a letter dated July 26, Jasawalla protested against the new condition. The complainant sent a letter dated July 27, to Jasawalla asking whether the rice was shipped by s.s. Olinda or not. On July 27, the appellant sent a telegram to Jasawalla asking for bank-guarantee (for payment of balance). It does not appear that any question of bank-guarantee was raised in the correspondence between the parties, after Sant-ram (accused No. 4) fixed up the deal on the footing of payment of advance of Rs. 1,50,000, in cash at Bombay by way of 25 per cent. deposit. On receiving this letter raising the question of bank-guarantee, Jasawalla wrote back on the 27th to the appellant about the change of front and charging him with cheating and not fulfilling his part of the contract after receiving the money. By a letter dated July 30 and also a telegram of the same date the appellant replied to Jasawalla wherein he promised to send the rice by s.s. Umaria and also threatened to break off negotiations if the parties had no confidence in him. Jasawalla thereupon asked the appellant by telegram to fix the sailing date of s.s. Umaria and inform him. The appellant wrote back on August 1, admitting receipt of letters from Jasawalla and attempting to pacify him. Jasawalla replied thanking him and asked for a clear date of the sailing of s.s. Umaria. By that time Jasawalla had made enquiries with Mackinons & Mackenzie (shipping agents) and was informed that no shipping space had been reserved by the appellant and found the statement of the appellant in this behalf to be false. Jasawalla sent copies of this correspondence between him and the appellant to the complainant. That correspondence indicated the appellant's position to be that the rice would be shipped by s.s. Umaria only if the load could be increased to 2,000 tons and that the appellant stated that he got the sailing of s.s. Umaria delayed by two days for the purpose. The complainant thereupon informed Jasawalla that he was prepared to accept the new deal for 2,000 tons. Jasawalla by his telegram dated August 2, to the appellant confirmed this new arrangement and by another telegram dated August 3, asked the appellant to hurry up with the shipment. Thereafter the appellant raised a fresh matter. On August 6, the appellant sent a direct telegram to the complainant and asked him to request the Portuguese Pro-Consul at Karachi to obtain exchange-guarantee. Between August 7 and 12, several letters and telegrams passed between the complainant and Jasawalla, on the one hand and the appellant on the other. As a result of efforts made in this interval, it appears that the Pro-Consul, Mr. Alphonso was prepared to give the exchange-guarantee of the State Bank of Pakistan for payment in sterling of the price of rice. The appellant then by his letter dated August 13, informed Jasawalla that the State Bank was not insisting on exchange-guarantee but that it would be sufficient if a certificate was issued by the Portuguese authority that the rice was required for replenishing the ration shops in Goa. A similar letter was also written by the appellant on August 14, to the complainant. Thereupon the complainant and Jasawalla approached the concerned authority at Goa, viz., one Mr. Campos, the Trade Agent to the Portuguese Government. Mr. Campos thereupon sent telegrams on August 16, to the State Bank of Pakistan, to the Pro-Consul, Mr. Alphonso, and to the appellant certifying that rice was required for replenishing the ration shops in Goa.

After this there was a further change of tactics by the appellant. By a telegram dated August 20, 1951, the appellant informed the complainant that the papers before the Government were ready and that he had done his best but that payment must be made. In reply the complainant sent a telegram to the appellant on the same date stating that he did not understand the contents of his telegram and promised to send the balance on loading. The complainant also informed Jasawalla about these telegrams exchanged between him and the appellant. This was followed up by some further correspondence between the parties on August 22. The appellant sent telegrams both to the complainant and to Jasawalla demanding 90 per cent. deposit as advance and threatened to break off if it was not complied with. Thereupon Jasawalla sent a telegram on the 22nd to the complainant to come to Bombay. He informed the appellant the same day that the complainant was coming down to Bombay to arrange for 50 per cent. deposit and asked the appellant to start loading. On the 24th he wrote also a letter to the appellant to the effect that the complainant would pay 50 per cent. advance minus the amount already paid and informed him that the complainant would fly to Karachi to supervise the loading. The appellant thereupon sent a telegram dated the 25th informing Jasawalla that everything was ready but hinted about the opening of a letter of credit. Again on August 27, the appellant sent a telegram to Jasawalla that stocks could not be released unless the arrangement was fulfilled i.e., 90 per cent. amount was paid. The complainant came to Bombay with drafts and cheques to the tune of about Rs. 4,75,000, and contacted Jasawalla. He contacted also the appellant on phone. He paid a sum of Rs. 2,30,000 on August 28, 1951, to Jasawalla who passed a receipt, exh. F., therefor, on behalf of the appellant. On August 29, the complainant paid another sum of Rs. 2,36,900 to Jasawalla who passed a receipt, exh. G., therefor, on behalf of the appellant. It is the case of the prosecution that both these were also passed on to accused No. 2 and through him to the appellant and that the appellant acknowledged receipt of these amounts in his correspondence and that case has been also accepted. On the 29th itself the appellant sent a telegram to Jasawalla as follows:

"Part consignment received, rest tomorrow, Pentakota for the 1st certain goods required alongside."

On receiving this telegram Jasawalla informed him by a telegram dated August 31, that he was shocked that no space was reserved, though everything had been done on his side. The appellant sent a reply by telegram dated September 1, 1951, protesting against the language used by Jasawalla in the telegram and informed him that space was reserved but the company could not wait as the goods could not be shipped. On September 5, the appellant informed Jasawalla by a letter that space was reserved by s.s. Pentakota and that everything was ready for shipment. Meanwhile the complainant feeling very nervous and anxious about the fulfilment of the transaction proceeded in person to Karachi on September 4. According to the complainant he stayed at Karachi for about two weeks. He was shown some godowns containing rice bags suggesting that they belonged to the appellant and were ready for shipment. But he was not afforded any opportunity for verifying that the stock was intended for shipment in respect of his transaction. The complainant went to Karachi on a Visa for three months. But after a stay of less than two weeks he was served with a quit-order from the Pakistan Government on September 18, and was bundled out of Karachi. It is the complainant's impression that this was manoeuvred by the appellant. On his return back, correspondence was again resumed between the appellant and the complainant. By a letter dated September 21, the appellant promised to ship the goods by s.s. Ismalia which would not be sailing in September but would leave on October 3. On September 23, the appellant sent another letter stating that s.s. Ismalia was arriving on October 3 and not on September 26. On October 3, the appellant wrote another letter to the complainant informing him that s.s. Ismalia was not available. The complainant thereafter sent a telegram to the appellant dated September 29, calling upon him to ship the goods by s.s. Shahjehan if s.s. Ismalia was not available. The complainant by a further letter dated October 1, called upon the appellant to ship the rice at once. By a telegram dated October 2, the appellant informed the complainant that s.s. Shahjehan was arriving the next day and that he would wire the position. By his telegram dated the 3rd, he informed the complainant that the loading had commenced. On October 6, the complaint received another telegram from the appellant that he would not ship per s.s. Shahjehan until demands in his letter dated September 29, are complied with. It is the complainant's case that no such letter was ever received by him. Jasawalla also informed the appellant that no letter dated September 29, was received. By telegram dated October 8, 1951, Jasawalla called upon the appellant to refund the money and cancel the contract. On October 12, the appellant sent a telegram which conveyed a suggestion that he would ship rice by s.s. Shahjehan arriving on October 19, instead of October 9. There were some further telegrams exchanged. Finally the complainant sent a telegram on October 26, calling upon the appellant to ship rice immediately or refund the money.

This was followed by further exchange of correspondence which ultimately resulted in a letter by the appellant to the complainant dated November 17, denying all the allegations made against him.

The above facts were held to have been proved by the Courts below on the basis of a good deal of correspondence between the parties consisting of telegrams and letters and supported by the oral evidence mainly of three persons, viz., (1) the complainant, (2) Jasawalla, and (3) an ex-employee of the appellant at Karachi by name Sequeria. All this evidence has been accepted by the Courts below after full consideration of the various comments and criticisms against acceptability of the same.

In a case of this kind a question may well arise at the outset whether the evidence discloses only a breach of civil liability or a criminal offence. That, of course, would depend upon whether the complainant in parting with his money to the tune of about Rs. 5½ lakhs acted on the representations of the appellant and in belief of the truth thereof and whether those representations, when made were in fact false to the knowledge of the appellant and whether the appellant had a dishonest intention from the outset. Both the Courts below have found these facts specifically against the appellant in categorical terms. These being questions of fact are no longer open to challenge in this Court before us in an appeal on special leave.

Learned counsel for the appellant accordingly raised before us the following contentions:

1. The appellant is a Pakistani national, who, during the entire period of the commission of the offence never stepped into India and was only at Karachi. Hence he committed no offence punishable under the Indian Penal Code and cannot be tried by an Indian Court.

2. The appellant was brought over from England, where he happened to be, by virtue of extradition proceedings in connection with another offence, the trial for which was then pending in the Sessions Court at Bombay and accordingly he could not be validly tried and convicted for a different offence like the present.

3. The various telegrams and letters relied upon by the prosecution were held to have been proved on legally inadmissible material.

4. The charge being under s. 420 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code for alleged conjoint acts of the appellant along with the persons designated as accused Nos. 2, 3 and 4, in the complaint and the said three accused not being before the Court and the appellant not having been in Bombay at the time, the conviction is unsustainable.

We have heard elaborate arguments on all these matters but have felt satisfied that there is no substance in contentions 2, 3 and 4 above. Accordingly we did not call upon the counsel for the State to reply to the same. It is, therefore, unnecessary to deal with them at any length. They will be disposed of in the first instance.

To understand contention 3, it is convenient to take the letters and telegrams separately. The letters which have been relied on for the prosecution fall under the following categories.

1. Letters from the appellant either to Jasawalla or to the complainant.

2. Letter to the appellant from Jasawalla or the complainant.

Most of the letters from the appellant relied upon bear what purport to be his signatures. A few of them are admitted by the appellant. There are also a few letters without signatures. Both the complainant and Jasawalla speak to the signatures on the other letters. The objection of the learned counsel for the appellant is that neither of them has actually seen the appellant write any of the letters nor are they shown to have such intimate acquaintance with his correspondence as to enable them to speak to the genuineness of these signatures. Learned trial Judge as well as the learned Judges of the High Court have found that there were sufficient number of admitted or proved letters which might well enable Jasawalla and the complainant to identify the signatures of the appellant in the disputed letters. They also laid stress substantially on the contents of the various letters, in the context of the other letters and telegrams to which they purport to be replies and which form the chain of correspondence, as indicating the genuineness of the disputed letters. Learned counsel objected to this approach on a question of proof. We are, however, unable to see any objection. The proof of the genuineness of a document is proof of the authorship of the document and is proof of a fact like that of any other fact. The evidence relating thereto may be direct or circumstantial. It may consist of direct evidence of a person who saw the document being written or the signature being affixed. It may be proof of the handwriting of the contents, or of the signature, by one of the modes provided in ss. 45 and 47 of the Indian Evidence Act. It may also be proved by internal evidence afforded by the contents of the document. This last mode of proof by the contents may be of considerable value where the disputed document purports to be a link in a chain of correspondence, some links in which are proved to the satisfaction of the Court. In such a situation the person who is the recipient of the document, be it either a letter or a telegram, would be in a reasonably good position both with reference to his prior knowledge of the writing or the signature of the alleged sender limited though it may be, as also his knowledge of the subject-matter of the chain of correspondence, to speak to its authorship. In an appropriate case the Court may also be in a position to judge whether the document constitutes a genuine link in the chain of correspondence and thus to determine its authorship. We are unable, therefore, to say that the approach adopted by the Courts below in arriving at the conclusion that the letters are genuine is open to any serious legal objection. The question, if any, can only be as to the adequacy of the material on which the conclusion as to the genuineness of the letters is arrived at. That, however, is a matter which we cannot permit to be canvassed before us.

A few of the letters said to have been received from the appellant, as stated above, do not bear his signatures. These were held to have been proved by the circumstantial evidence as pointed out and we see no objection thereto.

The next objection is as regards the letters said to have been sent by Jasawalla and the complainant to the appellant. Jasawalla and the complainant have produced copies of the originals. It has been contended that these copies are inadmissible. But such a contention is obviously untenable. The appellant cannot be expected to produce them, if true, since he disputes them. There is also the evidence of his ex-employee, Sequeria that the originals were received, but taken away by his son. The main contention in respect of these letters is that there is no proof that they were received by the appellant at Karachi. It is contended that evidence given by either Jasawalla or the complainant that the originals were written and posted is not relevant to show that the same have been received. It is urged that the proof of mere posting of a letter is not presumptive evidence of the receipt thereof by the addressee unless there is also proof that the original has not been returned from the Dead Letter Office. Illustration (b) to s. 16 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, is relied on for the purpose and it is urged that a combination of the two facts is required to raise such a presumption. We are quite clear that the illustration only means that each one of these facts is relevant. It cannot be read as indicating that without a combination of these facts no presumption can arise. Indeed that section with the illustrations thereto, has nothing to do with presumptions but only with relevance. Some cases relating to this have been cited before us. We have considered the same but it is unnecessary to deal with them.

Next taking the question relating to telegrams the main objection is as to the proof of the genuineness of the various telegrams said to have been received from the appellant. In this case since we are largely concerned with the nature and contents of the representations said to have been made by the accused to the complainant or to Jasawalla, it is obvious that what are relevant or important are the telegraphic messages delivered to the complainant or Jasawalla provided the authorship of the original is made out. These messages have been proved by producing the messages actually handed over to either of these persons or the transit copies of the originals recorded at the receiving end. The real objection, however, appears to be that there is no proof as to the appellant having been the author of these messages. It is true that under s. 88 of the Evidence Act there is a presumption only that the message received by the addressee corresponds with the message delivered for transmission at the office of origin. There is no presumption as to the person who delivered such a message for transmission. But here again proof of authorship of the message need not be direct and may be circumstantial as has been explained above in the case of letters. The contents of the messages received, in the context of the chain of correspondence may well furnish proof of the authorship of the messages at the dispatching end. A number of other minor objections have been also raised before us connected with the proof of these telegrams. They have all been fully dealt with by one of the learned Judges of the High Court. Most of these objections are unsubstantial, and it is enough to say that we are in general agreement with the conclusions of the High Court in this matter.

As regards both the letters and the telegrams considerable argument was attempted before us as to the mode in which they were let in for proof in the course of the examination of the witnesses. But in the absence of any clear indication on the record that any objection in that behalf was seriously taken, we could not permit any challenge in this behalf.

We may add that as regards the main objection both in respect of letters as well as telegrams, viz., the use of the contents of the disputed documents, for proof thereof there is this that could be said, viz., in view of the fact that quite a large number of the documents are not admitted and only a few have been held to be admitted or indubitably proved it may have been a question open before the Court of appeal whether the internal evidence with reference to such a large mass of correspondence substantial portion of which is disputed was adequate to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion as to the genuineness of these documents. That question is not open before us. But, even if we were inclined to go into this, it was well nigh impossible, having regard to the fact that most of the documents relied upon by the trial Court as well as the appellate Court have not been printed in the record before us. However, there is no reason to think that the learned Judges who have considered the matter very elaborately have not come to a satisfactory conclusion. They have acted not merely on the internal evidence of the documents but also on the oral evidence of three main witnesses viz. the complainant, Jasawalla and Sequeria, each set of evidence having been considered as affirmative of the other and in the aggregate as proving the authorship of the disputed documents.

The fourth contention raised by the appellant's counsel relates to the validity of the conviction under s. 420/34 of the Indian Penal Code. Learned counsel argued that persons designated as accused Nos. 2, 3 and 4 in the complaint, were all in Bombay and the appellant in Karachi and that therefore no conjoint offence could be committed by them within the meaning of s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code. He relies upon the dictum in *Shreekanthiah Ramayya Munipalli v. The State of Bombay*¹ to the effect that it is essential that the accused should join in the "actual doing" of the act and not merely in planning its perpetration. We do not think that that case, or the dictum therein relied on, has any bearing on the facts of the present case. It is also necessary to observe that what in fact has been found in this case is the commission of the offence by the appellant himself. Though the trial Magistrate and one of the learned Judges of the High Court referred to the conviction as a conviction under s. 420/34 of the Indian Penal Code, the actual findings support a conviction of the appellant under s. 420 itself. Such a conviction would be valid though the charge is under s. 420 read with s. 34 of the Indian Penal Code, (See *Willie (William) Slaney v. The State of Madhya Pradesh*²), unless prejudice is shown to have occurred.

Thus there is no substance in contentions 3 and 4.

Contention No. 2 arises under the following circumstances. It appears that the appellant was previously undergoing trial in the Court of the Sessions Judge at Bombay for the offences of forgery and fraud and was on bail in connection with that trial. While thus on bail he fled away first to Pakistan and from there to England. The Indian authorities made an application to the Metropolitan Magistrate, Bow Street, under the Fugitive Offenders Act, for his being arrested and surrendered. That application was granted by the Magistrate. Thereupon the appellant moved the Queens Bench Division of the High Court in England for a writ of habeas corpus challenging the validity of his arrest and surrender to the Indian authorities. Judgment of Lord Goddard, C.J., dealing with this matter is reported as *Re. Government of India and Mubarak Ali Ahmed*¹. The application was dismissed and the order for surrender made under the Fugitive Offenders Act was upheld. It appears that when he was brought back to Bombay and was in jail custody with reference to the resumed sessions trial, the complainant got to know about it and filed his complaint on June 30, 1952. The Presidency Magistrate took it on his file and issued warrant against the accused and had him brought up before his Court in due course for trial (presumably after the sessions trial was completed). The objection raised before us is that the appellant having been surrendered by the order of the Metropolitan Magistrate only for the sessions trial which was pending against him in Bombay, he could not be tried for any other offence said to have been committed by him in India. Learned counsel relies on s. 3(2) of the English Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vic. c. 32) which shows that it is contemplated thereby that a fugitive criminal who has been surrendered under the Extradition Act in respect of a particular offence should not be tried for any other offence until he has been restored or has been given an opportunity of returning. This section, however, has no bearing in the present case, since, as already stated, the appellant was surrendered under the Fugitive Offenders Act which contains no analogous provision. Section 8 of the Fugitive Offenders Act only provides for an optional repatriation of the surrendered person at his request if he is acquitted of the offence for which he is surrendered. Learned counsel argues that the principle underlying s. 3(2) of the English Extradition Act is a general one and that it should be applied by analogy also to a surrender under the Fugitive Offenders Act. We are unable to accede to that contention. It may also be mentioned that even if his arrest in India for the purpose of a trial in respect of a fresh offence is considered not to be justified, this by itself cannot vitiate the conviction following upon his trial. This is now well-settled by a series of cases. (See *Parbhu v. King-Emperor*²; *Lumbhardar Zutshi v. The King*³; and *H. N. Bishnud v. The State of Delhi*⁴.) This contention must accordingly be overruled.

We are left, therefore, with the first contention raised by the learned counsel for the appellant which is the only substantial question that has been raised before us requiring careful consideration.

The first contention is raised on the assumption that the appellant is a Pakistani national. At the outset, it may be stated that it is doubtful whether in fact the appellant at the time of the offence, could be considered a Pakistani national. The complainant asserted in his complaint, that he came to know the appellant to be an Indian citizen and described him as hailing from Hyderabad (Deccan) and as having absconded to Pakistan and from there to England. In a long written statement filed after the prosecution closed its case, the appellant himself gave details of his previous history from the year 1928. He stated that he became a Graduate with Honours from the Punjab University in 1928; that he joined the Indian Finance Service and served in various capacities and at various places, that he ultimately resigned from the Government service in 1943 and joined an industrial concern at Hyderabad (Deccan), that he did a lot of business there and that he entered into a large business contract with the Government of Hyderabad, which was revived by the Military Government after the Police Action. He winds up the narration of his previous history with the following significant statement.

"The contract was satisfactorily fulfilled prior to my migration to Pakistan in July, 1950."

This is a categorical statement of the appellant himself which shows that he continued to be in India till July, 1950. If so, it appears prima facie that by virtue of art. 5 of the Constitution read with art. 7 thereof, he was a citizen of India on the date of the Constitution and continued to be so at the date of the offence in July-August, 1951, unless he shows that under art. 9 of the Constitution, he voluntarily acquired the citizenship of a foreign State. Prima facie mere migration to Pakistan is not enough to show that he had lost Indian citizenship. This question has not been considered or dealt with in the Courts below, probably because it was not properly raised at the early stages. Being a fundamental objection to jurisdiction this should have been raised at the trial by the appellant (accused), at any rate, soon after the charge was framed. We might well have declined, therefore, to permit the question of jurisdiction in this specific form to be argued before us. But the learned Judges of the High Court have entertained it and dealt with it on the stated assumption that the appellant is a Pakistani national. To over-rule the objection at this stage without finally deciding whether the appellant continues to be an Indian citizen (after remanding for additional finding, if need be), would not be fair or satisfactory. In the circumstances we have felt it desirable to allow arguments to proceed on the same assumption which the High Court has made. We, therefore, proceed to deal with it.

The learned Judges of the High Court decided against the objection of the appellant as to the jurisdiction of the Court to try him for the alleged offence relying on s. 179 of the Code of Criminal Procedure which provides as follows:

"When a person is accused of the commission of any offence by reason of anything which has been done, and of any consequence which has ensued, such offence may be inquired into or tried by a Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction any such thing has been done, or any such consequence has ensued."

In view of the above provision, the learned Judges say as follows:

"Even upon the footing that the representations were made, or the deception was practised by the appellant, while he was in Pakistan, the consequence of the deception, namely, the delivery of the property, took place in Bombay."

They held that the appellant could, therefore, be tried in Bombay in respect of the delivery of the money in Bombay. The argument of the learned counsel for the appellant is that s. 179 of the Code of Criminal Procedure proceeds on the assumption that the person to be tried is substantively liable for an offence under the Indian Penal Code and that s. 179 prescribes the place of trial but does not create the liability. He urges that since the appellant is a Pakistani national who was not physically present at Bombay at any stage of the commission of the offence, the Indian Penal Code has no application to him. He is therefore not liable for an offence under the Penal Code and hence is not triable under s. 179 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It appears from s. 5(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure that the provisions of the said Code relating to the place of trial assume the existence of substantive liability under the Indian Penal Code or under any other law. Section 5(1) says that:

"All offences under the Indian Penal Code shall be investigated, inquired into, tried and otherwise dealt with according to the provisions hereinafter contained."

Now the point raised by the learned counsel is that to hold a person in the position of appellant substantively liable for the offence charged against him in the circumstances of this case, would be to give extra-territorial operation to the provisions of the Indian Penal Code. He contends that such extra-territorial operation can only be by reason of specific legislation in this behalf and does not arise from any general provisions of the Indian Penal Code.

To deal with this contention, it is necessary to appreciate clearly the basic facts found in this case. The offence of cheating under s. 420 of the Indian Penal Code as defined in s. 415 of the Code has two essential ingredients, viz., (1) deceit i.e., dishonest or fraudulent misrepresentation to a person, and (2) the inducing of that person thereby to deliver property. In the present case the volume of evidence set out above and the facts found to be true show that the appellant though at Karachi was making representations to the complainant through letters, telegrams and telephone talks, sometimes directly to the complainant and sometimes through Jasawalla, that he had ready stock of rice, that he had reserved shipping space and that on receipt of money he would be in a position to ship the rice forthwith. These representations were made to the complainant at Bombay, notwithstanding that the appellant was making the representations from Karachi. The position is quite clear where the representations were made through the trunk phone. The statement of the appellant at the Karachi-end of the telephone becomes a representation to the complainant only when it reaches cognition of the complainant at the Bombay-end. This indeed has not been disputed. It makes no difference in principle if the representations have in some stages been conveyed by telegrams or by letters to the complainant directly or to some one of the appellant's agents, including Jasawalla in that category. There is also no question that it is as a result of these representations that the appellant parted with his money to the tune of about Rs. 5½ lakhs on three different dates. It has been found that the representations were made without being supported by the requisite facts and that this was so to the knowledge of the appellant and that the representations were so made with an initial dishonest intention. On these facts it is clear that all the ingredients necessary for finding the offence of cheating under s. 420 read with s. 415 have occurred at Bombay. In that sense the entire offence was committed at Bombay and not merely the consequence viz., delivery of money which was one of the ingredients of the offence. Learned counsel for the appellant has not seriously contested this position. But he urges that even so the appellant, who was not corporeally present in India at the relevant time, does not fall within the purview of the Indian Penal Code. Now there can be no doubt that prima facie the Indian Penal Code is intended to deal with all unlawful acts and omissions defined to be offences and committed within India and to provide for the punishment thereof of the person or persons found guilty therefor. This is implicit in the preamble and s. 2 of the Indian Penal Code. What is, therefore, to be seen is whether there is any reason to think that a foreigner not corporeally present at the time of the commission of the offence does not fall within the range of persons punishable therefor under the Code. It appears to us that the answer must be in the negative unless there is any recognised legal principle on which such exclusion can be founded or the language of the Code compels such a construction. It is strenuously urged that to consider a foreigner guilty under the Penal Code for an offence committed in India though attributable to him and to punish him therefor in a case where he is not corporeally present in India for the commission of the offence, would be to give extra-territorial operation to the Indian Penal Code and that an interpretation which brings such extra-territorial operation must be avoided. The case of the Privy Council in *Macleod v. Attorney-General for New South Wales*¹ is relied upon. But this argument is based on a misconception. The fastening of criminal liability on a foreigner in respect of culpable acts or omissions in India which are juridically attributable to him notwithstanding that he is corporeally present outside India at the time, is not to give any extra-territorial operation to the law; for it is in respect of an offence whose locality is in India, that the liability is fastened on the person and the punishment is awarded by the law, if his presence in India for the trial can be secured. That this is part of the ordinary jurisdiction of a municipal Court is well recognised in the common law of England as appears from Halsbury's Laws of England (Third edn.), Vol. X, p. 318. Paragraph 580 therein shows that the exercise of criminal jurisdiction at common law is limited to crimes committed within the territorial limits of England and para. 581 states the jurisdiction in respect of acts outside English territory as follows:

"For the purposes of criminal jurisdiction, an act may be regarded as done within English territory, although the person who did the act may be outside the territory; for instance, a person who, being abroad procures an innocent agent or uses the post office to commit a crime in England is deemed to commit an act in England. If a person, being outside England, initiates an offence, part of the essential elements of which take effect in England, he is amenable to English jurisdiction. It appears that even though the person who has initiated such an offence is a foreigner, he can be tried if he subsequently comes to England."

Thus the exercise of criminal jurisdiction in such cases under the common law is exercise of municipal jurisdiction and much more so in a case like the present, where all the ingredients of the offence occur within the municipal territory.

It would be desirable at this stage to notice certain well-recognised concepts of International Law bearing on such a situation. Wheaton in his book on Elements of International Law (Fourth Edn.) at p. 183, dealing with criminal jurisdiction states as follows:—

"By the Common Law of England, which has been adopted, in this respect, in the United States, criminal offences are considered as altogether local, and are justiciable only by the courts of that country where the offence is committed."

At p. 182 thereof it is stated as follows:—

"The judicial power of every independent State, extends (with the qualifications mentioned earlier) to the punishment of all offences against the municipal laws of the State, by whomsoever committed, within the territory."

In Hackworth's Digest of International Law (1941 edn.), Vol. II, at p. 188 there is reference to opinions of certain eminent American Judges. It is enough to quote the following dictum of Holmes J. noticed therein:

"Acts done outside a jurisdiction, but intended to produce and producing detrimental effects within it, justify a State in punishing the cause of the harm as if he had been present at the effect, if the State should succeed in getting him within its power."

In Hyde's International Law (Second Edn.), Vol. I, at p. 798, the following quotation from the judgment of the Permanent Court of International Justice dated September 7, 1927, in the case relating to *S. S. Lotus*¹ is very instructive:—

"It is certain that the courts of many countries, even of countries which have given their criminal legislation a strictly territorial character, interpret criminal law in the sense that offences, the authors of which at the moment of commission are in the territory of another State, are nevertheless to be regarded as having been committed in the national territory, if one of the constituent elements of the offence, and more especially its effects, have taken place there."

This quotation is also noticed in Openheim's International Law (Eighth edn.), Vol. I, at page 332 in the foot-note. In noticing the provisions of International Law in this context we are conscious that what we have to deal with in the present case is a question merely of municipal law and not of any International Law. But as is seen above, the principles recognised in International Law in this behalf are virtually based on the recognition of those principles in the municipal law of various countries and is really part of the general jurisprudence relating to criminal responsibility under municipal law. No doubt some of the above dicta have reference to offences actually committed outside the State by foreigners and treated as offences committed within the State by specific legislation. But the principle emerging therefrom is clear that once it is treated as committed within the State, the fact that he is a foreigner corporeally present outside at the time of such commission is no objection to the exercise of municipal jurisdiction under the municipal law. This emphasises the principle that exercise of criminal jurisdiction depends on the locality of the offence and not on the nationality of the alleged offender (except in a few specified cases such as ambassadors, Princes, etc.).

Learned counsel for the appellant has relied on various passages in the judgment of Cockburn C.J. in the well-known case *The Queen v. Keyn (Franconia's case)*¹. Fourteen learned Judges participated in that case and the case appears to have been argued twice. Eight of them including Cockburn C.J. formed the majority. Undoubtedly there are various passages in the judgment of Cockburn C.J. which prima facie seem capable of being urged in favour of the appellant's contention. In particular the following passage at p. 235 may be noticed:

"The question is not whether the death of the deceased, which no doubt took place in a British ship, was the act of the defendant in such ship, but whether the defendant, at the time the act was done, was himself within British jurisdiction."

The learned Chief Justice, however, recognised at p. 237 that there were certain American decisions to the contrary. Now the main debate in that case was whether the sea upto three mile limit from the shore is part of British territory or whether in respect of such three mile limit only limited and defined extra-territorial British jurisdiction extended which did not include the particular criminal jurisdiction under consideration. In respect of this question, as a result of the judgment, the Parliament had to enact the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 73) which in substance overruled the view of the majority and of the learned Chief Justice on this point. The main principle of criminal jurisdiction, however, relevant for our purpose was enunciated in the minority judgment of Amphlett, J. A., at p. 118, that "it is the locality of the offence that determines the jurisdiction" implying by contrast that it is not the nationality of the offender.

The question, however, that still remains for consideration is whether there is anything in the language of the sections of the Indian Penal Code relating to the general scheme of the Code which compels the construction that the various sections of the Indian Penal Code are not intended to apply to a foreigner who has committed an offence in India while not being corporeally present therein at the time. For this purpose we are not concerned with such of the sections of the Penal Code, if any, which indicate the actual presence of the culprit as a necessary ingredient of the offence. Of course, for such offences a foreigner ex hypothesi not present at the time in India cannot be guilty. The only general sections of the Indian Penal Code which indicate its scheme in this behalf are ss. 2, 3, and 4 and as they stand at present, they are as follows:—

"2. Every person shall be liable to punishment under this Code and not otherwise for every act or omission contrary to the provisions thereof, of which he shall be guilty within India.

3. Any person liable, by any Indian law, to be tried for an offence committed beyond India shall be dealt with according to the provisions of this Code for any act committed beyond India in the same manner as if such act had been committed within India.

4. The provisions of this Code apply also to any offence committed by—

(1) any citizen of India in any place without and beyond India;

(2) any person on any ship or aircraft registered in India wherever it may be.

Explanation.—In this section the word 'offence' includes every act committed outside India which, if committed in India, would be punishable under this Code."

Sections 3 and 4 deal with offences committed beyond the territorial limits of India and s. 2 obviously and by contrast refers to offences committed within India. It appears clear that it is s. 2 that has to be looked to to determine the liability and punishment of persons who have committed offences within India. The section asserts categorically that every person shall be liable to punishment under the Code for every act or omission contrary to the provisions of the Code and of which he shall be guilty within India. This recognises the general principle of criminal jurisdiction over persons with reference to the locality of the offence committed by them, being within India. The use of the phrase "every person" in s. 2 as contrasted with the use of the phrase "any person" in s. 3 as well as s. 4(2) of the Code is indicative of the idea that to the extent that the guilt for an offence committed within India can be attributed to a person, every such person without exception is liable for punishment under the Code. Learned counsel for the appellant suggests that the phrase "within India" towards the end of s. 2 must be read with the phrase "every person" at the commencement thereof. But this is far-fetched and untenable. The plain meaning of the phrase "every person" is that it comprehends all persons without limitation and irrespective of nationality, allegiance, rank, status, caste, colour or creed. This section must be understood as comprehending every person without exception barring such as may be specially exempt from criminal proceedings or punishment thereunder by virtue of the Constitution (see art. 361(2) of the Constitution) or any statutory provisions or some well-recognised principle of international law, such as foreign sovereigns, ambassadors, diplomatic agents and so forth, accepted in the municipal law.

Learned counsel drew our attention to a number of sections in the Indian Penal Code, viz., ss. 108A, 177, 203, 212, 216, 216A and 236. The argument based on reference to these sections is that wherever the Legislature in framing the Penal Code wanted to legislate about anything that has reference to something done outside India it has specifically said so and that therefore it may be expected that if it was intended that the Penal Code would refer to a person actually present outside India at the time of the commission of the offence, it would have specifically said so. We are unable to accept this argument. These sections have reference to particular difficulties which arose with reference to what may be called, a related offence being committed in India in the context of the principal offence itself having been committed outside India—that is, for instance, abetment, giving false information and harbouring within India in respect of offences outside India. Questions arose in such cases as to whether any criminal liability would arise with reference to the related offence, the principal offence itself not being punishable in India and these sections were intended to rectify the lacunae. On the other hand, a reference to s. 3 of the Code clearly indicates that it is implicit therein that a foreigner who commits an offence within India is guilty and can be punished as such without any limitations as to his corporeal presence in India at the time. For if it were not so, the legal fiction implicit in the phrase "as if such act had been committed within India" in s. 3 would not have been limited to the supposition that such act had been committed within India, but would have extended also to a fiction as to his physical presence at the time in India.

In the argument before us, there has been some debate as to what exactly is the implication of the clause "of which he shall be guilty within India" in s. 2 of the Code. It is unnecessary to come to any definite conclusion in respect thereto. But it is clear that it does not support the contention of the appellant's counsel. We have, therefore, no doubt that on a plain reading of s. 2 of the Penal Code, the Code does apply to a foreigner who has committed an offence within India notwithstanding that he was corporeally present outside.

It has next been urged before us that the exercise of jurisdiction over a foreigner by municipal Courts depends on the theory of temporary allegiance to the State by reason of his entry into the State, which carries with it the protection of its laws and therefore his submission thereto. Dicta from some of the decided cases have been cited before us. It is unnecessary to deal with any of those cases. On an examination of those cases it will be found that allegiance, temporary or otherwise, has not been laid down anywhere as a limiting principle in respect of criminal jurisdiction, which is primarily concerned with questions of security of the State and of the citizens of the State.

A number of early cases of the High Courts in India have been brought to our notice as bearing on the question now under consideration. (See Reg. v.

*Elmstone, Whitwell*¹; *Reg. v. Pirtai*²; *Mussummat Kishen Kour v. The Crown*³; and *Gokaldas v. Emperor*⁴). As against them may be noticed the case in *Emperor v. Chhotalal Babar*⁵. It is unnecessary to consider them at any length. Undoubtedly some of them seem to support the view pressed before us on behalf of the appellant that criminal jurisdiction cannot extend to foreigners outside the State. These, however, are decisions rendered at a time when the competence of the Indian Legislature was considered somewhat limited, under the influence of the decisions like those in Macleod's case in spite of the decision in *Queen v. Burah*⁶. However that may be, these concepts are no longer tenable after India became a Dominion by the Indian Independence Act of 1947 and after it became an independent free sovereign republic under the present Constitution. It is enough to refer to the case of *Croft v. Dunphy*⁷ and to the decision of Spens C. J. in *Governor-General v. Raleigh Investment*⁸. In the latter case Spens C. J. indicates that there has been considerable change in the concept of the doctrine of extra-territorial legislation, subsequent to Macleod's case and the criticism of Macleod's case in certain Canadian decisions and of the Privy Council itself has been adverted to.

Learned counsel invited our attention to a passage from the report of the Indian Law Commissioners quoted at p. 274 of Ratanlal's Law of Crimes (Eighteenth Edn.). It is enough to say that though this quotation may be valuable as a matter of history, it cannot be a legitimate guide for the construction of the section. That construction must be based on the meaning of the words used, to be gathered according to the ordinary rules of interpretation and in consonance with the generally accepted principles of exercise of criminal jurisdiction. It is not necessary, and indeed not permissible, to construe the Indian Penal Code at the present day in accordance with the notions of criminal jurisdiction prevailing at the time when the Code was enacted. The notions relating to this matter have very considerably changed between then and now during nearly a century that has elapsed. It is legitimate to construe the Code with reference to the modern needs, wherever this is permissible, unless there is anything in the Code or in any particular section to indicate the contrary.

After giving our careful consideration to the questions raised before us, we are clearly of the opinion that even on the assumption that the appellant has ceased to be an Indian citizen and was a Pakistani national at the time of the commission of the offence, he must be held guilty and punished under the Indian Penal Code notwithstanding his not being corporeally present in India at the time.

We have been asked to consider the question of sentence. As has been stated at the outset the substantive sentences of imprisonment are two years under the first count and twenty-two months under the second. The sentences were concurrent on the second and third counts. As a result, the total imprisonment which has been awarded against the appellant would be a period of three years and ten months. We are not prepared to say that the discretion of the trial Court in awarding that sentence has been wrongly exercised.

The appeal is accordingly dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL CIVIL.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. M. C. Chagla, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice S. T. Desai.

THE STATE OF BOMBAY v. M. C. MENON.*

Bombay Land Requisition Act (Bom. XXXIII of 1948), Sec. 6—Constitution of India, Arts. 226, 227—Whether Court can go behind declaration of vacancy made under s. (4)(a) on question of fact or law—Such a declaration when can be challenged—Assignment by tenant of premises whether creates vacancy within Act although assignee in occupation of premises.

A declaration of vacancy made under s. 6(4)(a) of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, cannot be challenged either on the facts on which the declaration is based or on the ground that in law such a declaration cannot be made.

A declaration that there is a vacancy can be challenged under art. 226 or under art. 227 of the Constitution of India only on the ground that the declaration was mala fide or that there was some extraneous factor which led the Government or the officer concerned to make that declaration.

Mohsin Ali Mahomed Ali v. State of Bombay and Lila Vati Bai v. The State of Bombay,² referred to.

On an assignment by a tenant of the premises in his occupation to a third party there is a vacancy within the meaning of the Explanation to s. 6 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, although the assignee may be in occupation of the premises. Under the Act the State has the right to requisition the premises, if they are vacant as understood by the Act, even though the premises be in possession of a statutory tenant and even though his possession may be protected against the landlord.

ONE A. D. Nayar, who was a monthly tenant of a flat in a building situated at Matunga in Bombay since 1942, in January 1949 started a commercial institution in a portion of his premises. On September 22, 1955, A. D. Nayar assigned this business of the commercial institution to one M. C. Menon (petitioner) and the deed of assignment mentioned Rs. 601 as consideration paid by the petitioner for the furniture and goodwill of the business. Under this deed A. D. Nayar purported to assign and transfer to the petitioner the benefits of the tenancy of the premises which was conveyed without consideration as incidental to the sale of the goodwill and furniture. On April 22, 1957, the Accommodation Officer, Bombay, passed the following order:—

"Whereas, on inquiry it is found that the premises specified below had become vacant in the month of September 1955.

Now, therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred by clause (a) of sub-section (4) of section 6 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948 (Bom. XXXIII of 1948), the Government of Bombay is pleased to declare that the said premises had become vacant after 4th December 1947 and to requisition the said premises for a public purpose, namely, for housing a Bombay State Government servant."

The petitioner applied to the High Court under art. 226 of the Constitution of India for an appropriate writ to quash the order of requisition. The petition was heard by Coyajee, Acting C.J. who allowed it, delivering the following judgment on September 27, 1957:—

COYAJEE Acting C.J. This petition raises a short point of law: The petitioner challenges an order of requisition, and that order of requisition is dated April 22, 1957. By that order flat No. 8, first floor, Annapurna Mandir, has been acquired on the ground that that flat had become vacant in the month of September 1955. It is important to note that the ground is that it had become vacant in the month of September 1955.

The facts in connection with this petition are that this flat was acquired as a tenant by a party named A. D. Nayar and A. D. Nayar was here from 1942. From 1949 onwards Nayar started a regular commercial institute under the name and style of Vishnu Commercial Institute. Evidently he had started a commercial class in a residential flat with the result that he applied for licence to the Bombay Municipality which licence was granted to him. It appears that the petitioner acquired this Vishnu Commercial Institute as a going concern under an assignment with all right, title and interest thereto, assets thereof including the goodwill and the tenancy rights. This assignment took place on the September 22, 1955, and this assignment is annexed to the petition. It appears that the landlord declined to transfer the tenancy and a suit was filed by the landlord for ejection of the petitioner. In the meanwhile intimation of suppressed vacancy was conveyed to the Controller of Accommodation and a show cause notice dated April 25, 1956, was issued against the petitioner. A copy of the notice is exh. D to the petition. After hearing the petitioner the Accommodation Officer passed the order requisitioning the premises and against that order this petition is presented.

Now it is not challenged that there is a proper legal assignment which has been regularly made and registered and the question and the pure question of law is whether, if the petitioner was in fact in law or was deemed in law to be the tenant under this assignment of 1955, there could be a declaration at all of vacancy in September 1955 as alleged as the basis of the ground on which this order is made. Because, the very foundation of jurisdiction of the Accommodation Officer is that there is a vacancy. But, if at the date of the order the petitioner though not living there was in fact a tenant, then the very foundation or the condition precedent to the exercise of this jurisdiction by the Accommodation Officer disappears.

Mr. Kantawalla referred me to s. 25 of the Rent Act which says that a landlord shall not use or permit to be used for a non-residential purpose any premises which on the date of the coming into operation of this Act were used for residential purposes and sub-s. (2) is a penal clause for punishment for non-compliance with such a section. Mr. Kantawalla also drew my attention to s. 6, 'Explanation thereto' of the Requisition Act and relied upon a Notification dated April 5, 1954, which says that notwithstanding anything contained in these rules any premises in the city of Bombay used for a non-residential purpose on February 18, 1954, shall with effect from the April 5, 1954, be exempt from the provisions of s. 6. It is contended on behalf of the respondent that in the circumstances, facts and dates of this case the petitioner can claim no exemption under this Notification and that assignments are covered in terms by Explanation to s. 6 of the Act.

Mr. Rajgopal in his argument put it very shortly and very neatly in the following manner. He says that first of all the question is whether this is an assignable business. That proposition is not challenged. Secondly, if it is an assignable business, is it properly assigned? That assignment has not been challenged in the affidavit in reply. If the deed of assignment cannot be impeached, according to Mr. Rajgopal, then one must look at s. 15 of the Rent Act, which says notwithstanding anything contained in any law it shall not be lawful, after coming into operation of this Act, for any tenant to sublet the whole or any part of the premises let to him or to assign or transfer in any other manner his interest therein. The learned counsel pointed out that by a Notification under the proviso a transfer or assignment incidental to the sale of a business as a going concern together with the stock-in-trade and goodwill thereof is exempted provided the transfer or assignment is of the entire interest of the transferor or the assignor in such premises together with the business, stock-in-trade and goodwill thereof, with the result that under this Notification dated September 21, 1948, the prohibition in s. 15 does not apply. In these circumstances, the question remains that the petitioner clearly under the Rent Act and the common law is entitled to these premises and Mr. Rajgopal rightly points out that the Notification dated April 5, 1954, does not and cannot come in his way even if it were read in the manner the respondent wants that Notification to be read, because the petitioner is under the definition of tenant deemed in law to be a tenant at the date when the order was made. A tenant is defined under the Rent Act under s. 5(11) as any person by whom or on whose account rent is payable for any premises and includes any person to whom interest in premises has been transferred under proviso to s. 15. Therefore, if interest under the proviso to s. 15 has been adequately conveyed to the petitioner, the petitioner became a tenant in law, and if he became a tenant and he is deemed to be a tenant, he certainly was in possession of these premises during the period preceding the order, and there could be no question of any vacancy.

The Notification relied upon by counsel on behalf of the petitioner, as shown by him, was published some months after the Requisition Act was passed and with an eye to s. 6 of the Requisition Act and the proviso to s. 15 of the Rent Act. In these circumstances, it is clear that the petitioner need not fall back upon any express exemption under any Notification under the Requisition Act, because his rights remain unaffected as they devolved on him under the proviso to s. 15 of the Rent Act.

It is clear, therefore, on the record that in fact there could be in fact no vacancy as declared on this order and therefore there was no jurisdiction in the Accommodation Officer to pass this order. This petition will, therefore, be allowed. The order of requisition will be quashed and the petitioner will get the costs of the petition.

THE State of Bombay appealed.

H. M. Seervai, Advocate General, with B. M. Kantawalla, for the appellant.
V. Rajagopal, with M. H. Thakkar, for the respondent.

CHAGLA C.J. This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Coyajee by which he held that the Accommodation Officer had no jurisdiction to pass the requisition order which was impugned by the petitioner. It is sufficient to state a very few facts in order to decide the two contentions that arise in this appeal.

One Nair was a monthly tenant of the premises, which is a flat on the first floor of a building at Hormusji Adenwalla Road, Matunga, and it appears that in January 1949 this Nair started a commercial institution in one of the rooms of this flat. On September 22, 1955, Nair assigned this business to the petitioner, and the deed of assignment mentions Rs. 601 as consideration paid by Menon, Rs. 400 being the price of furniture and Rs. 201 being the price for the goodwill of the business. The order of requisition was passed on April 22, 1957, and it recites that on an enquiry, it was found that the premises had become vacant in the month of September 1955 and the order of requisition is passed in exercise of the powers conferred by cl. (a) of sub-s. (4) of s. 6 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, and there is a declaration that the premises had become vacant—after December 4, 1947. Mr. Justice Coyajee took the view that in view of the assignment in favour of the petitioner, there was in law no vacancy and, therefore, the State Government had no jurisdiction to pass this order. The learned Judge also took the view that on a true construction of the provisions of the Requisition Act, the legal effect of the assignment was that there was no vacancy, and these two conclusions arrived at by the learned Judge have been challenged before us by the Advocate General. Section 6(4)(a) makes the declaration of vacancy conclusive evidence that the premises were or had so become vacant. The question that arises in limine is whether it is competent to this Court to go behind that declaration. If it is not so competent, no further question can arise.

Now, Mr. Rajagopal has argued on behalf of the respondent that, although it may not be open to the Court to go behind the declaration in order to ascertain the facts found by the officer who held the enquiry, it is open to the Court to consider whether, in law, there is a vacancy, and if, in law, there is no vacancy, the Court can and, indeed, should hold that the order has been made without jurisdiction. The matter is put this way: The jurisdiction to make an order under s. 6 depends upon a vacancy. If, in law, there is no vacancy, then there is no jurisdiction to make an order. Now, this very point was considered by this Court in *Mohsinali Mahomedali v. The State of Bombay*¹. In that case Mr. Justice Tendolkar had taken the view that the declaration under s. 6 was conclusive as to facts but not as to its legal consequences. The decision of Mr. Justice Tendolkar come up before me and Mr. Justice Gajendragadkar, and we found unable to accept the interpretation put by the learned Judge upon the expression "conclusive evidence" and what we held, was as found at p. 97:

"...Therefore, in our opinion, on a declaration being made by Government that there is a vacancy, that declaration is conclusive both as to the facts and also as to the legal requirements which the law makes necessary."

Therefore, not only it is not competent to the petitioner to challenge the facts on which the declaration is based, but it is also not open to the petitioner to challenge the order on the ground that it does not comply with the requirements of vacancy laid down in the Requisition Act. We also pointed out that both the requirements as to law and the facts were questions which the Legislature had left for decision to the Government and the Court could not go behind the conclusion arrived at by the Government. This decision was given fairly a long time ago, but its correctness has been affirmed by the Supreme Court in a recent decision in *Lila Vati Bai v. The State of Bombay*², and at p. 940 the Supreme Court has cited this judgment, presumably with approval, and has itself laid down the law in the following language:

"...But the special powers aforesaid of this Court or of the High Court cannot extend to reopening a finding by the State Government under s. 5 of the Act that the tenant has not actually resided in the premises for a continuous period of six months immediately preceding the date of the order or under s. 6 that the premises had become vacant at about the time indicated in the order impugned."

Now, Mr. Rajagopal himself relies on the judgment of the Supreme Court, and his contention is that where the Supreme Court speaks of reopening, it only refers to facts and not to law. What is further pointed out by Mr. Rajagopal is that earlier in this passage, the Supreme Court has stated (p. 940):

"But that does not mean that the jurisdiction of the High Court under art. 226 or of this Court under art. 32 or on appeal has been impaired. In a proper case the High Court or this Court in the exercise of its special jurisdiction under the Constitution has the power to determine how far the provisions of the statute have or have not been complied with."

and according to Mr. Rajagopal, if the law laid down what a vacancy is and if the Government declared a vacancy contrary to the provisions of the law, it was not carrying out the statutory requirements and this Court can interfere under art. 226. This, in our opinion, is a total misreading of the judgment of the Supreme Court. It has now become elementary to say that however conclusive the Legislature may make a particular decision or a particular finding, it is always subject to the over-riding powers of the High Court under art. 226 or under art. 227 of the Constitution and, therefore, Mr. Rajagopal is right to this extent that even a declaration that there is a vacancy can be challenged under art. 226 or under art. 227. But the challenge cannot be directed to reopening that declaration or going behind that declaration. The challenge can only be that the declaration was made mala fide or that there was some extraneous factor which led the Government or the officer concerned to make that declaration. The Supreme Court, with respect, was not saying that under art. 226 it is open to the High Court to go behind the declaration on a question of fact or on a question of law. If, again with respect, the Supreme Court has said so, it would be reversing our decision in Mohsinali Mahomedali v. The State of Bombay. Far from the Supreme Court doing so, as we have pointed out, it has referred to this judgment presumably with approval. Therefore, this is not a case where the petitioner is making a proper challenge against the declaration under art. 226. What the petitioner is doing is asking the Court to sit in judgment on the declaration made by the Government and to decide that in law such a declaration could not be made. That, this Court cannot do, and, therefore, with respect, we do not agree with the learned Judge when he holds that the officer had no jurisdiction to declare a vacancy by reason of the assignment. The learned Judge should have assumed by reason of the conclusiveness of the declaration that all the legal requirements of a vacancy had been complied with.

Now, we turn to the second contention, although it does not strictly arise but as the matter has been considered by the learned Judge and as the matter is of some importance and as the Advocate General states that the State wants guidance on this question, we have been persuaded to go into that matter also: Assuming it was open to the Court to consider the legal requirement of a vacancy, would the facts here established constitute a vacancy in law? Now, for this purpose we will assume that the assignment of September 22, 1955, is a valid and legal assignment. If it is legal and valid, does the fact that the petitioner is an assignee under a valid assignment bring about a situation in law by which there is no vacancy which would attract the powers of Government to make a requisition order? It is difficult to understand how, with very great respect to the learned Judge, it is possible to take the view on a plain reading of the relevant provisions of the section that an assignment does not create a vacancy. The Explanation to s. 6 provides:

"For the purposes of this section,— Premises which are in the occupation of the landlord, the tenant or the sub-tenant, as the case may be, shall be deemed to be or become vacant when such landlord ceases to be in occupation or when such tenant or sub-tenant ceases to be in occupation upon termination of his tenancy, eviction, assignment, or transfer in any other manner of his interest in the premises or otherwise, notwithstanding any instrument or occupation by any other person prior to the date when such landlord, tenant or sub-tenant so ceases to be in occupation."

Therefore, according to the plain and clear meaning of this Explanation, when the tenant Mr. Nair executed the deed of assignment on September 22, 1955, and assigned the premises to the petitioner, there was a vacancy within the meaning of this Explanation. Whether in fact there was a vacancy or not is irrelevant, because the Explanation introduces a legal fiction and for the purposes of the Requisition Act, on an assignment by a tenant there is a vacancy although the assignee may be in occupation of the premises.

Now, this clear position in law, so it seems to us, is met by Mr. Rajagopal by pointing out that under the Rent Act, a tenant is defined in s. 5(11) as also any person whose interest in premises has been transferred under the proviso to s. 15, and s. 15 permits an assignment being made under certain circumstances, and for the purposes of this argument, we will assume that the assignment that is made is an assignment which is permitted under s. 15, and we will also assume that for the purposes of the Rent Act, the petitioner has become a tenant. Now, says Mr. Rajagopal that if the petitioner is a tenant under the Rent Act, his possession is protected and he cannot be evicted by the requisition order. He draws attention to the fact that although a landlord is defined in the Requisition Act, a tenant is not defined; and, therefore, we must turn to the Rent Act for the definition of a tenant. But that is entirely an unacceptable canon of construction. When an Act defines a landlord and does not define a tenant, it clearly means that we must look upon "tenant" as a co-relative term and define a tenant corresponding to the definition of the landlord. In the Land Requisition Act, the landlord is defined as any person who is, for the time being, receiving, or entitled to receive, rent in respect of any premises, and therefore, the tenant must be defined as a person who, for the time being, pays or is liable to pay rent. If that be the true definition, then that definition can only apply to Nair who, as a tenant, assigned the premises to the petitioner. But apart from the definition, Mr. Raja-gopal has raised a larger question that if a tenant is protected by the Rent Act, his premises cannot be requisitioned under the Land Requisition Act. In our opinion, that is an entirely untenable proposition. The Rent Act and the Land Requisition Act are not laws in pari materia. The object of putting the Rent Act on the statute book was to protect the possession of the tenant, but the protection was to be against the landlord. The Legislature, notwithstanding the termination of the contractual tenancy, wanted to protect the tenant from being evicted by the landlord, which power he had under the ordinary law. But even though the person may be looked upon as a tenant under the Rent Act and even though his possession may be protected under the Rent Act, it does not, therefore, follow that his possession is protected against the State. Under the Land Requisition Act, we are not dealing with rights of the landlords, but we are dealing with the rights of the State, and the State has the right to requisition premises, if they are vacant as understood by that Act, even though the premises may be in possession of a statutory tenant and even though his possession may be protected against the landlord. The fallacy underlying this argument is to equate the protection under the Rent Act with the right to requisition under the Land Requisition Act. We will assume, for the sake of this argument that the petitioner was a tenant as defined by the Rent Act, that the assignment was valid and that being in occupation the petitioner was deemed to be a tenant under the provisions of the Rent Act and the landlord could not evict him except on the grounds mentioned in the Rent Act. But when we turn to the Requisition Act, there is nothing in the Act which prevents the State from requisitioning premises of a statutory tenant. If the statutory tenant does not occupy the premises and the premises become vacant, those premises become liable to be requisitioned. If the tenant does not occupy the premises, the landlord cannot eject him, because he is protected, but the State can step in and say that in view of the housing problem in the State if you do not occupy the premises, well, we will make better use of those premises. That is the whole basis of the Land Requisition Act. That is the policy underlying that Act. Therefore, in our opinion, even assuming every fact in favour of Mr. Rajagopal and assuming that we can go behind the declaration, it is clear, on the facts of this case, that the legal requirements of a vacancy are satisfied and in law the State Government was entitled to requisition these premises.

The result is that the appeal is allowed and the petition must be dismissed with costs.

BHARAT MANILAL DALAL v. THE STATE OF BOMBAY.*

Bombay Land Requisition Act (Bom. XXXIII of 1948), Sec. 5—Declaration made under

- s. 5(2) whether conclusive evidence as regards person entitled to reside in premises to be requisitioned—Whether declaration precludes real tenant or landlord from showing that he is the real tenant or landlord and not person mentioned therein.

The declaration made under s. 5(2) of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, is not conclusive evidence as regards the person entitled to reside in the premises which are sought to be requisitioned.

Under s. 5 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, the declaration is made conclusive as regards the actual non-residence of the person referred to in the order for a continuous period of six months immediately preceding the date of the order. The declaration does not preclude the real owner, landlord or tenant from showing that he is the real owner, landlord or tenant and not the person mentioned in the declaration.

K. T. DESAI J. The petitioner claims to be a tenant of a room in a building known as New Blocks situate at 175, Walkeshwar Road, Bombay. Prior to the year 1942 one Chandravadan C. Mehta was the tenant of the said premises. The petitioner alleges that he used to reside with the said Chandravadan C. Mehta in the said premises from the year 1941, that the said Mehta left the premises permanently in or about the middle of 1942, that the petitioner thereafter remained in possession of the said premises and was regularly paying rent in respect of the said premises to the landlord, that rent receipts in respect of the said premises were issued in the name of the said Mehta upto the end of the year 1955, that thereafter they were issued in the name of the petitioner and that he was the tenant lawfully entitled to occupy the said premises. In or about the end of March 1956 the petitioner came across a notice issued by the Inspector of Requisitioning calling upon the occupants of the said premises to present themselves before the Inspector with rent receipts, ration cards, electric bills, postal evidence etc. and to furnish such information as may be in their possession relating to the said premises. It is the case of the petitioner that he thereupon saw the Accommodation Officer and satisfied the Officer that he was the tenant of the said room. On March 29, 1957, a notice was issued by the Accommodation Officer to the said Chandravadan C. Mehta as the tenant and to the petitioner and one Mahendra Manubhai Javeri as occupants. In that notice it was stated that the Government had made inquiries and were considering the question of requisitioning the said premises. The said Mehta, the petitioner and the said Javeri were required to see the Accommodation Officer on the date and at the time therein specified with their legal adviser, if any, with a written statement to show cause, if any, why the said premises should not be requisitioned. They were further required on that day to produce all available evidence such as food ration cards, the true copies of extracts from the A.R.D.'s registers, rent bills, gas and electricity bills, postal cards or envelopes received at the said address and any other relevant evidence. On April 22, 1957, the petitioner saw the Accommodation Officer and pointed out what according to him were the correct facts and produced documentary evidence in support of his case. On December 18, 1957, an order was passed requisitioning the said premises. That order is in terms following:—

"Whereas on inquiry it is found that Shri Chandravadan C. Mehta was the person lawfully entitled to reside in the part of the building specified below:

Room No. 1 on the 1st floor of the building known as New Blocks situated at 175, Walkeshwar Road, Bombay.

And whereas on inquiry it is found that the said Shri Chandravadan C. Mehta has not actually resided in the said part of the building for a continuous period of six months immediately preceding the date of this order;

And whereas in the opinion of the Government of Bombay it is necessary to requisition the said part of the building for a public purpose, namely for housing a Bombay State Government Servant.

Now, therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred by section 5 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948 (Bom. XXXIII of 1948) the Government of Bombay hereby declares that the said Shri Chandravadan C. Mehta has not actually resided in the said part of the building specified below for a continuous period of six months immediately preceding the date of this Order, and requisitions the said part of the building for a public purpose, namely, for housing a Bombay State Government servant."

The petitioner challenges the validity of this order on various grounds and has prayed for the issue of a writ of mandamus or a writ in the nature of mandamus or an appropriate writ, order or orders or direction under art. 226 of the Constitution of India ordering the State of Bombay and/or its officers to withdraw, cancel or set aside the said order of requisition dated December 18, 1957, and to forbear from enforcing and/or causing to be enforced or taking or causing to be taken any steps or proceedings in the enforcement of the said order and/or from allowing any person to occupy the said premises.

The principal contention advanced before me on behalf of the petitioner is that the said Chandravadan C. Mehta was not at the relevant time lawfully entitled to reside in the said premises. It is urged that in fact he ceased to reside in the said premises since 1942. It is further urged that in any event when the landlord in January 1956 issued rent bills in favour of the petitioner, the vestige of any title in the said Chandravadan C. Mehta to occupy the premises ceased to exist. It is urged that the declaration which proceeds upon the footing that Chandravadan C. Mehta was the person lawfully entitled to reside in the said premises is a bad declaration and that as the declaration is bad, the order of requisition is equally bad and cannot be sustained.

It was strongly urged before me on behalf of the respondent that the declaration that has been made is conclusive evidence both as regards the person entitled lawfully to reside in the premises and as regards the fact of his non-residence during the period of six months immediately preceding the date of the order. Section 5(2) of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, which has been relied upon, runs as follows:—

"5. (2) Where any building or part thereof is to be requisitioned under sub-section (1), the State Government shall make such enquiry as it deems fit and make a declaration in the order of requisition that the owner, the landlord or the tenant, as the case may be, has not actually resided therein for a continuous period of six months immediately preceding the date of the order and such declaration shall be conclusive evidence that the owner, landlord or tenant has not so resided."

The question whether the declaration made is conclusive evidence as regards the person entitled to reside in the premises came up for decision before Mr. Justice S. T. Desai in *Dwarkanadas Gordhandas v. The State of Bombay*¹.

No. 230 of 1953, decided by S. T. Desai J. on

In that case, to use the language of the learned Judge, the argument was that the declaration was conclusive evidence not merely of the fact of absence of occupation but also of the fact as to who was the tenant. Dealing with that argument, the learned Judge has expressed himself in emphatic terms as follows:—

"...The proposition seemed to me to be a startling and menacing one and I expressed the view that the language of the section did not confer any such power on the Requisitioning authority and the only merit of the contention lay in the boldness of the claim. The question of title could not be decided by the Authorities."

The learned Judge has, thereafter, referred to a judgment of the Appeal Court in which the view taken was that the order would be bad if it was established that the sub-tenant, not referred to in the order, had all along been in possession and occupation of the premises and was in possession at the date of the requisition order.

I was also referred to a decision of a Division Bench of this Court consisting of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Shah in Jamnadas Ramchand v. The State of Bombay.¹ In that case the order of requisition dated March 20, 1953, recited that on inquiry it was found that Mrs. R. Craven, the tenant, was the person lawfully entitled to reside in the part of the building therein mentioned. The order of requisition was passed on the footing that Mrs. R. Craven had not resided in the said part of the building for a continuous period of six months immediately preceding the date of the order. Jamnadas Ramchand, the petitioner in that case, contended that he had been accepted as a tenant by the landlord after Mrs. Craven had left the premises at the end of July 1950 and that he was the person lawfully entitled to occupy the said premises. The learned Chief Justice in the course of his judgment observes as follows:—

"Before the petitioner can succeed he must establish that he was lawfully in possession of the premises, and the first contention that we have to consider is whether the petitioner has succeeded in establishing his case that he was accepted as a tenant by the landlord after Mrs. Craven left the premises at the end of July 1950."

On the facts of that case the appeal Court came to the conclusion that the appellant had failed to prove that the landlord had accepted him as a tenant and that a new tenancy came into existence on the departure of Mrs. Craven from India. That decision clearly shows that the appeal Court did not regard the declaration as being conclusive on the question of the person entitled to occupy the premises as a tenant.

Reliance has been placed on behalf of the respondent upon a decision of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice S. T. Desai in State of B'bay v. M. C. Menon.² That was a case dealing with an order of requisition passed under the provisions of sub-s. (4) of s. 6 of the Act. In that case the premises were used for the purpose of business and the previous tenant had on September 22, 1955, assigned that business to the petitioner for a consideration and had put the petitioner in possession of the premises. The order of requisition was passed on April 22, 1957, and it recited that the premises had become vacant in the month of September 1955. In that case the learned Chief Justice, who delivered the judgment of the Court, referred to his own remarks in the case of Mohsinali Mahomedali v. State of Bombay,³ where at p. 97 he had observed that on a declaration being made by Government that there was a vacancy, that declaration was conclusive both as to the facts and also as to the legal requirements which the law made necessary. He further observed that not only it was not competent to the petitioner to challenge the facts on which the declaration was based, but it was also not open to the petitioner to challenge the order on the ground that it did not comply with the requirements of vacancy laid down in the Requisition Act. He took the view that under art. 226 it was not open to the Court to go behind the declaration on a question of fact or on a question of law. That is not a decision in respect of the provisions contained in s. 5 of the Act. There is a limitation upon the exercise of the powers conferred by s. 5 of the Act. Under the proviso to s. 5(1) it has been expressly stated that no building or part thereof wherein the owner, the landlord or the tenant, as the case may be, has actually resided for a continuous period of six months immediately preceding the date of the order shall be requisitioned under that section. Government is not constituted the sole Judge to determine the person who was the real owner, landlord or tenant of the premises which are sought to be requisitioned. The Government is not enabled by an erroneous decision to deprive the real owner, landlord or tenant of his rights. The making of the inquiry and the making of the declaration referred to in s. 5(2) is constituted a condition of the passing of a valid order of requisition under s. 5(1). Under s. 5 the declaration is made conclusive as regards the actual non-residence of the person referred to in the order for a continuous period of six months immediately preceding the date of the order. The declaration does not preclude the real owner, landlord or tenant from showing that he is the real owner, landlord or tenant and not the person mentioned in the declaration.

Another decision referred to on behalf of the respondent was an unreported judgment of a Division Bench of this Court consisting of Mr. Justice Tendolkar and Mr. Justice S. T. Desai in Dashrath Lazman Jaya v. D. B. Patil, *Accommodation Officer, Govt. of Bombay*¹. In that case Mr. Justice Tendolkar, who delivered the judgment of the Court, observes as under:—

"...no-doubt, the State Government has to decide for itself who was the person entitled to reside in the premises, whether he was the owner, the landlord or the tenant; but we find nothing in the words of this sub-section which requires the Government to declare whether the owner, the landlord or the tenant was entitled to reside. Having determined that question for themselves, they have to determine whether the person entitled to reside resided therein for a continuous period of six months prior to the making of the order and making the relevant declaration.... Therefore, in law, in our opinion, there is no obligation on the State Government to declare in the declaration that the person who, according to them, has not resided in the premises occupied the character of an owner or a landlord or a tenant, so long as they have in fact determined for themselves who was entitled to occupy the premises."

This decision does not deal with the question which has been raised before me. In my view, the decision of Mr. Justice S. T. Desai in Dwarkanadas Gordhandas v. The State of Bombay is still good law and I am in respectful agreement with that decision.

It is then urged on behalf of the respondent that there is a disputed question of fact which arises on the present petition and that the remedy by way of a petition for the issue of a writ is not the proper remedy. It is urged that the petitioner's claim that he is the real tenant of the premises is not admitted. It is further urged that according to the declaration made by the respondent, Chandravadan C. Mehta was the person who was the tenant of the said premises. I find that in the affidavit in reply to the petition, dated February 21, 1958, it has been stated in express terms by the Accommodation Officer in para. 7 as follows:—

"I say that the landlords issued rent receipts in the name of the petitioner from January 1956 and that the rent receipts were issued in the name of the said Mr. Mehta till the end of 1955. I submit that the landlords recognised the said Mehta as tenant and passed receipts in his name till the end of 1955. The landlords were not entitled to accept the petitioner as tenant in and from January 1956 as they purported to do. The landlords ought to have given intimation of vacancy which they failed to do. I deny that the petitioner was and is the lawful tenant of the premises."

In para. 6 of that affidavit it is stated as follows:—

"From the information available to Government, it appeared that Shri Chandravadan C. Mehta the tenant of the premises in question ceased to occupy the premises in or about 1953 and passed on the said premises unauthorisedly and in contravention of the provisions of law, to the petitioner in or about January 1956."

¹ (1957) O. C. J. Appeal No. 42 of 1957, September 16, 1957 (Unrep.), decided by Tendolkar and S. T. Desai JJ. on

Having regard to the statement made in that affidavit that the landlords issued rent receipts in the name of the petitioner from January 1956, it is clear that so far as the landlords were concerned, they recognised, as from January 1956, the petitioner as their tenant. The only contention that is sought to be raised on behalf of the respondent is a contention based on law viz. that as no intimation of vacancy had been given by the landlords, they were not entitled to accept the petitioner as their tenant from January 1956, as they had purported to do, and that there was no lawful tenancy of the premises created in favour of the petitioner. This point is, however, covered by a decision of our appeal Court in *Mahomed Husain v. Trivedi*¹. It is a decision of a Division Bench of this Court consisting of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Bhagwati. In that case the learned Chief Justice in delivering the judgment of the Court observes at p. 660 as follows:—

"...The question is whether any rights are created as between a landlord and a tenant in a case where the landlord fails to give intimation or fails to get permission from Government as required by s. 6. It is clear that if the landlord contravenes the provisions of s. 6, he renders himself liable to penal consequences. But does that mean that no right is created as between landlord and tenant? Looking to the scheme of s. 6 it is clear that s. 6 is not intended in any way to modify the ordinary law of landlord and tenant. The Land Requisition Act requires the landlord to give intimation to the Government of a vacancy because Government can deal with such vacancies by allocating it to persons who are in need of property, and if the landlord does not conform to the scheme, he is penalised for his action. But there is no reason why we should assume from that that if a landlord has created a tenancy in favour of a tenant contrary to the provisions of s. 6, no right is created in the tenant himself. Section 6 does not render a tenancy created void. It only penalises the action of the landlord in that he created the tenancy without the permission of Government."

In view of the aforesaid judgment, once the fact of the landlords having given the tenancy to the petitioner in January 1956 is accepted, the tenancy must be held to be a lawful tenancy and the contention urged on behalf of the respondent must fail. On the admissions made in the affidavit in reply itself, it must be held that there was a tenancy created in the month of January 1956 in favour of the petitioner. On such tenancy being created, the petitioner as such tenant was lawfully entitled to reside in the said premises and not Chandravadan C. Mehta. In this view of the matter, the declaration that has been made is bad.

In the case of *Maneklal v. Collector of Ahmedabad*², the learned Chief Justice in delivering the judgment of a Division Bench of this Court has, in connection with the provisions of s. 5(2) of the Act, observed at p. 993 as follows:—

"...An inquiry is made obligatory in every case where a building or part thereof is to be requisitioned... Whatever the nature of the building, if the Government wishes to requisition a building, it must hold the inquiry mentioned in sub-s. (2) of s. 5." In dealing with the argument urged in that case that even though an inquiry is obligatory under the aforesaid provision a declaration is not obligatory, the learned Chief Justice observes as follows (p. 993):—

"...It is clear that reading sub-s. (2) as a whole the position is that both an inquiry and the making of a declaration are obligatory."

In this case, the declaration as regards the person lawfully entitled to reside in the premises being bad, the condition precedent to the requisitioning of the premises has not been fulfilled and the order must be held to be bad and is liable to be set aside.

The petitioner has in the petition also challenged the order on the ground that no inquiry was in fact held or that in any event if there was an inquiry held, it was but a pretence of an inquiry. This ground was not pressed before me and it is not necessary for me to deal with the same.

It is further urged that the order was passed mala fide. There is no substance in this contention and it has not been seriously pressed before me. There is no substance in any of the other contentions urged on behalf of the petitioner.

In the result, the petitioner is entitled to succeed and I direct the issue of a writ of mandamus in terms of prayer (a) of the petition. The respondent to pay to the petitioner the costs of the petition, the costs being fixed at Rs. 325, inclusive of the costs of the notice.

Petition allowed.

KODAN RANGLAL POWER v. BOMBAY REVENUE TRIBUNAL.*

Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights (Estates, Mahals, Alienated Lands) Act (I of 1951), Secs. 40, 41†—Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code (II of 1955), Secs. 241, 147, 240(2), 239††, 104—C.P. Land Revenue Act (II of 1917), Sec. 46—Application for conferral of Malik Makbuzi under s. 41 of Act I of 1951 based on accrual of right of occupancy tenant under s. 40 of Act—Appeal against order made on application pending when Act II of 1955 came into force which repealed s. 40 of Act—Whether appeal lapsed because of repeal of s. 40.

*Decided, July 10, 1958. Special Civil Application No. 67 of 1958 (with Special Civil Applications Nos. 92, 93 and 109 of 1958).

† "S. 40. Any land not included in home-farm but brought under cultivation by the proprietor after the agricultural year 1948-49 shall continue in the possession of such proprietor and shall be deemed to be settled with him by the State Government on such terms and conditions as may be prescribed.

S. 41. Except in such areas as the State Government may, by notification, exclude from the operation of this section, every absolute occupancy tenant who, at any time before the date of vesting or within six months therefrom, or such further period as the State Government may from time to time notify pays to the State Government an amount equal to three times the annual rent for the time being payable by him for his holding and every occupancy tenant who likewise pays to the State Government an amount equal to four times such rent, shall on and from the date of vesting or the date of such payment, whichever is later, be declared in the prescribed manner to be a Malik Makbuzi of the land comprised in his holding."

†† S. 241 "All applications for conferral of Malik Makbuzi rights, filed under sections 41, 56 and 69 of Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights (Estates, Mahals, Alienated Lands) Act, 1950, pending on the date of the coming into force of this Code shall, notwithstanding the repeal of the said Act, be heard and decided in accordance with the provisions contained therein as if the said Act had not been repealed.

147. Every person who at the coming into force of this Code belongs to any of the following classes shall be called a Bhumidari and shall have all the rights and be subject to all the liabilities conferred or imposed upon a Bhumidari by or under this Code, namely:—

(a) every person in respect of land held by him as an occupancy tenant in the Central Provinces;

(b) every person in respect of land held by him as a raiyat or raiyat sarkar in the Central Provinces;

(c) every person in respect of land held by him as a raiyat or tenant in the merged territories;

(d) every person in respect of land held by him as a lessee of the State Government under sub-section (3) of section 68 of the Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights (Estates, Mahals, Alienated Lands) Act, 1950, not falling under clause (f) of section 146.

240. (2) Any reference in any enactment other than the Central Provinces Land Alienation Act, 1916, to—

(a) an occupancy tenant,

(b) a raiyat;

(c) a tenant; and

(d) a permanent tenant

shall be deemed to be a reference to a Bhumidari.

239. All rules, assessments, appointments and transfers made, notification and proclamations issued, authorities and powers conferred, farms and leases granted, records of rights and other records framed or confirmed, rights acquired, liabilities incurred, times and places appointed, and other things done under any of the enactments hereby repealed shall, so far as may be, be deemed to have been respectively made, issued, conferred, granted, framed, revised, confirmed, acquired, incurred, appointed and done under this Code."

The applicant made an application under s. 40 of the Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, 1950, for conferral of malik makbuz right in respect of certain land, contending that under s. 40 of the Act read with r. 1 framed thereunder he had become an occupancy tenant of the land and, therefore, he was entitled under s. 41 of the Act to be declared a malik makbuz of the land upon payment by him of the requisite rent. On July 12, 1955, the applicant filed an appeal against the order made on his application to the M.P. Board of Revenue under s. 40 of the Act. Pending the appeal the M.P. Land Revenue Code, 1954, came into force on October 1, 1955, and it repealed, among other provisions, s. 40 of the Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, 1950. On the question whether the appeal lapsed because of the repeal of s. 40 of the Act, upon which the applicant's right was founded:—

Held, that the foundation of the application under s. 41 of the Act was the right conferred by s. 40 of the Act which right had already accrued to the applicant and was not taken away by any of the provisions of the Code, that as the proceedings before the Tribunal arose out of the application made by the applicant under s. 41 of the Act, the application was saved by s. 241 of the Code, that the order made under s. 41 of the Act was made appealable under s. 84 of the Act and that section was not repealed by the Code, and that, therefore, the appeal did not lapse.

A right acquired under s. 40 of the Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, 1950, is saved by s. 239 of the M.P. Land Revenue Code, 1954, read with ss. 147 and 240 of the Code.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

Y. V. Jakatdar, for the petitioner.

N. L. Abhyankar, for respondents Nos. 2 and 3.

MUDHOLKAR J. This is a petition under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution for the issue of a writ of certiorari quashing the order of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal dated November 7, 1957, and for issue of such other writ, order or direction as may be approved. This petition was heard along with Special Civil Applications Nos. 92/58, 93/58 and 109/58.

In all these petitions the point taken is that the Bombay Revenue Tribunal was in error in dismissing the appeals before it upon the basis of the decision in Surendraraj v. State of Bombay.¹ That is a decision of a Full Bench of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal itself. Since the facts out of which these petitions arise are somewhat different it will be desirable to make separate mention of the facts out of which each petition arises.

We shall first deal with petition No. 67 of 1958. Here, the petitioner had made an application to the Additional Deputy Commissioner, Gondia, under s. 40 of the Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, 1950, for the conferral of malik makbuz right in respect of certain land. In that application the petitioner contended that though the land to which the application related was not included in the home-farm in 1948-49, it was brought under cultivation by him as the proprietor after the agricultural year 1948-49, that it was in his possession and that he had, therefore, become, under s. 40 of the Act read with r. 1 framed under that Act, an occupancy tenant of this land. He was consequently entitled under s. 41 of the Act to be declared a malik makbuz of the land upon payment by him of three times the annual rent. It may be mentioned that the annual rent had not been fixed with respect to this land and one of the prayers of the petitioner was that this also should be fixed. His application was allowed partially by the Additional Deputy Commissioner. Against that part of the application which was not allowed by the Additional Deputy Commissioner, the petitioner preferred an appeal before the M.P. Board of Revenue on July 12, 1955, under s. 40 of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, 1950. The M.P. Land Revenue Code came into force on October 1, 1955. It repealed, among other provisions, s. 40 of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act. The Bombay Revenue Tribunal, following its decision in Surendraraj's case, held that the appeal had lapsed because s. 40, upon which the petitioner's right was founded, was repealed by the M.P. Land Revenue Code.

In Surendraraj's case a Full Bench of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal held that s. 40 of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act is not saved by s. 241 of the M.P. Land Revenue Code and that, therefore, though the M.P. Land Revenue Code came into force during the pendency of the appeal, the appeal had lapsed and could not be proceeded with. One of the principles of construction upon which the Bombay Revenue Tribunal proceeded was quoted with approval by the learned Judges of the Nagpur High Court in Chhote Khan v. Mohammad Obedullakhan.¹ That principle is that a repeal will generally divest all inchoate rights which have arisen under the repealed statute and destroy all accrued causes of action based thereon and that as a result, such a repeal, without the saving clause, will destroy any proceedings, whether not yet begun, or whether pending at the time of the enactment of the repealing Act, and not already prosecuted to a final judgment, so as to create a vested right.

It seems to us that the view of the Full Bench of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal to the effect that because of the repeal of s. 40 of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act the appeal had lapsed is not correct. It must be borne in mind that the application of the petitioner in this petition is not under s. 40 of the Act but is under s. 41 of that Act. Applications under s. 41 of the Act, which were pending on the date on which the M.P. Land Revenue Code came into force, have been specifically saved by the provisions of s. 241 of the Code. It is true that the foundation of the application under s. 41 was the right conferred by s. 40 of the Act. This was a right which had already accrued to the petitioner and this right has not been taken away by any of the provisions of the M.P. Land Revenue Code.

Upon the allegation made by the petitioner he had acquired the right of an occupancy tenant before the M.P. Land Revenue Code came into force. Section 40 did not require any application from a person who asserted his right under that section before acquiring that right. Nor does s. 40 contemplate any order to be made by a Revenue Authority conferring upon that person the right of an occupancy tenant. In that respect s. 40 is different from s. 41 which requires intervention of a Revenue Officer and requires the passing of an order. It also requires payment of some money before the right specified in that section could be acquired by a person. That acquisition of a right under s. 40 by the person who fulfils the conditions laid down therein was automatic. A person who had acquired such a right, would, under s. 147 of the M.P. Land Revenue Code read with s. 240(2) thereof, become a Bhumidhari under the M.P. Land Revenue Code. The rights acquired under the enactments repealed by the M.P. Code are saved by s. 239 of that Code. In these circumstances it is clear that the repeal of s. 40 of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act does not in any way affect a proceeding of the kind that was taken before the Bombay Revenue Tribunal.

As we have already stated, the proceeding before the Bombay Revenue Tribunal arose out of the application made by the petitioner under s. 41 of the Act. Such an application is saved by s. 241 even though s. 40 itself has been repealed by the M.P. Land Revenue Code. An order of a Deputy Commissioner or Additional Deputy Commissioner in respect of a matter under s. 41 of the Act is made appealable by s. 84 of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act. That section has not been repealed by the M.P. Land Revenue Code. In these circumstances, disagreeing with the Bombay Revenue Tribunal we hold that the appeal does not lapse and also point out that this is not a case to which the principles laid down in Chhotekhan's case at all apply.

We shall now deal with Special Civil Applications Nos. 92 and 93 of 1958. In these cases the petitioners, Shree Laxminarayan Deosthan, had made two applications before the Additional Deputy Commissioner, Chanda, sitting at Wardha, but the reliefs which were asked for in these two applications were different. In one of the applications the relief asked for was the correction of the entries in the annual papers. In the other application, the prayer was for allotting four fields for grazing purposes in occupancy rights. The prayer for the correction of the entries was rejected. As regards the other application, an order was passed to the effect that four of the fields specified by the petitioners shall be reserved for grazing purposes in occupancy rights. It was further ordered that these fields should be assessed and a patta should be given to the petitioners. A common order was passed with regard to both these cases. Shri Mandlekar says it is because of this that he preferred two appeals before the Bombay Revenue Tribunal. Both these appeals were dismissed by the Tribunal on the ground that s. 40 of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act having been repealed these appeals had lapsed.

It is not clear to us why Shri Mandlekar should have preferred an appeal against that part of the order of the Additional Deputy Commissioner which had really granted him the relief which he had sought, i.e. reservation of some land for grazing purposes. However, we need not go into that matter. Upon the view we have taken it is clear that the repeal of s. 40 of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act does not in any way affect the petitioners' right to have the entry in the record-of-rights corrected. The right to have an entry corrected is recognised by s. 46 of the C.P. Land Revenue Act, 1917. Section 104 of the M.P. Land Revenue Code which corresponds to that section also recognises this right. That being so, we cannot uphold the dismissal of the appeals upon the ground given by the Bombay Revenue Tribunal. It may be that the appeals may fail on some other ground; but that is not a matter which is argued before us and therefore we need not deal with it.

Finally, we will deal with Special Civil Application No. 109 of 1958. Here, the petitioner had made an application for the correction of the record-of-rights on February 26, 1952. This application was dismissed by the Additional Deputy Commissioner, Nagpur, sitting at Umrer, on August 24, 1955. An appeal preferred by the petitioner before the Bombay Revenue Tribunal was dismissed by it on the ground that it had lapsed because of the repeal of s. 40 of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act. It is no doubt true that in his application to the Additional Deputy Commissioner the petitioner had founded his claim for the correction of the entry under s. 40 of the Act. But as we have already stated, the repeal of s. 40 does not affect the petitioners' right to have his application for the correction of entries considered because such right, if any, which he has acquired under s. 40 is saved by s. 239 of the M.P. Land Revenue Code read with ss. 147 and 240 thereof.

Upon this view, we allow all the petitions and remit the appeals to the Bombay Revenue Tribunal for being heard and disposed of on merits. Costs so far incurred, including those of this Court, will abide the event.

v. THE COMMISSIONER OF SALES TAX.

Central Provinces and Berar Sales Tax Act (XXI of 1947), Secs. 22B, 22, 22A, 11A.—Assessment order passed by Regional Assistant Commissioner passed prior to coming into force of s. 22B—Whether Sales Tax Commissioner can exercise his revisional powers under s. 22B in respect of such order—Construction of statute—When can statute be presumed not to be retrospective in operation—Whether presumption against retrospective construction applicable to enactments which affect only procedure and practice of Courts or tribunals.

The revisional powers under s. 22B of the Central Provinces and Berar Sales Tax Act, 1947, can be exercised by the Commissioner of Sales Tax even in respect of orders of subordinate authorities passed prior to December 1, 1953 (when s. 22B came into force), provided the revisional order is passed by him before the expiry of two years from the date of the order sought to be revised.

Bisessar House v. State of Bombay,¹ referred to.

Every statute which takes away or impairs vested rights acquired under existing laws, or creates a new obligation, or imposes a new duty, or attaches a new disability in respect of transactions or considerations already past, must be presumed, out of respect to the Legislature, to be intended not to have a retrospective operation. But the presumption against retrospective construction has no application to enactments which affect only the procedure and practice of Courts or tribunals.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

M. N. Phadke, for the applicant.

N. L. Abhyankar, Special Government Pleader, for the opponent.

GOKHALE J. The assessee in both these civil references had submitted his returns under the Central Provinces and Berar Sales Tax Act, 1947 (XXI of 1947), for two years covering the period between October 22, 1949, to November 9, 1950, and November 10, 1950, to October 30, 1951, and he was assessed by the Regional Assistant Commissioner of Sales Tax, Amravati, by his orders dated August 18, 1953, in respect of both the periods. The amounts of assessment were paid by the assessee in pursuance of those orders. Thereafter, notices were issued by the Commissioner of Sales Tax, Nagpur, under s. 22B of the C. P. and Berar Sales Tax Act, calling upon the assessee to show cause why the assessment orders passed by the Regional Assistant Commissioner, Amravati, should not be set aside. In reply to the said notices, the applicant filed written objections, contending inter alia that s. 22B, which came into force on December 1, 1953, by virtue of Act No. XX of 1953, could not apply in respect of the assessment orders passed on August 18, 1953, and the Commissioner had no power to revise those orders by virtue of the powers conferred upon him under s. 22B. It may be mentioned that under the original orders, the Regional Assistant Commissioner of Sales Tax, Amravati, had granted exemption to the assessee in respect of certain sales of cloth, on the ground that these sales were pure exports and they were exempted under the provisions of art. 286(1)(b) of the Constitution. The Commissioner rejected the assessee's contention regarding his revisional powers under s. 22B of the Sales Tax Act, and on the merits he took a different view from that taken by the Regional Assistant Commissioner of Sales Tax regarding the exemption to be given to the sales of cloth and held that the sales in question were taxable. He, therefore, set aside the assessment orders and remanded the two cases to the Regional Assistant Commissioner with a direction to proceed with the assessment of the assessee in the light of his revisional orders. These revisional orders in the two cases were passed by the Commissioner on April 26, 1954, that is to say, before the expiry of two years from the date of the original orders which were passed on August 18, 1953. Against this decision of the Commissioner, the assessee filed appeals before the Board of Revenue which was then the appellate authority, and the Board of Revenue of Madhya Pradesh relying upon its Division Bench ruling in Appeal No. 4/XXXXIII-7 of 1955, dated May 14, 1956, dismissed the appeals of the assessee. In respect of this decision of the Board of Revenue, the assessee filed applications under s. 23(1) of the Sales Tax Act, requesting that the question as to whether the revisional powers under s. 22B of the Sales Tax Act could be made applicable to orders passed by the Regional Taxing Authority on August 18, 1953, should be referred for decision to the High Court. These applications came before the Sales Tax Tribunal which has now replaced the Board of Revenue and by its order dated July 24, 1957, the Tribunal has referred to us the following two questions:

1. Whether s. 22B applies to cases in which the order sought to be revised was passed before the said section came into operation?

2. Whether the Commissioner of Sales Tax was justified in law in re-opening the assessment made in these cases and making an order of remand?

Now, Mr. Phadke, the learned advocate appearing on behalf of the assessee, has contended, in the first instance, that under question No. 2 referred to us, the Sales Tax Tribunal intended that the High Court should also go into the question of the merits of the assessment order of the Sales Tax Commissioner. We are not prepared to accept this argument. It is clear from the record that the only question that was argued before the Board of Revenue on behalf of the assessee was whether the Sales Tax Commissioner could invoke the revisional powers conferred on him by s. 22B of the Sales Tax Act with a view to revising the orders that were passed before the said section came into force on December 1, 1953. The merits of the order of assessment do not appear to have been challenged before the Board of Revenue, and, in our opinion, under the second question which has been framed by it, the Sales Tax Tribunal has not referred the merits of the assessment order to this Court.

The only question, therefore, which falls to be considered in these references is whether the Sales Tax Commissioner could exercise his revisional powers under s. 22B of the Sales Tax Act, so as to affect orders which were passed prior to the coming into force of this section on December 1, 1953; and it is contended by Mr. Phadke on behalf of the assessee that s. 22B, which, along with other sections, was inserted by the M. P. Act No. XX of 1953 in substitution of the original s. 22, could not have any retrospective operation so as to affect the orders passed in these cases on August 18, 1953. Now, in order to examine this contention, it would be necessary to look into the provisions of the original s. 22 of the Sales Tax Act and the new sections which replaced it by virtue of the amending Act No. XX of 1953. Section 22, as it originally stood, was a composite section dealing with appeals against original orders of the taxing authorities, as well as the revisional powers of the Commissioner, as also of the Tribunal. Under sub-s. (4) of s. 22, every order passed in appeal was, subject to the provisions of sub-s. (5) and s. 23, to be final. Under sub-s. (5) of s. 22, which dealt with the revisional powers, it was provided:

"Subject to rules made under this Act and for reasons to be recorded in writing, the Commissioner upon application or of his own motion may revise any order passed under this Act or the rules thereunder by a person appointed under section 3 to assist him, and subject as aforesaid, the Tribunal may, in like manner, revise any order passed by the Commissioner:

Provided that before rejecting any application for the revision of any such order the Commissioner or the Tribunal, as the case may be, shall consider it and shall record reasons for such rejection."

It is obvious from this sub-section that the Commissioner had the power to revise any order passed by an authority appointed under s. 3 to assist him, either upon an application made by the assessee or by an action suo motu on his part. This power was to be exercised in accordance with the rules framed under the Act; and Mr. Phadke in this connection drew our attention to r. 57 of the C. P. and Berar Sales Tax Rules, 1947, which provided that an application for revision of an order shall be made within 30 days of the passing of the order. The proviso to this rule stated that no application for revision of any order of assessment passed in an appeal shall be entertained by any authority unless it was satisfied that the petition for revision raised a substantial question of law, and that the tax with penalty, if any, in respect of which the application was made, had been paid along with the application. It will, therefore, be observed from this rule that an application for revision, if it was preferred by the assessee, had to be made within 30 days of the passing of the order he sought to challenge. But there does not seem to have been any period of limitation if the Commissioner wanted to revise an original or appellate order acting on his own motion. By virtue of the Amending Act of 1953, the original s. 22 was substituted by ss. 22, 22A, 22B and 22C. New s. 22A(1) refers to the power of the Commissioner on his own motion to call for the record of any proceedings under the Act, in which an order has been passed by any subordinate authority, and after making such enquiry or causing such enquiry to be made and subject to the provisions of the Act, to pass such order thereon as he thought fit, provided the order so passed was not an order prejudicial to the dealer and the order under revision was not made more than one year previously. Under sub-s. (2) of s. 22A, the Commissioner could be moved also by a dealer for revision, provided the application was made within one year from the date of the order sought to be revised. It would, therefore, appear from s. 22A(2) that instead of the period of 30 days provided under r. 57, the assessee was given the right to apply in revision to the Commissioner against an original or appellate order within one year from the date of the order. Then comes s. 22B with which we are concerned in these references and it runs as follows:

"(1) The Commissioner may call for and examine the record of any proceeding under this Act and if he considers that any order passed therein by any person appointed under section 3 to assist him is erroneous in so far as it is prejudicial to the interests of the revenue, he may, after giving the dealer an opportunity of being heard and after making or causing to be made such enquiry as he deems necessary, pass such order thereon as the circumstances of the case justify including an order enhancing or modifying the assessment, or cancelling the assessment and directing a fresh assessment.

(2) No order shall be made under sub-section (1) after the expiry of two years from the date of the order sought to be revised.

(3) Any dealer objecting to an order passed by the Commissioner under sub-section (1) may appeal to the Tribunal within sixty days of the date on which the order is communicated to him."

Section 22C deals with the power of the Commissioner or the appellate authority to impose penalty, but we are not concerned in this case with that section.

Now, the whole of Mr. Phadke's contention in these references is that the powers given to the Commissioner under s. 22B are powers to revise orders of any authority subordinate to him and these powers can be exercised by him suo motu without an application by the assessee; and according to Mr. Phadke, these revisional powers could not be exercised by the Commissioner in respect of orders passed prior to December 1, 1953, on which date this section came into force, because, according to Mr. Phadke, the new section gave a wider power of revision to the Commissioner than the old s. 22(5) which ceased to have force on November 30, 1953. The argument of Mr. Phadke appears to be that under r. 57, as it originally stood, a revisional application against an order of assessment passed in appeal could only be entertained if the Commissioner was satisfied that the petition for revision raised a substantial question of law. Mr. Phadke concedes that this r. 57 would only apply to applications for revision made to the Commissioner but would not apply to action taken by the Commissioner suo motu. But he contends that the same limitation of a requirement of a substantial question of law will have to be imported when the Commissioner exercised his powers to revise the orders of his subordinates when he took action suo motu; and according to Mr. Phadke, under the present s. 22B the Commissioner is empowered to revise an order of any authority subordinate to him even if it is merely erroneous in so far as it is prejudicial to the interests of the Revenue, and it is Mr. Phadke's contention that under the new section, the powers of revision conferred on the Commissioner are wider, and, therefore, that section cannot be given any retrospective operation. We are not prepared to accept this argument. Rule 57 dealt with applications for revision and it provided a period of 30 days within which the application for revision could be filed. As I have already pointed out, under the new s. 22A(2) that period has been actually enlarged to a period of one year from the date of the order, so that the right of the assessee to file revisional applications has been placed on a footing more beneficial to the assessee, inasmuch as under the new s. 22A he now gets a period of one year within which to make an application for revision. Rule 57, as it originally stood, did not deal with the case of revision by the Commissioner acting suo motu, and the requirement in the proviso as to a question of law was confined to cases of revision of an order of assessment passed in appeal. We are not, therefore, prepared to accept Mr. Phadke's contention that the Commissioner's power of revision suo motu under old s. 22(5) could only be exercised if the order of the subordinate authority was erroneous on a question of law. In our opinion, therefore, the present s. 22B does not impose any greater disability on the assessee when the Commissioner seeks to exercise his power suo motu on the ground that any order passed by the subordinate authority was erroneous in so far as it was prejudicial to the interests of the revenue. On the other hand, whereas under the old s. 22(5) there was no period of limitation provided, within which the Commissioner could revise the orders of the subordinate authorities, under s. 22B, sub-s. (2), the Commissioner can exercise his powers of revision, provided he does so before the expiry of two years from the date of the order sought to be revised. Therefore, in a sense, greater protection is afforded to the tax-paying dealer, in that no order passed by a subordinate authority would be subject to revision at the hands of the Commissioner acting suo motu after the expiry of two years from the date of the order.

The second contention of Mr. Phadke is that in the present case, the orders of assessment which were passed on August 18, 1953, were in respect of the assessment period for the years 1949-50 and 1950-51. The Commissioner's order of revision is undoubtedly passed within a period of two years of the original order of assessment as provided under sub-s. (2) of s. 22B. But Mr. Phadke contends that, in effect, the Commissioner seeks to re-open the assessment on the ground of a wrong deduction allowed by the Regional Assistant Commissioner, and that, according to Mr. Phadke, would come within the ambit of s. 11A, and since admittedly three years had elapsed on April 26, 1954, from the first period of assessment, namely, October 22, 1949, to November 9, 1950, at least the order of revision with reference to that period would be bad. In this connection Mr. Phadke relies on a recent decision in Bisesar House v. State of Bombay.¹ In our judgment, this argument is clearly misconceived. Section 11A deals with the power of the Commissioner and of persons to whom these powers are delegated under s. 16, to re-open an assessment where the authority is satisfied that any turnover of a dealer during any period has been under-assessed or has escaped assessment or assessed at a lower rate or any deduction has been wrongly made therefrom; and the power of the Commissioner under s. 11A is subject to the period of limitation of 3 calendar years from the expiry of the assessment period. It is true that s. 11A was given retrospective effect by M. P. Act No. XX of 1953 from June 1, 1947, and that was possibly the reason why the Legislature provided for a period of three calendar years from the expiry of the assessment period, so that the assessee may not be subjected to harassment after a considerable lapse of time. Section 11A deals with the power of the original assessing authority and has no relation to the revisional powers of the Commissioner provided under old s. 22(5) and under the present s. 22B. We are not, therefore, prepared to accept Mr. Phadke's contention that because s. 22B(2) does not correlate the period of limitation to the period of assessment, a greater disability is imposed on the assessee. What is contemplated under s. 11A is an action by the original assessing authority when it finds in consequence of any information which has come into its possession that there has been a case of under-assessment or escapement of assessment. The Full Bench of this Court on which Mr. Phadke relies decided to read ss. 11 and 11A together and held that notice issued under sub-s. (2) of s. 11 would be bad if it was issued three calendar years after the expiry of the period of assessment. But it has to be remembered that the notice contemplated under sub-s. (2) of s. 11 is a notice issued by the taxing authority before the original order of assessment is passed, and would, as the Full Bench points out, in the substantial sense be an initiation of fresh proceedings by the Commissioner. On the other hand, s. 22B(2) has itself provided for a period of limitation and that period is two years from the date of the order sought to be revised. There is, therefore, no scope for importing a further period of limitation from s. 11A as urged by Mr. Phadke. As I have already pointed out, under the original s. 22(5) which was in force till November 30, 1953, it was not necessary for the Commissioner to pass his order in revision within two years of the date of the order sought to be revised. The second contention of Mr. Phadke, therefore, that s. 22B could not affect orders passed prior to December 1, 1953, because it is not correlated, in any manner, to the period of assessment and, therefore, could not be given retrospective operation, is unsound and cannot be accepted.

Mr. Phadke has not disputed and cannot dispute the fact that the orders of assessment prior to November 30, 1953, were not final but subject to the provisions of ss. 22 and 23. Even prior to November 30, 1953, the present orders could have been revised, and under s. 22(5) the orders could have been revised even after the expiry of the period of two years from August 18, 1953. Section 22B which came into force on December 1, 1953, actually places a further restriction on the revisional powers of the Commissioner, in that he has now to revise an order, if he takes action suo motu under that section within a period of two years from the date of the order sought to be revised. The principles on which the Court decides whether a statute is to be given retrospective operation or not are well settled. Every statute which takes away or impairs vested rights acquired under existing laws, or creates a new obligation, or imposes a new duty, or attaches a new disability in respect of transactions or considerations already past, must be presumed, out of respect to the Legislature, to be intended not to have a retrospective operation: see Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes, 10th edn., p. 215. But the presumption against retrospective construction has no application to enactments which affect only the procedure and practice of Courts or tribunals, Ibid p. 225. As I have already stated, Mr. Phadke's argument that the present s. 22B casts a greater disability on the assessee cannot be accepted. In our judgment, the new section merely regulates the exercise by the Sales Tax Commissioner of his powers of revision and does not whittle down, in any manner, the rights of the assessee, or impose any greater disability on him. It seems to us, in the circumstances, that s. 22B, which came into force on December 1, 1953, involves really nothing more than an alteration of procedure designed to regulate the exercise of revisional powers by the Commissioner. In our opinion, therefore, under s. 22B, the Commissioner would be entitled to revise orders passed prior to December 1, 1953, when that section came into force. At the same time, under sub-s. (2) of s. 22B, the revisional order itself cannot be passed after the expiry of two years from the date of the order sought to be revised.

As the questions framed by the Sales Tax Tribunal appear to us to be unnecessarily wider in scope we propose to answer those questions as follows:—

(1) The revisional powers under s. 22B can be exercised by the Commissioner even in respect of orders of subordinate authorities passed prior to December 1, 1953, provided the revisional order is passed by him before the expiry of two years from the date of the order sought to be revised: and

(2) The order of remand was justified in view of our answer to the first question. The applicant-assessee will pay the costs of the State in both the references.

Answers accordingly.

Before Mr. Justice Shah and Mr. Justice Datar.

ADDITIONAL SPECIAL LAND ACQUISITION OFFICER, POONA

SHANTARAM SHAMRAO GHOLE.*

Land Acquisition Act (I of 1894)—Compensation—Market value of land assessed on basis of hypothetical scheme for residential buildings by laying out plots—Valuation how to be arrived at—Whether price received on sale of one plot by claimant without benefit of normal amenities given to purchaser in respect of such plot decisive of value of land—Whether permissible to award claimant value of separate plot in which is reflected value of amenity of well laid-out road—Such claimant whether could also be separately paid value of land reserved for road.

In proceedings under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, in assessing the market value of land on the basis of a hypothetical scheme for residential buildings by laying out the land in plots, it is not what the claimant may have expected to receive by sale of the area of one or two plots out of the land which is to be decisive of the value of the land, but what the valuer may regard as the value of the plots aggregated after deducting the expenses of providing such amenities as water connections, well laid-out roads, drainage facility and electrical connections, which the purchasers may normally expect to obtain in the sector in which the land is situate.

In the valuation of land on the basis of a hypothetical building scheme it would be unfair to award to the claimant the value of the separate plots, in which is fully reflected the value of the additional amenity of having well laid-out roads and also separately to pay to the claimant the value of the land reserved for the road.

SHAH J. By a notification dated February 25, 1952, under s. 4 of the Land Acquisition Act, the Government of Bombay notified part of City Survey No. 869-A admeasuring 26010 sq. ft. of Nana Peth, Poona, as likely to be needed for a public purpose viz. vegetable market and a cart stand. The Land Acquisition Officer awarded to the claimant Rs. 61,470. In his view the land could be developed by laying it out into 14 building plots in two rows divided by a road. He awarded Re. 1 for the road-land admeasuring 289'×25' and for the balance he awarded compensation at the rate of Rs. 4-8-0 per square foot. In addition, the Land Acquisition Officer awarded to the claimant the 15 per cent.

*Decided, August 6, 1958. First Appeal No. 371 of 1956 (with Cross First Appeal No. 480 of 1957), from the decision of A. A. Badshah, Civil Judge, Senior Division, Poona, in Land Reference No. 2 of 1954.

solatium. The claimant, feeling dissatisfied with the award, applied for a reference under s. 18 of the Land Acquisition Act. The learned Civil Judge, Senior Division at Poona, who heard the reference, confirmed the valuation of the building land made by the Land Acquisition Officer, but he awarded to the claimant compensation at the rate of 14 annas per sq. ft. for the area of 289'×25' reserved under the scheme for the road. The Land Acquisition Officer, it appears, had made certain deductions in respect of the development of the land, such as deductions for expenses for constructing roads, and for providing electricity, water connections, drainage, and those deductions aggregated to Rs. 7,443. The learned Judge disallowed those deductions and awarded to the claimant Rs. 15,829-14-0 in addition to the amount awarded by the Land Acquisition Officer. The Land Acquisition Officer contends in this appeal that the additional amount awarded by the learned trial Judge should be disallowed to the claimant. The claimant claims an additional amount of Rs. 21,879-4-0 being the aggregate value of 895 sq. ft., and the value of the land reserved for road at the rate of Rs. 3-2-0 per sq. ft. He has also claimed 15 per cent. solatium on the additional amount.

C. Survey No. 369A, Nana Peth, is of inam tenure. Out of that land a portion in the northern half, 90 ft. in width having a frontage on a public road to its west and 289 ft. in length admeasuring in the aggregate 26010 sq. ft., was proposed to be acquired for the construction of the Poona City vegetable market and cart stand. It appears that out of this land two pieces 1305 sq. ft. in the north-east corner and 75 sq. ft. in the south-east could not be acquired under this notification as they belonged not to the claimant but to two other strangers, Parvatibai, wife of Bhikoba More, and Mahamad Alli Rehman Baksh. In the southern half of city Survey No. 369A, Nana Peth, stood two chawls. These chawls were mortgaged in the year 1947 and an amount of Rs. 1,543 was due as unpaid municipal taxes in respect of the chawls standing on this land. The land under acquisition abuts on the Math Road. On the north is the property of another person and to the south is a chawl belonging to the claimant.

The Land Acquisition Officer was of the view that the land had a building potentiality, it being within the built up sector of the Nana Peth locality. The learned trial Judge agreed with that view, and it is not disputed before us that the land under acquisition has to be assessed as building land, even though at the date of the notification it was lying open and unused.

In the year 1947 it appears that the claimant desired to convert this land into a building site, and he laid out the land into fourteen building plots. Plots 1 to 7 were on the northern side, and the remaining plots 8 to 14 were on the southern side. These two rows of plots were divided by a road 25 ft. in width. Out of the plots so laid out, plot No. 7 was sold by the claimant by a deed dated December 15, 1949, to one Parwatibai at the rate of Rs. 3-1-0 per sq. ft. The price charged for this land included not only the price of plot No. 7 but also of half the width of the road on which plot No. 7 abutted. The area of plot No. 7 was 930 sq. ft., but the claimant obtained the price from Parwatibai for an additional area of 375 sq. ft. on the footing that he was selling half the width of the road to Parwatibai under the sale-deed. In the sale-deed there was a covenant under which the purchaser was not to put up any structure in an area to the south of the demarcated plot admeasuring 12'-6"×30' and that she was to put up the structure only on 31'×30' with the permission of the municipality. It appears that an area adjacent to plot No. 14, which was an open piece of land also belonging to the claimant was sold at the rate of Rs. 3 per sq. ft. by sale-deed dated August 20, 1951.

There is no evidence of any sale about the date of acquisition of comparable land of this dimension in this sector and it is difficult to arrive at the valuation of the land at an overall rate. The claimant was again not receiving any income out of the land, and the valuation of the land cannot be made by capitalising the net income received by the claimant. The land being building land and undeveloped, valuation by capitalising the income even if some income was received may be unfair to the claimant. Nor is there any expert evidence about the market value of this land. In the circumstances, the only method of valuation which may usefully be adopted is the method of a hypothetical building scheme, which is often adopted in valuing lands in built up localities; and both the Land Acquisition Officer and the learned Civil Judge have adopted this method of valuation.

The Land Acquisition Officer valued plots Nos. 1 and 8 which abut on the Math Road at Rs. 5 per sq. ft. He valued the two easternmost plots at Rs. 3; and he valued plots Nos. 2, 3, 9 and 10 at Rs. 3-8-0 per sq. ft., and plots Nos. 4, 5, 6, 11, 12, 13 and 14 at Rs. 3 per sq. ft. The Land Acquisition Officer computed the aggregate price of plots Nos. 1 and 8 at Rs. 17,875, of plots Nos. 2, 3, 9 and 10 at Rs. 18,270, and of plots Nos. 4, 5, 6, 11, 12, 13 and 14 at Rs. 25,830. Adding thereto the value of Re. 1, which he regarded as the nominal value of the land reserved for the road, he awarded to the claimant Rs. 61,976. The Land Acquisition Officer then deferred the value of the land for two years at the rate of 5 per cent. on the view that all the plots may be disposed of in four years. He accordingly held that Rs. 56,212 was the value of the land at the date of the publication of the notification.

The learned trial Judge approved of the method of valuation adopted by the Land Acquisition Officer as fully developing all the potentialities of the land. He valued plots 1 and 8 at Rs. 5, and plots 2, 3, 9 and 10 at Rs. 3-8-0, and the remaining plots at Rs. 3. Neither side has in these appeals sought to challenge the valuation of the plots. The learned trial Judge was of the view that the Land Acquisition Officer was in error in assessing the market value of the open land reserved for the road at Re. 1 only. In his view compensation for the land reserved for the road should have been taken at 25 per cent. of the market value of the land forming the plots, even though that land was to be kept open as reserved for the road. In the view of the learned Judge, the Land Acquisition Officer was also in error in deducting the amount of Rs. 7,443 as estimated expenses for providing water mains, a drainage line and construction of roads. He expressed the view that the claimant had been able to sell plot No. 7 without any amenities such as were contemplated by the Land Acquisition Officer, and there was no condition in the sale-deed imposing an obligation upon the claimant to provide facility for drainage and water connection. He further observed that the claimant had realised price at the rate of Rs. 3-1-0 per sq. ft. for plot No. 7 without any condition of providing those amenities, and the claimant had also sold a plot to the north of plots Nos. 13 and 14 at the rate of Rs. 3 per sq. ft. in the year 1951 and even in that sale-deed there was no condition about providing the amenities. He then observed:

"It is hence apparent that the prices realised for these plots were without any condition for providing any such amenities to the purchasers of the plots. The same prices he would have realised for his remaining plots without any condition for providing the amenities stated above and hence the valuation of the plots made by the Land Acquisition Officer did not depend upon the condition that the above stated amenities would be provided for by the claimant, for the purchasers. I think, if the claimant had to provide the above stated amenities to the purchasers of the plots, the values of the plots would have gone further more than the values put down by the Land Acquisition Officer and the value actually realised by the claimant for the sales of the plot No. 7 the C.T.S. No. 369 and plot No. 15."

He, therefore, disallowed the deduction of Rs. 7,443 made by the Land Acquisition Officer and awarded compensation for the road land at one-fourth the value of the building land.

The learned Government Pleader, who appears on behalf of the Land Acquisition Officer, contends that the trial Judge misconceived the contention advanced on behalf of the Land Acquisition Officer. He urges that the Court was called upon to decide the valuation of the land on the basis of exploitation for the most lucrative user, which in this case was undoubtedly by laying it out as building plots. Having regard to the locality and the sector in which they are situate, in assessing the market value of the plots demarcated out of the land, the valuer must take into account the amenities which the persons who may be expected to purchase the plots may look for, and such amenities, according to the learned Government Pleader, in an urban area in the vicinity of a large town, are laid-out roads, electric connections, water mains and drainage connections. In our view this contention must be upheld. In assessing the market value on the basis of a hypothetical scheme for residential buildings by laying out the land in plots it is not what the claimant may have expected to receive by sale of one or two plots out of the land which is to be decisive of the value of the land, but what the valuer may regard as the value of the plots aggregated after taking into consideration the expenses of providing the amenities which the purchasers may normally expect to obtain in the sector in which the land is situate. The land under acquisition is a large piece of land, and there is no evidence that there was a purchaser for this large piece of land. No evidence has been led by the claimant to show that any prospective purchaser had even made offers to him for purchasing the entire area. The land was therefore being valued as laid-out into building plots; and if prospective purchasers investing large sums of money for purchasing separate plots were to be found, such purchasers would, in our judgment, expect to have the minimum amenities of town life such as water connections, well laid-out roads, drainage facility and electric connections. The value of the land assessed by the learned Judge in respect of the plots having a frontage on the main road comes to Rs. 45 per sq. yard, and even in respect of the rear plots it comes to Rs. 27 per sq. yard. The circumstance that one purchaser was willing to take a plot without insisting upon the provision for water supply, drainage facility and electrical connection will not justify the Court in assuming that all the plots may be sold at the rates at which one of the plots was sold. The learned trial Judge was, in our judgment, in error in assuming that because one purchaser was found, who was willing to purchase plot No. 7 without the benefit of the amenities, which may be normally expected, that the claimant "was not bound to provide such amenities" and the land may be valued without making any deductions for expenses for providing the amenities. The question is not whether the claimant was bound to provide for the amenities according to the scheme developed by him, but it is whether it is reasonably possible to develop a piece of land as a building site and to dispose of the plots at the rates fixed by the claimant without providing for the normal amenities of town life. In our view, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to develop the scheme in its entirety, unless the amenities to which we have made reference are provided by the owner of the land.

In the valuation of land on the basis of a hypothetical building scheme, the valuer has to ascertain the maximum value of each plot laid out in the most lucrative manner in the light of its potentialities, and in doing so, expenses which may have to be incurred for developing the land in the most profitable manner have evidently to be taken into account. A land cannot be parcelled into building plots for residential purpose unless proper and adequate roads are demarcated and prepared; and it is only by the reservation of land for the roads that the building plots acquire a substantially higher rate than the overall rate of the land regarded as a single unit. In other words, the loss which the owner of land suffers by reservation of parts thereof for roads is reflected in the higher price for the formed plots. If the claimant was unwilling to provide such amenities, as he claims he was unwilling to, we think that it would have been impossible for him to get any substantial number of offers for purchasing the lands. It is in evidence that even though the claimant had laid out the plots in 1949, within two years not more than 2 plots were sold. Purchasers who purchase this land at rates varying between Rs. 27 and Rs. 45 per sq. yard would, it appears not be forthcoming and a large number of plots may remain undisposed of, if the amenities of having well-laid-out roads of reasonable width and provision for electrical, drainage and water connections were not made. Evidently the land reserved for roads cannot be disposed of and it will have apart from the plots no market value. We are, therefore, of the view that the learned Judge in the Court below was in error in allowing to the claimant additional value for the land reserved for the roads at the rate of 25 per cent. of the market value of the hypothetical plots laid out in the land.

In support of his contention that even when valuation of land is to be made as the basis of a hypothetical building scheme, the road width has to be assigned some substantial market value, Mr. Joshi relied upon *The Trustees for the Improvement of the City of Bombay v. Karsondas*¹, and *Secy. of State v. Dulai Bala Debi*². In our judgment these cases do not support the contention advanced by Mr. Joshi. In Karsondas Naikhu's case, an appeal was filed against the decision of a Special Tribunal under the City of Bombay Improvement Trust Act. In that case, the Tribunal appointed under s. 48(3) of Bombay Act IV of 1898 adopted an overall rate in respect of the entire area of land at Rs. 15-11-0 per sq. yard, and that overall area included the area which was to be set apart for the roads. It was in that context that Mr. Justice Batchelor, who delivered the judgment of the Court, observed (p. 31):

"...when once you have adopted the general principle of a sale of the land split up into parcels suitable for building, it appears not only unnecessary but inappropriate to make a special deduction on account of the small area marked off for the roadway."

That was a case in which the value of the land as a single unit was taken and deduction for expenses for providing roads was sought to be made. The Court in that case did not assign value to individual plots but took the overall rate of Rs. 15-11-0 per sq. yard. If in the overall value the reduction in the value of the land to be reserved for road width was reflected, it is, with respect, right to hold that it would be "unnecessary and inappropriate to make a special deduction on account of the area marked off" for the road. But that is not the case in the present proceedings. Here we proceed to assess the value of the land by valuing the plots separately, and in the value of the plot so assessed is reflected the value of the amenity, namely, that adjacent thereto is a laid-out road of width of 25 feet.

The Calcutta High Court judgment in Dulai Bala's case has, in our judgment, no bearing on this particular question. In that case a building abutting on a common passage and with an interest in the passage was acquired under the Land Acquisition Act and subsequently there was another proceeding for acquisition of the land which was used for passage for that building. In valuing the building the existence of the passage which gave access to the building was taken into consideration and increased value was allowed having regard to the existence of the passage as a means of access. The Court found that the entire proprietary interest of the owners of the land in the common passage including all the interest in the subsoil was not acquired. The Court was, therefore, of the view that because the adjacent building had received a higher value on account of the passage, the land covered by the passage did not lose its value to the owners. We are unable to appreciate how that case can have any application to this case. Admittedly the building with appurtenant right of passage and the land of the passage were sought to be acquired in two separate acquisition proceedings; and the Court held that the claimant was entitled to receive the separate values of the two components and the fact that in valuing the building the value of the right of passage was taken into account did not justify the view that all the rights in the land of the passage were acquired in the earlier proceeding. We are in the present case concerned to determine the value of the land laid-out in the most lucrative manner for the benefit of the claimant. In laying out the land in that manner it would be unfair to award to the claimant the value of the separate plots, in which is fully reflected the value of the additional amenity of having laid-out roads, and also separately to pay to the claimant the value of the land reserved for the road. In effect, it will amount to paying compensation twice over for the same land.

On the view taken by us, the claimant's claim for additional compensation for the area of the road cannot be sustained.

Decree—Antedating of,—Power of High Court in its appellate jurisdiction to antedate decree passed by it—Petition for judicial separation filed under Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, dismissed by trial Court—High Court on appeal passing decree for judicial separation—When open to High Court to antedate its decree so that it could bear the date of the decree of the trial Court—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, rr. 35, 33—Bombay High Court Appellate Side Rules, r. 161.

A petition filed before the City Civil Court for judicial separation under the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, was dismissed, and the High Court, on appeal, set aside the order of the trial Court and passed a decree for judicial separation. On the question whether it was open to the High Court to antedate the decree passed by it and direct that it should bear the same date as the decree passed by the trial Court:—

Held, that the specific period of two years laid down in s. 13(1)(viii) of the Act is the period commencing after a decree is passed by a competent Court, that in the present case it could not be said that any decree for judicial separation was passed by the trial Court which would start the period laid down in s. 13(1)(viii), that the period in this case under the section only commenced after the decree was pronounced by the High Court, and that, therefore, even assuming that the High Court had the power to so antedate the decree, the High Court could not, in the instant case, exercise it, in view of the law.

The power of the High Court in its appellate jurisdiction is not fettered by the mandatory provisions of O. XLI, r. 35, of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908.

The Appellate Side Judges of the High Court can direct the Registrar to draw up the decree and either antedate it or post-date it.

Borthwick v. Elderslie Steamship Company (No. 2),¹ referred to.

ONE Vishnu H. Kirpalani on November 14, 1956, filed a petition in the Bombay City Civil Court for restitution of conjugal rights against his wife Shirin. On December 3, 1956, Shirin filed a petition against her husband Vishnu for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty. Both the petitions were heard together and the Judge of the City Civil Court on August 27, 1957, dismissed the wife's petition on the ground that she had not succeeded in establishing the case of cruelty and also dismissed the husband's petition as he was of opinion that the conduct of the husband was such as justified the wife in not going back to live with him. Both Vishnu and Shirin appealed to the High Court. The appeal came on for hearing before Chagla C.J. and S. T. Desai J., who, on August 11, 1958, passed a decree for judicial separation in favour of the wife, holding that on the evidence the wife had established her case of legal cruelty and that the case came within the ambit of s. 10(2)(b) of the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955. Accordingly, their Lordships confirmed the order passed by the trial Judge in the husband's petition.

*Decided, August 11/12, 1958. First Appeal M. J. Petition No. 2495 of 1956 (with 2825 of No. 740 of 1957, from the orders of M. A. 1956.)
Sakhardande, Judge, City Civil Court, in 1 [1956] 2 K. B. 516.

It was then urged by counsel appearing on both the sides that the decree passed by their Lordships in appeal should be antedated so that the decree should bear the same date as the decree passed by the trial Court.

H. M. Seervai, Advocate General, K. J. Khandalavala, N. A. Palkhivala and N. S. Phatarphekar, with Crawford Bayley & Co., for the appellant (wife).

* M. P. Laud, with Kanga & Co., for the respondent (husband).

CHAGLA C.J. A very interesting point has been argued before us as to the date which this decree which we have passed in appeal shall bear. Both the Advocate General and Mr. Laud request us to antedate the decree and to direct that this decree shall bear the same date as the decree passed by the trial Court. What is urged is that under O. XLI, r. 33, of the Code, the powers of the appellate Court are very wide and the appellate Court has the power to pass any decree and make any order which ought to have been passed or made, and it is pointed out that what we are doing by this appeal is to decide that the trial Court should have passed a decree for judicial separation in favour of the wife. If that is our view, there is no reason why we should not date the decree as the decree originally passed by the City Civil Court.

First turning to the question of the power of the High Court to antedate the decree, the first provision which might be looked at is O. XX, r. 7. That rule deals with judgment in the trial Court and the provision is that the decree shall bear the date the day on which the judgment was pronounced, and when the Judge has satisfied himself that the decree has been drawn up in accordance with the judgment, he shall sign the decree. Now, this rule does not apply to High Courts in the exercise of their ordinary or extraordinary civil jurisdiction, and as a matter of fact we on the Original Side have framed a rule, r. 287, which provides that by special leave of the Judge a decree may be antedated or post-dated. Therefore, the Judges on the Original Side undoubtedly possess the power and the jurisdiction to antedate or post-date a decree. Turning to the provision of decrees in appeal, the relevant provision in the Code is O. XLI, r. 35. Sub-rule (1) of that rule provides:

"The decree of the Appellate Court shall bear date the day on which the judgment was pronounced."

This rule does not apply to the High Court on its appellate jurisdiction. That is clear from the provisions of O. XLIX, r. 3, which exempts this rule from application to the High Court in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction. Therefore, as the Code stands, it seems to be clear that the High Court exercising its appellate jurisdiction is not bound by the mandatory provision of O. XLI, r. 35. Although the High Court has framed a rule on the Original Side to which reference has just been made, there is no such rule framed on the Appellate Side. But in the absence of any such rule, it seems that the power of the High Court in its appellate jurisdiction is not fettered by the mandatory provisions of O. XLI, r. 35. The Advocate General drew our attention to a rule which we have framed on the Appellate Side which has some bearing on the question, and that is r. 161 and that rule provides that the decree shall bear the date on which the judgment of the High Court was pronounced. This rule is in a Chapter which bears the heading "Rules for the guidance of the Registrar's office", and it seems that inasmuch as these are not rules framed by the High Court under any of the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, it would be open to the Judges sitting on the Appellate Side to direct in a particular case that the direction given to the Registrar under r. 161 should not be carried out. In other words, the Appellate Side Judges here could direct the Registrar to draw up the decree and either antedate it or post-date it.

In this connection, it will be perhaps interesting and also instructive to look at what the position in England is. O. XLI, r. 3 deals with entry of judgment and that rule provides:

"Where any judgment is pronounced by the Court or a Judge in Court, the entry of the judgment shall be dated as of the day on which such judgment is pronounced, unless the Court or Judge shall otherwise order, and the judgment shall take effect from that date: provided that by special leave of the Court or a Judge a judgment may be ante-dated or post-dated."

Therefore, the Rules of the Supreme Court expressly confer upon the Judge the power to ante-date or post-date the judgment, and that power we have taken to ourselves on the Original Side by r. 287. Then we come to the powers of the appellate Court in England. There is no express provision with regard to the power of the appellate Court, but there is high authority for the proposition that the appellate Court has also the power to ante-date and presumably post-date its judgment. The Annual Practice 1957 at page 1263 cites the judgment of Lord Justice Romer in Borthwick v. Elderslie Steamship Company (No. 2),¹ which states (p. 521):

"...the judgment [of the Court of Appeal] must be treated as of the date on which it was given in the Court of Appeal, subject to the right of that Court to antedate its judgment. That right should...be exercised with caution."

Now, it is a matter for consideration whether we should not have a rule on the Appellate Side similar to r. 287 on the Original Side. It is perfectly true that such a power should be exercised sparingly and with caution, but there is no reason why, if a Judge on the Original Side is armed with that power, the Judges sitting in appeal in the High Court should not have similar power. But assuming we have the power, the question is whether that power can be exercised in this particular case, and for that purpose we must first turn to the Act which we are interpreting and administering and that is the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955. Section 13 deals with the grounds of divorce and two material provisions may be looked at. One is cl. (viii) and the other is cl. (ix). Clause (viii) says: "the other party has not resumed cohabitation for a space of two years or upwards, after the passing of a decree for judicial separation against that party;" and cl. (ix) says: "has failed to comply with a decree for restitution of conjugal rights for a period of two years or upwards after the passing of the decree." Therefore, before the right can accrue to a party seeking divorce in these two cases, there must be in one case a failure to resume cohabitation for a space of two years after the passing of the decree for judicial separation, and in the second case there must be a failure to comply with the decree for restitution of conjugal rights for a similar period. Now, can it possibly be said, if we ante-date the decree to the date the City Civil Court passed its decree, that there was a failure on the part of one or the other party to resume cohabitation after the passing of the decree and equally so in the case of a decree for restitution of conjugal rights that there was a failure to comply with that decree for a period of two years after it was passed? The scheme underlying these two clauses of s. 13(1) seems to us to be clear. The Legislature was anxious that marriages should not be easily or lightly dissolved, and that even after decrees for restitution of conjugal rights and judicial separation were passed, locus penitentia should be given to the married couple to try and come to a settlement. If that was the policy underlying the two clauses, it is clear that the specific period of two years laid down by the Legislature is the period commencing after a decree is passed by a competent Court. It cannot possibly be said that any decree for judicial separation was passed by the City Civil Court which would start the period laid down by the Legislature. That period in this case under s. 13(1)(viii) can only commence after the decree has been pronounced by this Court. Under the circumstances, assuming we have the power, we do not think this is a case where we should exercise it or even we could exercise it in view of the law.

The result, therefore, is that the decree which we have passed yesterday will bear yesterday's date as provided by r. 161 of the Appellate Side Rules.

Order accordingly.

Indian Partnership Act (IX of 1932), Secs. 14, 16, 50—Indian Trusts Act (II of 1882), Sec. 88, III. (d)—Partnership consisting of two partners dissolved by notice given by partner B to partner P—Notice stating that out of entire amount of profit of partnership lying with P, half to be given to B within four days and that B wishing to break off relations with P—P subsequently purchasing property out of amount of profit belonging to partnership—Whether such property partnership asset and B entitled to a share in it—Benami transaction—Burden of proof—Whether onus of proof on party alleging that transaction is benami—Burden of proof in such case how discharged.

A partnership consisting of two partners B and P was dissolved by a notice given by B to P on September 28, 1945, which stated that till the date of the notice a net profit of Rs. 20,000 was made by the partnership business and that the amount of profit was with P, that out of this amount P should pay half of it to B within four days of the receipt of the notice and that henceforth B wished to break off all relations with P. On April 9, 1947, P purchased certain property for Rs. 10,500. On the question whether the property became a partnership asset so as to give B a share therein on the assumption that P had paid the purchase price of the property out of the amount of profit in his hands belonging to the partnership:—

Held, that as the partnership in the case was dissolved in 1945 and as B had broken off all relations with P and claimed an eight anna share in the profits which he alleged were in the hands of P, the purchase of the property could not be regarded as a transaction of the partnership, in the circumstances of the case, so as to give B a share therein on the ground that he was a partner.

Even during the subsistence of a partnership, if property is purchased out of partnership assets, it does not necessarily become partnership property, and where property is purchased not for the purpose of business or for the benefit of the firm the question as to the ownership of the property must depend upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case.

THE plaintiff's (Ulhasibai's) case was that she had purchased two houses, City Survey No. 90 and House No. 66 in Peth Ganj at Poona from one Premchand Maganlal under a sale-deed dated April 9, 1947, for a consideration of Rs. 10,500, this consideration being made up of Rs. 5,000 in respect of a prior mortgage on the two houses taken in the name of Sundrabai, the daughter of the plaintiff, and Rs. 5,500 paid in cash. According to the plaintiff, the prior mortgage, dated July 6, 1946, was taken in the name of Sundrabai because there was a dispute pending in the Civil Court at Sasvad between the plaintiff's husband's bhaubands and the plaintiff. After the plaintiff's purchase of the two houses on April 9, 1947, she obtained a release deed from Sundrabai on September 18, 1948, in respect of the mortgage which was executed by Premchand in her favour, and it was stated in that release deed that the original amount of the mortgage, Rs. 5,000, belonged to the plaintiff. According to the plaintiff, therefore, she became the owner of these two houses. One Bhagchand (defendant) was in possession of some portion of house No. 90 as a tenant of Premchand under a rent-note dated April 12, 1946, but the remaining portion was in the possession of Premchand and it contained his goods. According to the plaintiff, the defendant purchased these goods from Premchand and these goods were, therefore, removed from the premises and thereafter the plaintiff put her lock to that portion and took actual possession of the said portion. It is the plaintiff's case that on or about June 12, 1947, the defendant removed the plaintiff's lock on that portion and took forcible possession thereof as a trespasser. It was also the plaintiff's case that after the purchase the defendant had agreed to pay rent to the plaintiff for the portion occupied by him as a tenant, but when defendant was asked to pay the rent he denied the ownership of plaintiff regarding the house. The plaintiff filed the present suit (Special Suit No. 49 of 1950) on February 23, 1950, against the defendant as a trespasser for recovering possession of house No. 90 at Peth Ganj, Poona, from the defendant and meane profits. The defendant was the son of one Nemichand, who had two sons—Punamchand and the defendant. Punamchand was married to plaintiff's daughter Sundrabai some time in 1935. Nemichand's family originally came from Chikalthan, Taluka Karmala, District Sholapur, and first Punamchand and thereafter the defendant came to Poona and started business. The principal defence of the defendant to the plaintiff's suit was that the plaintiff was not the owner of the suit house at all, but that the transaction of sale in her favour, dated April 9, 1947, was brought about with the funds of the ownership of defendant and his brother Punamchand, who is the plaintiff's son-in-law, and even the moneys advanced to the vendor Premchand on the mortgage did not belong to plaintiff nor to Sundrabai. According to defendant, the transaction of mortgage of July 6, 1946, and that of sale of April 9, 1947, were made benami in the name of the plaintiff's daughter Sundrabai and the plaintiff respectively. According to the defendant, it was settled between him and his brother Punamchand that the latter should first take both the houses in mortgage for Rs. 5,000 on July 6, 1946, and thereafter Punamchand purchased both the houses on April 9, 1947, and both the transactions were made with the funds of the ownership of defendant and his brother, for the benefit of the defendant and his brother Punamchand, and neither the plaintiff nor her daughter Sundrabai had any connection with the amounts of considerations of both the transactions. According to the defendant, after this purchase, it was subsequently settled between the plaintiff and his brother that the defendant alone should take the suit house No. 90 and that the defendant's brother Punamchand alone should take house No. 66, and in pursuance of this agreement the defendant was making vakiyat of the suit property as exclusive owner. It is the defendant's allegation that his brother subsequently changed his mind with the intention of appropriating both the houses to himself and put forward the plaintiff to file the present false and vexatious suit. The defendant denied any knowledge about the release deed passed by Sundrabai on September 18, 1948. The defendant denied the plaintiff's contention as to possession of the property and stated that the plaintiff's allegations, that Premchand had asked the defendant to attorn to the plaintiff and that the defendant had agreed to pay rent to the plaintiff, were fraudulent and false. He also stated that plaintiff's financial position was from the beginning very bad and her allegation that she purchased the houses for Rs. 10,500 which were of her ownership, was not true. One of the contentions of the defendant was that he himself had filed Suit No. 1099 of 1948 on May 31, 1948, against his brother and the present plaintiff and others, in which he had asked for accounts from Punamchand of several businesses and also sought a declaration that City Survey No. 90 of Poona belonged exclusively to him and that the defendants had no right or interest therein; and it was his contention that the present suit could not proceed and should be stayed till the final disposal of Suit No. 1099 of 1948. That suit was decreed in favour of the defendant.

On September 27, 1948, Punamchand filed Regular Civil Suit No. 2163 of 1948 against the defendant to obtain dissolution and accounts of the grocery business run in partnership between him and defendant in house No. 90 at Peth Ganj, Poona, and that suit was dismissed principally on the ground that the suit was not in time, as the firm had been dissolved on August 25, 1945, and the suit was filed on September 27, 1948.

All these three suits were heard together by consent of parties as companion suits.

The trial Court came to the conclusion that the plaintiff failed to prove her title to the suit property and held that the defendant had proved that the suit property was purchased benami in the name of the plaintiff by the defendant and his brother Punamchand with their funds. It also held that the defendant had not proved that he had become the exclusive owner of house No. 90. The finding of the learned trial Judge in the suit for accounts filed by the defendant was that the defendant had failed to prove that as a result of the compromise Punamchand had agreed with him to purchase a house for their joint use from the joint family assets in his hands. He, however, held that Punamchand had purchased the houses covered by the mortgage-deed and the sale-deed benami with funds belonging to both the brothers but not with joint family assets or purporting to act for plaintiff's benefit. He also held that the defendant failed to prove the oral agreement by which house No. 90 at Peth Ganj was exclusively allotted to his share and he held that the defendant was entitled to get a declaration that he had a partner's interest in the two house properties.

First Appeal No. 5 of 1955 was filed by the plaintiff and First Appeals Nos. 356 and 357 were filed by Punamchand. The appeals were heard together.

GOKHALE J. [His Lordship, after stating the facts of the case and dealing with points not material to this report, proceeded.] The question is whether on this oral and documentary evidence on the record the finding of the trial Court that the purchase of the two houses was benami in the name of the plaintiff can be said to be correct. Undoubtedly, the onus of proof that the transaction in suit was a benami transaction was on the defendant Bhagchand. It was his case that the mortgage deed was taken benami in the name of Sundrabai and the sale deed was also taken benami in the name of the plaintiff with a view to preventing any trouble from the Income-tax Department and that this was done in pursuance of an agreement between the two brothers. The case of such an agreement has been held to be not established and the motive which has been put forth in support of the benami transaction also does not seem to be borne out. On the other hand, plaintiff's case that the mortgage was taken benami in the name of Sundrabai seems to be justified in view of the fact that her son was a lunatic and there was a suit brought against her by her husband's bhaubands for partition and possession of house property and lands in her possession at the time the mortgage transaction was entered into. The documentary evidence also shows that the two houses came to be entered in her name and it is from her custody that the relevant documents of title have been produced in this suit. But the important question is whether defendant proves that the source of money for the mortgage as well as the sale-deed proceeded from the two brothers or whether plaintiff paid the moneys in respect of both the mortgage as well as the sale transaction. It is an accepted rule of guidance in reference to benami transactions to see from what source the purchase money has proceeded; and it must be shown that the person from whom the money has gone to effect the purchase furnished it as a purchaser. The benami character of a transaction must however be legally established. See De Silva v. De Silva.¹ In *Ramabai v. Ramchandra*² it was held by this Court that the burden of proof is on the party who seeks to give to a purchase a different meaning and complexion from that which it bears on its face and the burden must be strictly discharged; in other words, in order to succeed the party alleging that the transaction is benami, must put the Court in possession of legal and satisfactory evidence and it will not suffice to point to matters of suspicion or even to plausible conjecture. See also Sreemanchunder Dev v. Gopaul Chunder Chuckerbutty.³ On the evidence we have come to the conclusion that the financial resources of the plaintiff have not been established to be poor as was alleged by the defendant. The story of the plaintiff as regards the suit mortgage and the sale transactions is supported by oral as well as documentary evidence. The relevant account books of the businesses carried on by the brothers have not been produced and we do not accept defendant's story, stated for the first time in his evidence, that the account books were taken away by Punamchand from house No. 90 in August 1945. It is true that it has been shown from the certified copies of the savings and current accounts in the Bank of Poona standing in the name of Punamchand that Rs. 5,000 were withdrawn by Punamchand about 4 days before the date of the mortgage and an amount of Rs. 3,400 was also withdrawn by Punamchand from his current account about a few days prior to the sale-deed. At the most, these two withdrawals might raise suspicion, but for the reasons which I have already stated, we are not prepared to hold that these withdrawals would support defendant's version that the mortgage and the sale transactions were effected benami to avoid trouble from the income-tax authorities. The result is that we must differ from the view taken by the trial Court and hold that defendant has failed to prove that the suit property was purchased benami in the name of the plaintiff by defendant and his brother Punamchand with funds belonging to both.

Mr. Kotwal, learned advocate appearing on behalf of the appellant Ulhasibai, has also raised an alternative contention. He says that assuming it is held that the moneys in respect of the suit mortgage and sale transactions did not belong to Ulhasibai but were supplied by Punamchand, he contends that even then the house in suit will not become a partnership asset as to give defendant a share therein. This is undoubtedly a new point raised by Mr. Kotwal in this appeal, but as it is a pure point of law we have allowed both Mr. Kotwal and Mr. Jahagirdar to argue that point. As I have already stated, defendant Bhagchand resisted the present suit by his written statement on the ground that the mortgage as well as the purchase of the house property was made with the aid of funds belonging to Punamchand and himself. There is no reference in the written statement to any partnership assets at all. In exh. 69, the notice which Bhagchand gave to Punamchand on September 26, 1945, it was stated that from the beginning of the business to the date of the notice a net profit of Rs. 20,000 was made from the businesses after deducting all expenses and that all the amount of profit was with Punamchand. The notice further informed Punamchand that out of the amount of Rs. 20,000, which was with Punamchand, he should pay half of it, i.e., Rs. 10,000, to Bhagchand within four days from the receipt of the notice and it was further stated that henceforth Bhagchand wished to break off all relations with Punamchand. This notice, therefore, in effect dissolved the partnership between the two brothers, and even on this version of defendant, Punamchand had a large amount of profits in his hands in which he had only an eight-anna share and the argument of Mr. Kotwal is that in these circumstances even assuming that Punamchand had paid, out of the profits in his hands belonging to the partnership, the consideration for the mortgage and thereafter for the sale, it could not be held that defendant had any share in the house. Mr. Jahagirdar, however, relied on s. 14 of the Partnership Act in support of his contention that in such a case the house would be the property of the partnership. Section 14 of the Partnership Act reads as follows:

"Subject to contract between the partners, the property of the firm includes all property and rights and interest in property originally brought into the stock of the firm, or acquired, by purchase or otherwise, by or for the firm, or for the purposes and in the course of the business of the firm, and includes also the goodwill of the business.

Unless the contrary intention appears, property and rights and interests in property acquired with money belonging to the firm are deemed to have been acquired for the firm."

The first paragraph of this section shows what would be the property of a firm. All property and rights and interest in property which have been brought by the partners into the stock of the firm or which have been acquired or purchased by or for the firm subsequently, will be prima facie regarded as the property of the firm. The second limb of the section provides for a rule of presumption and under that rule, property and rights and interests in property acquired with money belonging to the firm will be deemed to have been acquired for the firm unless a contrary intention appears. In our opinion, this section would not be applicable to the facts of the present case. There is no dispute that the partnership between the two brothers was dissolved in 1945 and the suit transactions were effected after the dissolution. It is nobody's case that the two houses were purchased for the purpose of any business or even for the benefit of the firm. The case of the defendant is that the property was purchased for the benefit of the two brothers and they became joint owners. Even during the subsistence of a partnership, if property is purchased out of partnership assets, it does not necessarily become partnership property and where property is purchased not for the purpose of business or for the benefit of the firm the question as to the ownership of the property must depend upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case. In this connection the following observations of Lord Justice Turner in what is known as the *Bank of England Case*¹ are relevant (pp. 658-659):—

"...It cannot I think be laid down as an universal rule, that when lands are bought by partners in trade, and are paid for out of the partnership assets, they of necessity become part of the joint estate of the partners. There are different purposes for which the lands may have been bought. They may have been bought for the purpose of being used and employed in the trade, as the Saracen's Head estate appears in this case to have been, or they may have been bought, not for the purpose of being used or employed in the trade, but for the purpose of a mere speculation on account of the partnership, for I know nothing which can prevent partners from speculating in land, if they think proper to do so, as freely as they may speculate in mere articles of commerce, though foreign to their trade. Again, they may have been bought without reference to the purposes of the trade or the benefit of the partnership, with the intention of withdrawing from the trade the amount employed in the purchase, and converting that amount into separate property of the partners, or they may have been bought on account of one or more of the partners, he or they becoming debtors to the partnership for the amount laid out in the purchase. The form of the conveyance in these cases does not settle the question, for in whatever form the conveyance may be, there may be a trust of the land which may follow the money, liable however, as other trusts of the like nature are, to be rebutted by evidence. Where land purchased is not merely paid for out of the partnership assets, but is bought for the purpose of being used and employed in the partnership trade, it is scarcely possible to conceive a case in which there could be sufficient evidence to rebut the trust, and accordingly in those cases we find the decisions almost, if not entirely, uniform, that the purchased land forms part of the joint estate of the partnership; but where the land is not purchased for those purposes, the question becomes more open, and we have to consider whether the circumstances attending the purchase show that it was made on account of the partnership individually, or of any one or more of them in whose name the land may have been bought."

1 (1861) 3 De G. F. & J. 645.

In Trimble v. Goldberg,¹ two partners of a partnership of three which was formed to purchase and resale certain properties of a gentleman called Hallard, consisting of 5,500 shares in a company called Sigma Syndicate and of stands or plots of land, purchased other stands belonging to the Syndicate and made profits, and the question arose whether these other stands purchased by the two partners were partnership property in which their third partner was entitled to benefit, and the Privy Council held that as the purchase was not within the scope of the partnership and as the subject of the purchase was not a part of the business of the partnership, or an undertaking in rivalry with the partnership, or indeed connected with it in any proper sense, the property could not be regarded as partnership property. Mr. Jahagirdar, on the other hand, in support of his argument that the suit property must be considered to be partnership property, relied on a decision of the Madras High Court in Sudarsanam Maistri v. Narasimhulu Maistri.² There the Court was concerned with property acquired from the funds of a business which had been carried on jointly by the partners and continued by one of the partners until the institution of the suit, and it was held that as the lands and houses were bought in the name of the partner and paid for by the firm or from the profits of the partnership business, they were prima facie partnership property in the absence of an allegation and proof that from time to time, portions of the assets of the partnership were, by agreement of the partners, withdrawn from the partnership and converted into land or house to be owned by the partners as co-owners. This case, in our opinion, can be distinguished on its own facts. There, the property had been acquired out of funds of the business which had continued till the institution of the suit for account and partition of the property and in the absence of any contrary intention was held to have been bought on account of the firm. In the present case, admittedly a dissolution had taken place between the two brothers since 1945. Mr. Jahagirdar also relied on *Adarji Mancherji Dalal, In re*³ in which it was held that no partner has any beneficial interest on his own account in any particular estate or property of the partnership within the meaning of s. 250 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, until the partnership is wound up and its accounts taken; and Mr. Jahagirdar's contention is that in respect of the dissolution of the present partnership the moneys in the hands of Punamchand continued to be partnership assets in which he had no beneficial interest of his own. Now, this case again can be distinguished because the partnership properties in the case consisted of certain insurance policies, the premia in respect of which were admittedly paid for from the assets of the partnership and not from the individual account of the partners and were described and treated by the partners as partnership property. As I have already stated, in the present case, in the defendant's notice dated September 26, 1945, given to Punamchand, the defendant had claimed a definite share of 8 annas in the profits which he claimed were in the hands of Punamchand and stated further that he had broken off all relations with Punamchand. It cannot, therefore, be said that Punamchand had no beneficial interest in the properties of the partnership. As no accounts have been produced, it is difficult to say that Punamchand paid more than the amount of the profits which would have fallen to his share at the time of dissolution even if it was he who paid the consideration amount in respect of the mortgage and the sale transactions.

Then Mr. Jahagirdar relied on a passage from Lindley on Partnership at page 391 wherein it is stated:

"Good faith requires that a partner shall not obtain a private advantage at the expense of the firm. He is bound, in all transactions affecting the partnership, to do his best for the common body, and to share with his co-partners any benefit which he may have been able to obtain from other people and in which the firm is in honour and conscience entitled to participate."

This principle, as has been pointed out by the learned author, was established by numerous decisions before the English Partnership Act, 1890, and the result of these decisions was incorporated in ss. 29 and 30 of the said Act. Sections 16 and 50 of the Indian Partnership Act would correspond to ss. 29 and 30 of the English Partnership Act. Section 16 provides:

"Subject to contract between the partners—

(a) if a partner derives any profit for himself from any transaction of the firm, or from the use of the property or business connection of the firm or the firm name, he shall account for that profit and pay it to the firm;

(b) if a partner carries on any business of the same nature as and competing with that of the firm, he shall account for and pay to the firm all profits made by him in that business."

It is difficult to appreciate how s. 16 would assist Mr. Jahagirdar. Mr. Jahagirdar himself does not rely on s. 16, but on s. 50 of the Partnership Act, which would correspond to s. 29(2) of the English Partnership Act. Section 50 reads thus:—

"Subject to contract between the partners, the provisions of clause (a) of section 16 shall apply to transactions by any surviving partner or by the representatives of a deceased partner, undertaken after the firm is dissolved on account of the death of a partner and before its affairs have been completely wound up."

We are not concerned with the proviso to this section. This section applies to personal profits made by a surviving partner or by the representative of a deceased partner out of transactions of partnership undertaken after the dissolution of the firm on account of the death of a partner. In our opinion, the principle of this section cannot apply to the facts of the present case. The partnership in the present case was dissolved in 1945 and defendant had broken off all relations with Punamchand and claimed an eight-anna share in the profits which he alleged were in the hands of his brother Punamchand. The purchase of the houses can in no sense be regarded as a transaction of the partnership in these circumstances.

Mr. Jahagirdar further relied on s. 88 of the Indian Trusts Act. That section deals with the subject of an advantage gained by a fiduciary and it provides:

"Where a trustee, executor, partner, agent, director of a company, legal adviser, or other person bound in a fiduciary character to protect the interests of another person, by availing himself of his character, gains for himself any pecuniary advantage, or where any person so bound enters into any dealings under circumstances in which his own interests are, or may be, adverse to those of such other person and thereby gains for himself a pecuniary advantage, he must hold for the benefit of such other person the advantage so gained."

Mr. Jahagirdar's client has not made any allegations whatever to bring the present case within the ambit of this section. It is not the allegation of the defendant that Punamchand purchased the property by availing himself of his status as a partner. On the other hand, his case was that it was agreed between the brothers that the properties were to be purchased from out of joint funds for the benefit of both the brothers. Mr. Jahagirdar also relied on ill. (d) to s. 88 which states:

"A, a partner, buys land in his own name with funds belonging to the partnership. A holds such land for the benefit of the partnership."

In our opinion, this Illustration cannot go beyond the scope of the section itself; and before a partner can lay claim to any purchase made by another partner the conditions laid down in the section will have to be alleged and proved.

Mr. Jahagirdar has then relied on a decision of the East Punjab High Court in Debi Parshad v. Jai Ram Dass,¹ where it was held that if one partner obtains in his name, either during the partnership or before its assets have been sold, a renewal of a lease of the partnership property, he will not be allowed to treat the renewed lease as his own and as one in which his co-partners have no interest. In that case, the lease itself was the subject-matter of the suit and its renewal was obtained by one partner in his own name. Under these circumstances, the Court naturally held that that partner could not be allowed to treat the renewed lease as his own to the exclusion of the other partner. On the other hand, Mr. Kotwal has relied on a decision of the Madras High Court in *Ramalinga Reddy v. Ramalingam Setty*¹ in which it was held that "In the case of partners, the Indian Legislature has nowhere indicated an intention to enact an absolute rule of law or an irrebuttable presumption that renewal of lease obtained by one of them enures for benefit of the other. Except in cases otherwise specially provided for by statute, a constructive trust can be held to arise only if the conditions of s. 88 or s. 90, Trusts Act, are satisfied. In other words it must be shown that one of the partners has 'availed himself of his character' to gain an advantage or that the partner has gained an advantage by entering into a transaction in which 'his own interests are or may be adverse' to those of the other partners."

In our opinion, this case supports the contention of Mr. Kotwal. As I have already stated, it is not alleged by the defendant that this purchase was made by Punamechand by availing himself of his character as a partner and gaining any pecuniary advantage to himself. The accounts of the partnership have not been produced and, in our judgment, the documentary evidence would indicate that the account books were not taken by Punamechand, as alleged by defendant, but must have been with the defendant himself. It is significant that defendant has produced exh. 195, a post-card which Punamechand wrote to Nemichand, his father, and exh. 196 which one Subhagchand Ranka addressed to Punamechand. The grievance of Punamechand that defendant himself was in possession of some of the relevant documents seems, therefore, to be not without force.

Even assuming, therefore, that Punamechand utilised a part of the profits of the partnership in his hands for the purchase of the properties, it cannot be held that defendant thereby gets any interest in the two houses on the ground that he was a partner.

[The rest of the judgment is not material to this report.]

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL CIVIL.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. M. C. Chagla, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice S. T. Desai.

JIVANLAL CHIMANLAL MEHTA v. PRAMODCHANDRA

Presidency-Towns Insolvency Act (III of 1909), Sec. 9(e)—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 92—Provincial Insolvency Act (V of 1920), Sec. 6(e)—Act of insolvency when committed under s. 9(e) of Act III of 1909—Whether act of insolvency committed only on sale being confirmed under O. XXI, r. 92, of Code.

For the commission of an act of insolvency under s. 9(e) of the Presidency-Towns Insolvency Act, 1909, it is enough if the property is sold by public auction and knocked down to the highest bidder and it is not necessary that the sale should have been confirmed under O. XXI, r. 92, of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908.

ONE Jivanlal Chimanal Mehta (debtor) was a partner in the firm of Messrs. C. Jivanlal and Co., the other partners being Harjivan Keshavji Shah, Hasmukhlal Jivanlal Mehta and Chimanal Trikamlal Mody. On December 22, 1955, a decree was passed by the Bombay City Civil Court at Bombay against the firm of C. Jivanlal and Co., in favour of Balubhai Vadilal and Co., for the sum of Rs. 11,444. On November 28, 1956, Balubhai Vadilal and Co., applied for and obtained a warrant of attachment, attaching the right, title and interest of the debtor in the immoveable property belonging to him, known as "Hill View", situate at 9, Juhu Lane, Ghodbunder Road, Andheri, Greater Bombay, in execution of the decree. The attachment in enforcement of the warrant of attachment was levied by the Sheriff of Bombay on November 29, 1956. On March 13, 1957, the judgment-creditors applied for and obtained a warrant for the sale by public auction of the right, title and interest of the debtor in the property. On October 11, 1957, the Sheriff of Bombay duly issued and advertised a proclamation for sale by public auction of the right, title and interest of the debtor in the immoveable property. On November 18, 1957, the Sheriff of Bombay put up for sale by public auction the right, title and interest of the debtor in the immoveable property in enforcement of the warrant for sale and it was sold to the highest bidder. The Sheriff of Bombay issued a certificate to the effect that pursuant to the warrant for sale dated March 13, 1957, she did on November 18, 1957, sell by public auction all the right, title and interest of the debtor, a partner in C. Jivanlal and Co., in the lands and premises mentioned in the said warrant for the price or sum of Rs. 10,000 subject to the rights and charges and claims mentioned in the proclamation of sale.

One Pramodchandra Chimanlal Mody (petitioning creditor) filed the present petition on November 27, 1957, for adjudication of the debtor as an insolvent, claiming that he was a creditor of the debtor in the sum of Rs. 3,251.75 nP. and urging that the aforesaid sale of the debtor's property constituted an act of insolvency under s. 9(e) of the Presidency-Towns Insolvency Act, 1909.

The petition was heard by K. T. Desai J. who passed an order of adjudication against the debtor on February 20, 1958, observing, in the course of his judgment, as follows:—

K. T. DESAI J. The next and the most important contention that has been urged by the learned counsel for the debtor is that there has been no act of insolvency within the meaning of s. 9(e) of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act. Section 9(e) of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act is as follows:—

"9. A debtor commits an act of insolvency in each of the following cases, namely...

(e) If any of his property has been sold or attached for a period of not less than twenty one days in execution of the decree of any Court for the payment of money."

What is contended on behalf of the debtor is that though the property has been sold by the Sheriff of Bombay, the sale has hitherto not been confirmed. It is urged that a sale becomes complete only on confirmation and that it is only a completed sale which is a sale within the meaning of s. 9(e). It is urged that as there is no such completed sale, no act of bankruptcy has been committed by the debtor.

Mr. Desai strongly relies upon the decision in the case of Ex parte Villars: In re Rogers.¹ In that case an execution was levied by seizure and sale of a trader's goods for a debt exceeding £ 50. The goods were sold partly on July 4, 1873, and partly on July 7, 1873, and monies were received in respect of these goods. Bills of sale were executed by the Sheriff in respect of these goods. The sale proceeds were handed over by the Sheriff to the attaching creditor. Thereafter the debtor, whose goods had been sold, was adjudged a bankrupt. In dealing with the matter, Sir W. N. James L.J. observes at p. 445 as under:—

"...And I think that the Court can so construe those words as not to render the act of the sheriff or the title of a purchaser, which is derived from a sale made by him, invalid, by calling in aid the language of the 11th section, which enacts that the bankruptcy of a debtor shall be deemed to have relation back to, and to commence at the time of the act of bankruptcy, or the first of the acts of bankruptcy, 'being completed', and treating the completed sale as the act of bankruptcy, at the time of which the bankruptcy is to be deemed to commence. If the act of bankruptcy is the act of the bankrupt himself, then the title of the trustee relates back to the moment of the commencement of the act done by him; but if, as in the present case, it is not a voluntary act of the bankrupt, but a proceeding in invitum, it relates back only to the moment after the completion of the transaction which constitutes the act of bankruptcy."

Placing a strong reliance upon this passage Mr. Desai urges that the act of insolvency is committed when the sale is "completed" and he says that in the present case the sale will be complete only when the same is confirmed by the Court and not till then. In the case of Ex parte Villars the Court held that as the execution creditor had no notice of the petition for adjudication within 14 days after the date of the sale, he was entitled to the proceeds of the sale notwithstanding the supervening bankruptcy under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act of 1869. The question for determination before the Court in that case was whether the sale proceeds vested in the Official Receiver in bankruptcy or whether the execution creditor was entitled to retain the proceeds of sale. In that case the point of time at which the act of bankruptcy was committed was not in issue. In that case the sales effected by the Sheriff and the bills of sale executed by him in connection with these sales have not been shown to be on different dates and no question arose as to when the sales should be deemed to have been effected within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act.

There are a few decisions of the Courts in India relating to the interpretation of provisions similar to the provisions contained in s. 9(e) of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act. These cases have arisen under s. 6(e) of the Provincial Insolvency Act. Section 6(e) of the Provincial Insolvency Act is as follows:—

"6. A debtor commits an act of insolvency in each of the following cases, namely:

(e) if any of his property has been sold in execution of the decree of any Court for the payment of money;"

The language of s. 6(e) of the Provincial Insolvency Act is identical with the language used in s. 9(e) of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act, except that in s. 9(e) there is an additional ground which constitutes an act of insolvency viz. attachment for a period of not less than twenty-one days in execution of the decree of any Court for the payment of money.

In the case of Venkatakrishnayya v. Malakondayya,¹ which was decided by Mr. Justice Wadsworth and Mr. Justice Patanjali Sastri, as he then was, the petitioner was adjudged an insolvent on a creditor's application under the Provincial Insolvency Act and the order of adjudication was confirmed in appeal. A civil revision petition was filed challenging the correctness of the appellate order. It was urged that there was no act of insolvency when a sale in execution had been held and that sale had not been confirmed or having been confirmed had been set aside as a result of a deposit under r. 89 of O. XXI of the Civil Procedure Code. Dealing with this argument the Court observed as under (p. 306):—

"There appears to be no decided case covering this actual point. Two cases have been quoted, A.I.R. 1938 Lah. 819 and A.I.R. 1933 Cal. 564, in which it was held that the date of the sale for the purpose of limitation to an application under S. 9, Provincial Insolvency Act, is not the date of the confirmation, but the date of the actual sale. We have also been referred to (1785-1800) 100 E.R. 33 in which it was held that a clear and unequivocal act of bankruptcy such as suspension of payment cannot be explained away by the subsequent circumstance that the creditor was paid. It seems to us that none of these cases really touch the point which we have to decide. Under S. 6(e), Provincial Insolvency Act, a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy if any of his property has been sold in execution of the decree of any Court for payment of money. Under O. 21, Civil P.C., we find both in R. 89 and in R. 90 the words 'where any immovable property has been sold in execution of a decree' used to indicate a sale which has been held and awaits confirmation and one which is liable to be set aside either as a result of a deposit or as a result of an objection to the procedure. That is to say, the words 'property has been sold in execution of a decree', when used in O. 21, Civil P.C., refer not to an indefeasible sale, but to a sale which has been actually held but which may be set aside as a result of subsequent proceedings. It seems to us that there is no apparent necessity for giving greater weight to the words in S. 6, Provincial Insolvency Act, than they carry in the relevant rules of O. 21 to which cl. (e) of S. 6, Provincial Insolvency Act, naturally has reference. The enumeration of the various acts of insolvency in S. 6 seems to contemplate those acts which in the public eye shake the credit of a debtor and are likely to cause a scramble amongst the creditors for his assets. The man may actually be solvent, but may still commit an act of insolvency by suffering something to be done which shakes his apparent credit, as when he disappears from his normal dwelling house or hides himself from his creditors or under the corresponding provision of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, suffers some attachment of his property in execution of a decree to subsist for 21 days. All these are outward and visible signs that a man's credit has been shaken and they are circumstances which are likely to cause a panic amongst his creditors. Consequently they justify any creditor in asking the Court to step in and see that there is a fair distribution of the debtor's assets."

In the course of the judgment, it has further been observed as follows (p. 307) :—

"...But as we read S. 6(e) when there has in fact been a sale in execution a subsequent deposit whereby the sale is set aside or a subsequent objection founded on some material irregularity resulting in the setting aside of the sale, will not alter the fact that the property was sold in execution of the decree."

I am in respectful agreement with the reasoning given in that case. It is not necessary to repeat what has been stated by the division bench of that Court. It is enough for me to say that I adopt the reasoning given in that case.

When one turns to s. 65 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which deals with sales in execution of a decree it has been provided as under :—

"Where an immovable property is sold in execution of a decree and such sale has become absolute, the property shall be deemed to have vested in the purchaser from the time when the property is sold and not from the time when the sale becomes absolute."

The phraseology used in this section clearly indicates that in the Code the time when a property is considered to be sold is different from the time when the sale becomes absolute. What I have to consider is whether the words "property has been sold in execution of a decree" appearing in s. 9(e) of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act have been used in the same sense in which the words "property is sold in execution of a decree" have been used in the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 9 of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act refers to sales taking place in execution of a decree. Such sales are to take place in accordance with the provisions of the Code and the words appearing in s. 9 of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act must be read and construed in the same sense in which similar words are used in the Code of Civil Procedure. The language in the Code is clear and leaves no room for doubt that under the Code a property is deemed to be sold when it is knocked down to a purchaser by the Sheriff when he effects a sale in execution of a decree. In the case of Kanai Lal v. Tinkari De,¹ which was decided by a division bench of the Calcutta High Court consisting of Mitter and M. C. Ghose JJ., it has been observed as follows (p. 566) :—

"...A sale is complete as soon as property is knocked down and purchased by somebody; confirmation comes later. There is no authority for the contention that when S. 6, Cl. (e), says that the act of insolvency occurs when the property is sold, we must read into the language of the statute as if the words were 'when the sale was confirmed'. The legislature knew the distinction between 'sale' and 'confirmation of a sale' and it has used language which will go to show that the act of insolvency is committed as soon as the property is sold..."

A decision to a similar effect has been given by Mr. Justice Tek Chand in the case of Lal Chand v. Bogha Ram.² The learned Judge in that case has quoted with approval the observation in the case of Kanai Lal v. Tinkari De, that an act of insolvency under s. 6(e) occurs when the property is knocked down to the purchaser at the auction sale and not when the sale is confirmed. In the case of Hoshnak Ram v. Punjab National Bank,¹ a division bench of the Lahore High Court has held that when the officer of the Court or such other person as the Court may appoint to conduct a sale as provided in O. XXI, r. 65, knocks down the property to the highest bidder, such person must be deemed to have been declared to be the purchaser of such property. The sale is complete when the property is knocked down to the highest bidder and it is not open to the Court thereafter to offer the property to any person who may be prepared to purchase it for a higher amount. In my view, the sale in this case took place when the property was knocked down to the purchaser and on the property being knocked down to the purchaser, the property must be considered to have been sold within the meaning of s. 9(e) of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act and an act of insolvency then took place. The debtor, in my view, has committed an act of insolvency within the meaning of s. 9(e) of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act and the petitioning creditor is entitled to have him adjudicated an insolvent.

The debtor appealed.

H. S. Desai, for the appellant.

Mrs. Sohini Mehta, for the respondent.

CHAGLA C.J. This appeal raises two questions, one which is very simple to decide and the other of some importance. The appellant was adjudicated insolvent on a petition presented on November 28, 1957, by the respondent basing the petition on a debt of Rs. 8,251-75 nP. and urging as the ground of insolvency that the property of the appellant had been sold in execution of a decree; and the first question that was considered by the learned Judge below was whether there was a subsisting debt on which the petition could be founded and the question that arose for consideration was whether a certain document constituted an acknowledgment within the meaning of the Limitation Act or an acknowledgment within the meaning of art. 1 of Sch. 1 of the Stamp Act. On the decision of this question depended whether there was a subsisting debt or not. Now, the document is a statement of account and it sets out the balance due to one Pramodchandra Chimanlal Mody, the respondent, from the firm of C. Jivanlal & Co. in which the appellant was a partner. There was an account of the respondent in the books of the firm and the statement corresponds to the balance that appeared to the credit of the respondent in the books of the firm. What is urged by the appellant is that inasmuch as this document was not stamped, it is inadmissible in evidence, and if the document is ruled out, the debt due by the firm of C. Jivanlal & Co. in which the appellant was a partner is barred by limitation. Now, the question as to whether the document falls within art. 1 of Sch. 1 of the Stamp Act depends, as the article itself says, on the decision whether the document was given in order to supply evidence of a debt, and numerous authorities, which, it is not necessary to review, have clearly laid down that that must be the paramount intention of the person giving the document and the question that the Court has to ask looking at the document and looking at the surrounding circumstances is whether the document is given in order to supply a statement of account or whether the document is given in order to supply evidence of a debt. The learned Judge has held on consideration of all the facts that this particular document does not fall within art. 1 of Sch. 1. No authority can help to construe this particular document. Each decision must turn on the facts of its own case; and we have here a very important circumstance and that circumstance is that accounts of the firm of C. Jivanlal & Co., as admitted by the appellant himself, were made up every year after Divali and the appellant says:

"in due course the account of moneys brought in by the said Chimanlal Tricumlal Mody, a partner of the firm in the name of his son Pramodchandra Chimanlal Mody was made up after Asho. Vadya 30th, Sanvat year 2011 i.e. 14th of November 1953, and Khata acknowledgment was sent to him showing the amount due."

So, the case of the appellant himself is that accounts of the firm were made up from time to time, that one of the partners, who is the father of the respondent, brought in money in the name of his son, the respondent, and the account of moneys brought in by the father of the respondent was made up at the end of every year and a statement supplied to the respondent. Under these circumstances, it is difficult to take the view that the document, which we are considering, constitutes an acknowledgment within the meaning of the Stamp Act and we agree with the learned Judge that this is an acknowledgment within the meaning of the Limitation Act, that Limitation is saved by this document and the petition was well founded to the extent that it relied on this document.

The second question is whether the debtor committed an act of insolvency and the act of insolvency relied upon is the one set out in s. 9(e) of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act:

"If any of his property has been sold or attached for a period of not less than twenty-one days in execution of the decree of any Court for the payment of money."

In this case, we are concerned with the first part of this sub-section "if any of his (debtor's) property has been sold" and the relevant facts with regard to this aspect of the case are that one Balubhai Vadilal & Co. obtained a decree against the appellant for Rs. 11,444 in the City Civil Court Suit No. 2676 of 1955. In execution of that decree, the immovable property of the appellant situated at Ghod Bunder Road, Andheri, was attached on November 29, 1956; the warrant of sale was issued on March 13, 1957, and the proclamation of sale was issued on October 11, 1957, and the property was sold by public auction on November 18, 1957, and knocked down to the highest bidder. The insolvency petition, as already pointed out, was presented on November 28, 1957. Now, the contention of Mr. Desai is that an act of insolvency has not been committed because the property has not been sold. His submission is that for the purpose of this sub-section, the property can only be said to have been sold if the sale has been confirmed, as provided under the Civil Procedure Code, O. XXI, r. 92. There is a similar provision both in the High Court Rules and the City Civil Court Rules about confirmation of a sale. Now, what is said is that till the sale is confirmed under O. XXI, r. 92, the sale is an inchoate sale. It is open to the person, whose property has been sold, to apply to set aside the sale of the property under rr. 89 and 90, and till his applications are disposed of, the sale does not become absolute. In this case, all that had happened was that the Sheriff had knocked down the property to the highest bidder, but the sale never became absolute, it was never confirmed and the property did not vest in the purchaser. Therefore, what was urged was that there was no act of insolvency. It was contended that, under s. 9(e) of the Insolvency Act, it is only when the sale becomes absolute that an act of insolvency is committed.

Now, before turning to the authorities, looking at the language used by the Legislature what the Legislature has stated is: "if any of his property has been sold". Now, the sale of a property and the sale being confirmed or becoming absolute are two different concepts which are well recognised under the Indian law. The Civil Procedure Code, O. XXI, r. 89, uses language identical with s. 9(e) of the Insolvency Act. Rule 89 says:

"Where immovable property has been sold in execution of a decree, any person, either owning such property or holding an interest therein...may apply to have the sale set aside..."

Therefore, the Legislature clearly recognises that there is a sale of a property which is antecedent to its confirmation or its becoming absolute under r. 92. The same is the language used in r. 90 where an application can be made to set aside a sale on the ground of irregularity or fraud. Here also, the language used is: "where any property has been sold in execution of a decree" and the concept of the sale becoming absolute arises when you come to O. XXI, r. 92. Therefore, as we have just said, these are two entirely separate legal concepts—the sale of an immovable property and the sale becoming absolute. Now, if the Legislature intended that the act of insolvency should only occur when the sale became absolute, there was no reason why the Legislature should not have used appropriate language to convey that intention. The Legislature has advisedly used the expression that the property has been sold and not when the sale has become absolute or has been confirmed. The reason behind this language is that, for the purpose of insolvency, the Legislature is concerned more with the position of the debtor rather than the rights of the purchaser under the sale. Mr. Desai says that till the sale becomes absolute, the property does not vest in the purchaser. That idea is to be found in s. 65 of the Civil Procedure Code:

"Where immovable property is sold in execution of a decree and such sale has become absolute, the property shall be deemed to have vested in the purchaser from the time when the property is sold and not from the time when the sale becomes absolute." So that although under s. 65 the vesting can only take place, if the sale has become absolute, the time of vesting is not when the sale became absolute but from the time when the property is sold. But, we are not concerned with the rights of the purchaser or with the vesting of the property in the purchaser. What we are concerned with and what the Insolvency Act is concerned with is either the acts of the debtor or his financial condition. It is true, as pointed out by Mr. Desai, that an act of insolvency may be a voluntary act of the debtor or in some cases it may be the result of the acts of others and this is one of those cases where it is not the act of the debtor which constitutes the act of insolvency. It is his creditor who brings his property to sale which results in the act of insolvency. But even so, the very fact that the debtor has permitted his property to be sold may be looked upon by the Legislature as a sufficient ground for taking the view that he has committed an act of insolvency. Normally, a solvent person does not permit his property to be sold at a public auction and to be knocked down to the highest bidder. It is only when the person is in a very embarrassing financial circumstance that he allows his property to be sold at a public auction, and therefore it is not surprising, and on the contrary it is natural, that the Legislature should have considered the selling of the property in the sense of its being knocked down to the highest bidder as an act of insolvency and not the sale becoming confirmed or becoming absolute under O. XXI, r. 92, of the Civil Procedure Code. Order XXI, r. 92, is more concerned with the rights of the purchaser. Section 9(e) of the Insolvency Act is more concerned, if not with the act of the debtor, with his condition and position, and when we realise that, the distinction between a sale and a confirmation of a sale becomes clear.

Now, as far as the Indian authorities are concerned, they have all taken the same view of the language used by the Legislature. The only way Mr. Desai has been able to distinguish is that all these decisions are under the Provincial Insolvency Act and not under the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act. Sub-section (e) of s. 6 says:

"A debtor commits an act of insolvency in each of the following cases, namely:—

If any of his property has been sold in execution of the decree of any Court for the payment of money."

It is true that under the Provincial Insolvency Act, the property remaining under attachment is not an act of insolvency. We find it, however, difficult to appreciate the argument that, when our Indian High Courts have construed identical language used in s. 6(e) in a statute which is in pari materia with the statute with which we are concerned, we should attach no importance to these judgments but turn to the English cases dealing with English law. The position might have been different if the expression had been construed in the context of some other law. But if the context of the law is identical law, it is difficult to understand why a different interpretation should be put upon the language used in the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act, unless there is something in the Act to justify a different construction in case of this expression.

Now, the three decisions to which reference may be made are: Kanai Lal v. Tinkari De,¹ *Firm Phul Chand v. Aggarwal*² and *Venkatakrishnayya v. Malakondayya*³. We must refer particularly to the judgment of the Madras High Court. This is a decision of Mr. Justice Wadsworth and Mr. Justice Patanjali Sastri and the learned Judges at p. 307 say:

"Having these considerations in mind it is but natural that the Legislature should lay down as one of the criteria for judging whether a man's ostensible credit has been shaken, the fact of a sale in Court of his assets in execution of a decree. The question whether the sale is eventually set aside for some irregularity or whether the debtor eventually finds it to his interest to deposit the amount of the particular decree is not material. It is the very fact that his circumstances are sufficiently embarrassed to make him to submit to a sale of his property, which justifies the creditor in asking the Insolvency Court, to take charge of his estate."

With respect, we entirely agree with this view with regard to this particular provision of law in the Insolvency Act.

Mr. Desai referred to a passage in Sir Dinshaw Mulla's Insolvency Act, where the learned author says:

"The law as to commencement of insolvency under the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act is the same as the English law", and earlier on in this passage:

"If the act of insolvency is the act of the insolvent himself, e.g., a transfer of property to defeat or delay creditors, the title of the Official Assignee or Receiver relates back to the moment of the commencement of the act of insolvency, but if it is not a voluntary act, but a proceeding in invitum, e.g., a sale of property under an execution, the title relates back to the completion of the transaction which constitutes the act of insolvency", and what is urged is that we must look at the English law in order to decide when the sale was completed and it is only on the completion of the sale that the act of insolvency is committed. Now, we do not read the learned author, with respect, to say that we must prefer decisions of the English Courts to those given by our own High Courts on a construction of identical provision of law. All that this passage means is that the law under the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act is the same as the English law and yet the law may be the same under the Provincial Insolvency law where that law is applicable.

Strong reliance was placed on a decision of the English Court reported in Ex parte Villars: In re Rogers.⁴ There, the facts were that the appellant recovered judgment against the bankrupt and issued the writ and the Sheriff seized the goods of the debtor under the judgment and the goods seized were assigned to the appellant, the execution-creditor. The appellant paid the Sheriff the purchase money and the Sheriff after deducting the rent and other charges paid back the amount to the appellant in satisfaction of the debt for which the attachment was levied. All this was done 14 days before the petition in bankruptcy was presented, and the question that the Court had to consider was "Could the execution-creditor retain the amount of the sale proceeds which he was entitled to recover or the goods?" It is in connection with this question that certain observations were made by Lord Chancellor Cairns and Lord Justice James on which reliance has been placed. At p. 444, the learned Lord Chancellor Cairns says:

"...I cannot find in the 15th and 17th sections any words which would vest in the trustee either the property itself, the complete sale of which to a third party is made the commencement of the bankruptcy, or the proceeds of the sale, which never belonged to the bankrupt."

Lord Justice James at p. 445 also uses similar language when he speaks of

1 [1933] A. I. E. C. 564.

2 [1933] A. I. R. Lah. 814.

3 [1942] A. I. R. Mad. 308.

4 (1874) 9 Ch. App. 432.

treating the completed sale as the act of bankruptcy and what is strenuously urged by Mr. Desai is that under the English law, it is the completed sale that constitutes an act of insolvency. But the question still remains what is the completed sale under the English law. As far as we can gather from the facts of this case, the completed sale was the sale by the Sheriff. As soon as the Sheriff had sold the goods seized under a writ, it became a completed sale. If that was the position under the English law, it is difficult to understand why the sale is not a completed sale under the Indian law when the property is knocked down to the highest bidder. Mr. Desai says that under Indian law, you require a confirmation of the sale. It is only then that the sale becomes absolute. But a completed sale in the meaning of the English law is different from the sale becoming absolute within the meaning of the Indian law. As far as we can see, there is no provision similar to O. XXI, r. 92, in the English law, and, therefore, the English law looked upon the sale by the Sheriff as a completed sale. So that even assuming that we are governed by the English law, it is clear that as soon as the property is seized under a writ—or to use our own language “the property which is under attachment is sold to the highest bidder”, the sale becomes a completed sale. It may be that under the English law, the further concept of having the sale confirmed is not required. Under the Indian law, it is required. But that does not mean that when you are construing the Indian law, you must import into the section not merely the earlier concept of the property being sold to the highest bidder but also the subsequent concept of the sale being confirmed under O. XXI, r. 92. In our opinion, the learned Judge was right in the view that he took that an act of insolvency was committed when the property was sold by the Sheriff on November 18, 1957, by public auction and knocked down to the highest bidder.

The result is that the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

STATE v. J. D. DAROGA.*

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Secs. 173(4), 244, 207A(3), 251A(1)—Accused, before commencement of trial, not supplied with copies of police statements of prosecution witnesses—Whether prosecution debarred from examining such witnesses where copies of such statements not supplied to accused before trial—Discretion of Magistrate to disallow additional evidence when can be exercised.

Where the accused before the commencement of his trial is not supplied with copies of the police statements of prosecution witnesses as required under s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, the prosecution is not thereby debarred from examining these witnesses.

If the prosecution intends to lead evidence copies of which have not been supplied to the defence, the Magistrate might put the prosecution on terms and insist that the additional evidence should not be allowed to go on record unless and until copies of the police statements of witnesses are supplied in advance to the defence.

Gurubachan Singh v. The State of Punjab,¹ referred to.

Where, however, the Magistrate feels that prejudice is likely to be caused to the defence by reason of the fact that the witnesses, who have already been examined,

*Decided, October 25, 1957. Criminal Reference No. 138 of 1957, made by Akbar S. Barela, Sessions Judge, Thana, in Criminal Revision Application No. 13 of 1957, arising could not thereafter be examined with a view to falsify the additional evidence, which was about to be tendered, the Magistrate in his discretion might disallow the prosecution to tender the additional evidence.

THE prosecution case was that the police having received information on March-10, 1956, that one J. D. Daroga, who was the Hydraulic Engineer of the Bombay Municipal Corporation, and four others (accused) were drinking liquor in contravention of the provisions of the Bombay Prohibition Act, 1949, outside one of the bungalows at Tansa lake, raided the premises at about 8 p.m. and surprised the accused when the drinking party was actually on. A police photographer was with the raiding party and he took photographs of the party and impressions of the chance finger prints on bottles and tumblers were also taken. Seven charge-sheets were sent up against the accused and the trying Magistrate, on an application made by the prosecution, consolidated all the cases and ordered these to be tried as one case on the ground that the cases arose out of a single incident. The consolidated case was tried as a summons case. The plea of all the five accused was recorded on September 4, 1956, under s. 242 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, and the accused pleaded not guilty to the charges and claimed to be tried. The case was adjourned to September 26, 1956, and on that date an application was made by the prosecution for permission to examine six additional witnesses in addition to those mentioned in the charge-sheets and whose evidence was recorded on September 4, 1956. Police statements of these six witnesses were supplied to the accused that very day and the points on which they were to be examined were stated in the application. No orders were passed on the application by the Magistrate on that date and the case was adjourned. The case was taken up for hearing on subsequent dates and three out of the aforesaid six new additional witnesses were examined. On January 15, 1957, the prosecution made an application for permission to examine one more witness J. B. Shah. The accused objected to any permission being given for examination of the three new additional witnesses and J. B. Shah. The trying Magistrate passed an order refusing permission to the prosecution to examine these four witnesses on the grounds (1) that the prosecution ought to have supplied to the defence, not later than September 4, 1956, the copies of police statements of these witnesses because the trial commenced on that date and it having failed to do so, it was not entitled in law to examine these witnesses and (2) that the evidence of these witnesses was not relevant.

The prosecution went in revision to the Sessions Judge at Thana. The Sessions Judge disagreed with the finding of the trying Magistrate that under s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, the prosecution was debarred from tendering the aforesaid additional evidence and he also disagreed with the finding of the Magistrate that the evidence which the aforesaid four witnesses proposed to give was irrelevant. Accordingly the Sessions Judge made the present reference to the High Court, observing as follows:—

“...non-furnishing of statements of witnesses under s. 173(4) before the commencement of the trial does not invite either expressly or by implication any bar against the examination of witnesses, whose statements have not been so furnished. On the other hand any such bar would be contrary to the other provisions of the Code, namely, ss. 244, 251(A), 252, 207(A), 288 and 540.

One more circumstance supports this view. With the filing of a charge-sheet under s. 173(1) of the Code, the powers of the police for investigation in respect of that case do not come to an end. Even after filing the charge-sheet, if the police come across fresh facts, they are entitled to make another investigation. Therein they may examine further witnesses. It would be physically impossible to furnish the statements of the witnesses so examined before the commencement of inquiry or trial as required by s. 173(4). Does it follow that therefore the prosecution has no right to examine those witnesses? The conclusion would be so obviously wrong that s. 173(4) has got to be given an interpretation which is more reasonable and which is consistent with the other provisions of the Code.

It was argued that any interpretation of s. 173(4) other than the one pressed on behalf of the accused in this case would render it nugatory. I am unable to agree. In so far as s. 173(4) imposes an obligation on the officer in charge of the police station to furnish the accused with copies of certain documents and statements, the failure to observe that obligation according to the spirit of the law may entail the consequence that the Court may presume that the accused has been prejudiced in his defence and it would be for the prosecution to satisfy the Court that the accused has not been prejudiced. The question of prejudice is no doubt a question of fact and has to be determined on a consideration of all the facts and circumstances, but in case of non-compliance with the provisions of s. 173(4) the accused may have the advantage of a presumption in his favour which the prosecution may have to remove. In Tikamchand v. State (1957 Cr. L.J. 188) the accused, who were being prosecuted for an offence under the Gambling Act, were not furnished before the commencement of the trial with copies of certain documents which were alleged to be instruments of gaming. When these were sought to be proved at the trial, the counsel of the accused objected on the ground that the provisions of s. 173(4) being mandatory, the production of the documents should not be allowed now. That objection was overruled by the trial Court and also by the Sessions Court and, therefore, the accused approached the High Court in revision. The Madhya Bharat High Court held that the non-furnishing of copies was bound to cause prejudice to the accused in his defence, quashed the proceedings and sent the case back for retrial which was to recommence after furnishing copies of the documents to the accused. Therefore, the Court did not hold that the documents cannot be produced in evidence but held that copies should be given and then the trial should commence afresh as on the facts of that case prejudice had been caused to the accused. It was argued before that the whole object of the amendment made to s. 173 in 1955 when the new sub-s. (4) was introduced would be frustrated if the above view were taken. Now the counsel for the accused concedes that the object of the amendments introduced by Act XXVI of 1955 was to expedite trial of criminal cases and at the same time secure fairness of trial. That being the object the test in all cases of violation of procedure where no penalty is provided for is whether prejudice has been caused. If there has been no prejudice, the trial is not vitiated in spite of irregularities. This is the principle on which s. 537, Criminal Procedure Code is based. I am, therefore, unable to agree that s. 173(4) would be nugatory and its object would be frustrated if the evidence relating documents and witnesses of which copies have not been furnished in accordance with s. 173(4) is allowed to be adduced. It is not necessary to refer to the history of legislation, but if we consider the historical background of the development of the mode of trial in England from which we have borrowed the mode, we find that obstacles in the shape of delays in procedure were placed in the way of swift progress from arrest to sentence in order to provide safeguards for the accused against the oppressive exercise of the power of the king. These are, therefore, matters of procedure and the sole test is whether the accused has had a fair trial or whether he has been prejudiced in his defence. It is on that point only that the compliance or non-compliance of the provisions of s. 173(4) is relevant."

MIABHOY J. [His Lordship after stating the facts of the case proceeded:] The first point which arises for consideration is whether the submission of the learned counsel for the accused that the copies of the police statements of the additional witnesses not having been supplied on or before September 4, 1956, the prosecution is debarred from tendering the aforesaid evidence as a matter of law is correct. Sub-section (4) of s. 173 of the Criminal Procedure Code has been recently substituted for the original sub-s. (4) by Act XXVI of 1955. That sub-section is as follows:

"(4) After forwarding a report under this section, the officer in charge of the police station shall, before the commencement of the inquiry or trial, furnish or cause to be furnished to the accused, free of cost, a copy of the report forwarded under sub-section (1) and of the first information report recorded under section 154 and of all other documents or relevant extracts thereof, on which the prosecution proposes to rely, including the statements and confessions, if any, recorded under section 164 and the statements recorded under sub-section (3) of section 161 of all the persons whom the prosecution proposes to examine as its witnesses."

Reading this sub-section, it is quite clear that it imposes an obligation on the officer in charge of a police station to supply free of cost to the defence copies of the police statements of persons whom the prosecution proposes to examine as witnesses. It is also quite clear from sub-s. (4) that this obligation has got to be discharged by the officer in charge of the police station "before the commencement of the inquiry or trial". Therefore, on the facts, there is no doubt whatsoever that the officer in charge of the police station concerned in the present case has committed a breach of the duty cast upon him by sub-s. (4) of s. 173. This is not disputed by the prosecution. But whilst this is so, the question which has got to be considered and answered in the present reference is one an answer to which is not to be found in the present sub-s. (4). The question which has got to be considered is as to what is the effect of a breach of the duty cast upon the police officer under sub-s. (4) of s. 173. The contention of the defence is that the consequence of the breach of this duty is that the prosecution is debarred for ever from examining any person, a copy of whose police statement has not been supplied to the defence. The question for consideration is whether this contention is correct. The learned counsel for the accused frankly admitted that the aforesaid sub-s. (4) or any other part of s. 173 did not state in terms that such is the effect of the breach of duty on the part of the officer in charge of a police station. But the contention was that having regard to the mandatory provisions contained in sub-s. (4) aforesaid, the Legislature intended that such should be the effect. The contention was that if effect was not given to the aforesaid contention of the defence, then the provisions contained in sub-s. (4) would be rendered nugatory and would become a dead-letter. In my opinion, before reaching a conclusion on the aforesaid subject, it is necessary to bear in mind the position of s. 173 in the scheme of the Code. The aforesaid s. 173 finds a place in Part V of the Code of Criminal Procedure and the heading of that Chapter is: "Information to the police and their powers to investigate." Section 173 is to be found in Chap. XIV. All the sections under this Chapter deal with the powers and the duties of the police officer. Having regard to these two important facts, it is quite clear to my mind that the Legislature, when it enacted s. 173, was not dealing with the powers and the duties of the Court in relation to a trial or any inquiry, but it dealt only with the powers and the duties of the police officers during the stage of investigation. Therefore, ordinarily, it would not be proper to look to this particular part of the Code and the aforesaid Chapter for an answer to the question as to what are the powers and the duties which the Court possesses where a prayer is made for the examination of additional witnesses. The learned counsel for the defence contended that the object of amending sub-s. (4) of s. 173 was to put the defence in possession of all the facts on which the prosecution wanted to rely and thereby prevent additional evidence being led against the defence. It was contended that the main object of the aforesaid sub-section was that the prosecution must, before the commencement of an inquiry or trial, make up its mind as to what evidence it wanted to lead against the defence, and having once made up that mind, it was not open to the prosecution to change it and to lead any additional evidence. It is difficult to generalise as to what was the object of the Legislature in introducing the amendment, that it has done, in sub-s. (4) of s. 173. The Supreme Court has made some remarks on this subject in Gurubachan Singh v. The State of Punjab.¹ The relevant remarks are to be found at page 544. The remarks are:

"...The object of this provision is to put the accused on notice of what he has to meet at the time of the inquiry or trial."

It appears that before the aforesaid amendment, the defence had no access to the police statements recorded in the course of investigation. Under the old law, the defence had to wait for having access to the police statements till the witness was examined and the stage of cross-examination was reached. This entailed delay as very often the cross-examining counsel were either not ready to cross-examine as they either wanted the police statement of the witness concerned, or wanted some time for studying the police statement, and in the interval the Court had to wait till the cross-examining counsel had perused the police statement. Therefore, one of the objects of the Legislature, in undertaking amendment to s. 173, also appears to be to prevent an inquiry or trial from being protracted, as it would naturally be, if the defence were not placed in possession of all the materials on which the prosecution intended to rely at the time of the inquiry or trial. Having regard to these two objects, it is impossible, therefore, to say that the Legislature could have intended such a far-reaching effect as to prevent the prosecution from tendering additional evidence altogether provided the evidence was found to be either relevant or in the interest of justice. In my opinion, having regard to the position of s. 173 in the scheme of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the proper sections which are to be looked to decide the aforesaid matter is not s. 173 alone, but also the sections which deal with the powers of the Court relating to inquiries and trials. In the present case, I propose to deal first with those sections which deal with the powers of the Court in relation to summons cases. In my opinion, if one reads the sections which deal with the powers of the Court during the course of a trial in a summons case, then there are clear indications that the Legislature did not intend to debar the prosecution from tendering additional evidence altogether. Section 241, Criminal Procedure Code, says that the Procedure laid down in the subsequent sections shall be observed by the Magistrates in the trial of summons cases. Then s. 244 is in the following terms:—

"244. (1) If the Magistrate does not convict the accused under the preceding section or if the accused does not make such admission, the Magistrate shall proceed to hear the complainant (if any), and take all such evidence as may be produced in support of the prosecution, and also to hear the accused and take all such evidence as he produces in his defence...

(2) The Magistrate may, if he thinks fit, on the application of the complainant or accused, issue a summons to any witness directing him to attend or to produce any document or other thing...

(3) ..."

Therefore, so far as sub-s. (1) of s. 244 is concerned, it clearly provides that after the plea has been recorded, the Magistrate shall take all such evidence as may be produced in support of the prosecution. In this particular section, there is nothing which enjoins that the prosecution shall necessarily be confined only to the examination of those witnesses copies of whose statements have been given by the officer in charge of the police station. On the contrary, the words are wide enough to include the examination of even those witnesses copies of whose statements have not been recorded. In this connection, it is important to bear in mind that an investigation does not necessarily end when a charge-sheet is sent to a Magistrate. It is open to the investigating officer to collect evidence in support of a charge even after the charge-sheet has been sent to the Magistrate. Sometimes important and additional evidence may be brought to light even after the charge-sheet has been sent to the Magistrate. Having regard to this important fact, in my opinion, it would be doing violence to the language of sub-s. (1) if it were interpreted to mean that the prosecution was necessarily circumscribed by what the police officer had omitted to do under sub-s. (4) of s. 173, Criminal Procedure Code. It is true that if the prosecution intends to lead evidence copies of which have not been supplied to the defence, having regard to the intention underlying sub-s. (4) of s. 173, the learned Magistrate might put the prosecution on terms and insist that the additional evidence should not be allowed to go on record unless and until copies of the police statements of the witnesses were supplied in advance so that the defence may know all the full facts of the case, and may be ready to cross-examine the additional witnesses. It may be that, in some cases, where the learned Magistrate might feel that prejudice is likely to be caused to the defence by reason of the fact that the witnesses, who have already been examined, could not thereafter be examined with a view to falsify the additional evidence, which was about to be tendered, the learned Magistrate in his discretion might disallow the prosecution to tender the additional evidence. But it is one thing to say that the prosecution is totally debarred from leading additional evidence and it is entirely another thing to say that the learned Magistrate has a discretion in the matter as to whether additional evidence should or should not be allowed. If we examine some other sections of the Criminal Procedure Code, we find that the same result follows. Sub-section (4) of s. 173 deals not only with the cases of trial but also with cases of inquiry. Section 207A has been introduced by the Legislature by the same amendment by which it amended sub-s. (4) aforesaid. Sub-section (3) of s. 207A is important in connection with the point which requires to be decided. That sub-s. (3) is in the following terms:

"(3) At the commencement of the inquiry, the Magistrate shall, when the accused appears or is brought before him, satisfy himself that the documents referred to in section 173 have been furnished to the accused and if he finds that the accused has not been furnished with such documents or any of them, he shall cause the same to be so furnished."

In this connection, it is important to notice that whereas sub-s. (4) of s. 173 speaks of a duty which is to be performed before the commencement of an inquiry or trial, sub-s. (3) of s. 207A speaks of the duty which is to be performed by the Court "at the commencement of the inquiry." Therefore, it is quite clear from sub-s. (3) of s. 207A that even if the officer in charge of the police station has not supplied the necessary copies to the defence before the commencement of the inquiry, the learned Magistrate has got the power of ordering the prosecution to supply the necessary copies to the defence "at the commencement of the inquiry." If the submission which the learned counsel for the defence makes were correct, then no such power could have been conferred upon the Magistrate under s. 207A(3). If the submission of the defence counsel were, correct, then the moment the police officer failed in his duty of supplying the necessary copies before the commencement of the inquiry, then, no evidence whatsoever could be led by the prosecution. In that case, no power would be given to the Magistrate to make an order calling upon the prosecution to supply the necessary copies to the defence. Exactly the same provisions are to be found in respect of trials of warrant cases. Section 251A of the Criminal Procedure Code has been recently introduced at the same time when sub-s. (4) of s. 173 was substituted. Section 251A(1) is in the following terms:

"(1) When, in any case instituted on a police report, the accused appears or is brought before a Magistrate at the commencement of the trial, such Magistrate shall satisfy himself that the documents referred to in section 173 have been furnished to the accused, and if he finds that the accused has not been furnished with such documents or any of them, he shall cause them to be so furnished."

In addition to this we have also to bear in mind the provisions of s. 540. That section confers power upon the Court to summon a material witness or to examine a person present in Court at any stage of an inquiry, trial or other proceeding. Therefore, examining the argument of the learned defence counsel in the light of the provisions contained in ss. 244, 207A and 251A, it is quite clear that, if sub-s. (4) of s. 173 were to be interpreted in the manner suggested by the defence counsel, then, that interpretation would be in conflict with the aforesaid ss. 244, 207A and 251A of the Criminal Procedure Code. It is well known that a section in a statute is to be so interpreted as to harmonise with the rest of the statute. Under the aforesaid circumstances, in my opinion, the view taken by the learned Magistrate that the breach of the obligation imposed upon a police officer under sub-s. (4) of s. 173 entails the consequence that the prosecution is debarred from tendering any additional evidence, is wrong and the view taken by the learned Sessions Judge is correct and that view must be upheld. In my opinion, the proper way in which the learned Magistrate should have dealt with the question was from the point of view of the prejudice which the breach of the aforesaid obligation had caused or was likely to cause to the defence. I do not propose to say anything on this aspect of the case, because, in my opinion, that aspect will have to be dealt with by the learned Magistrate hereafter. The learned counsel for the defence urged that, having regard to the fact that some of the witnesses have already been examined and cross-examined and that their evidence is over, the defence would be prejudiced inasmuch as the defence had lost the right of eliciting from the witnesses already examined materials which would have been useful in appreciating the additional evidence which is sought to be tendered by the prosecution. In my opinion, this is a proper stand-point from which the application of the prosecution requires to be considered. The learned Sessions Judge has discussed this question, but having regard to the fact that this point has not been dealt with by the learned Magistrate, I do not propose to express any opinion on the same. In my opinion, the learned Magistrate will have to consider this aspect of the case and pass such suitable orders as he may deem fit in the circumstances of the case.

Held, that the Assistant Judge, to whom an appeal filed against an award made by a Board constituted under s. 5 of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act, 1952, was transferred by the District Judge concerned, had jurisdiction to hear the appeal, as the Board was a Court within the meaning of the expression "subordinate Courts" which occurred in the Notifications.

If a statute creating a tribunal says that the tribunal shall be a Court for the limited purpose of certain sections of certain enactments, then the tribunal is not a Court in the sense in which the word "Court" is used in the context of hierarchy of Courts established in the Union of India.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

V. G. Hathi, for the applicant.

B. K. Mehta and K. C. Patel, for opponents Nos. 6 and 7.

VYAS J. This is a petition under art. 226 or under art. 227 of the Constitution of India, and it is filed by Shah Keshavlal Motichand. The relief which the petitioner has prayed for in this petition is that the judgment of the Assistant Judge in Civil Appeal No. 237 of 1956, which was pronounced on January 19, 1957, be quashed. A further relief which is sought by the petitioner is that the order passed by the Board reducing his (petitioner's) dues to Rs. 1,954-8-4 for secured debts and to Rs. 1,158-9-0 for unsecured debts, be also quashed. A direction is sought from this Court to the Board that the Board should accept the debt which was admitted by the debtors and should proceed to pass the award on the basis of admitted debts.

This application raises an interesting point of law, and the point is whether the Board constituted under s. 5 of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act, No. XXIII of 1952, is a Court within the meaning of the expression 'Subordinate Courts' which occurs in the two Notifications, bearing Nos. LD/J/18-5(1)-i and LD/J/18-5(1)-ii, both dated May 23, 1956, one of which was issued under s. 17 and the other under s. 19 of the Saurashtra District and Subordinate Civil Courts Ordinance, 1948 (XI of 1948). The point arises in this way.

Opponents Nos. 6 and 7 applied for the adjustment of their debts under the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act on February 14, 1955. In their application, opponents Nos. 6 and 7 mentioned only two persons as their creditors, and those persons are the present opponents Nos. 3 and 4. On September 27, 1955, opponents Nos. 6 and 7 disclosed further that the petitioner and opponent No. 5 were also their creditors, and they requested that these two persons also be joined as parties to the application. The Board thereupon issued notices to the petitioner and opponent No. 5 also. Thereupon, the petitioner filed his statement before the Court under s. 13(b) of the Act, and in that statement, he showed his dues at Rs. 7,504-12-0. Opponent No. 5 did not file any statement, and, therefore, his debt was declared to be extinguished. On January 21, 1956, it was found that the total debts due by the opponents exceeded Rs. 10,000. The Board at Manavadar, therefore, having no jurisdiction to enquire into the matter, transferred the case to the Board at Junagadh. It is the petitioner's contention in this application that the transfer by the Manavadar Board to the Junagadh Board was not the one which was contemplated under s. 12(2) of the Act, and, therefore, the transfer by the Manavadar Board to the Junagadh Board was one without jurisdiction. At this stage, it may be noted that this objection was not taken by the petitioner when the Junagadh Board started to hear the matter upon its transfer to that Board by the Board at Manavadar. The Junagadh Board proceeded with the enquiry, and in that enquiry opponent No. 6 admitted all the dues of the petitioner. Therefore, the Board thought it unnecessary to examine the petitioner for an explanation in regard to any of the items shown by him as due to him from opponents Nos. 6 and 7. The Board at Junagadh, by an order passed by it on September 28, 1956, which order was passed without calling upon the petitioner to explain the items, disallowed certain items. It is the contention of the petitioner that the Board did not correctly appreciate the accounts which were submitted before it and wrongly believed that the petitioner had abandoned his claim for the amount of Rs. 5,500 which, says the petitioner, he had not in fact abandoned. Upon this contention, the petitioner submits in the present application that the whole approach which was adopted by the Board in this case was an approach which was not lawful and not warranted by the facts.

Upon the award being given by the Junagadh Board, the petitioner filed an appeal, No. 237 of 1955, from the award. That appeal was filed in the Court of the District Judge, Sorath. The appeal was transferred to the Court of the Assistant Judge of Junagadh for disposal. The petitioner objected to the jurisdiction of the Assistant Judge at Junagadh to hear the appeal, but the objection was over-ruled. The learned Assistant Judge dismissed the appeal of the petitioner and confirmed the award which was made by the Board. It is these orders, both of the Board and of the Assistant Judge, which are challenged and sought to be quashed by the petitioner by filing this application.

Now the point which Mr. Hathi for the petitioner has raised is that the Assistant Judge, Junagadh, had no jurisdiction to hear and decide the appeal from a decision of the Board constituted under the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act, and, therefore, the impugned judgment of the Assistant Judge is a judgment without jurisdiction. Under s. 41(2) of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act, an appeal from a decision of the Board lies to the District Court within whose local territorial jurisdiction the Board is situated. But under s. 17 of the Saurashtra Ordinance No. XI of 1948, the Government of Saurashtra may, by a notification in the Official Gazette, empower any Assistant Judge to try such appeals from the decrees and orders of the subordinate Courts as would lie to the District Judge and as may be referred by him to the Assistant Judge. Under s. 19 of the said Ordinance, the Government of Saurashtra may, by notification in the Official Gazette, invest an Assistant Judge with all or any of the powers of a District Judge within a particular part of a district, and may, by like notification from time to time, determine and alter the limits of such part. Now the two notifications bearing Nos LD/J/18-5(1)-i and LD/J/18-5(1)-ii, both dated May 23, 1956, were issued by the Government of Saurashtra, one under s. 17 and the other under s. 19 of the Saurashtra Ordinance No. XI of 1948. Under the notification issued under s. 17, the Assistant Judges at Morvi, Gondal, Porbandar and Bhavnagar were empowered to try such appeals from the decrees and orders of the subordinate Courts as would lie to the District Judge, and as may be referred to them by the District Judge concerned. Under the notification issued under s. 19, the Assistant Judges at Morvi, Gondal and Porbandar were invested with powers to entertain such appeals from the decrees and orders of Subordinate Courts as would lie to the District Judge. It is in these circumstances, in order to decide whether the Assistant Judge of Junagadh at Porbunder who heard the appeal from the decision of the Board had jurisdiction to hear it, that it has become necessary to decide whether the Board is a Court within the meaning of the expression "Subordinate Courts" which occurs in these notifications.

Section 2, sub-s. (3) of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act says: "'Board' means the Board constituted under section 5 of the Act." Sections 5(1) of the Act provides:

"(1) The Government shall constitute one or more Boards for the whole State or for specified local areas.

(2) Every such Board shall consist of—

(a) A Civil Judge, Senior Division, to whom applications may be made under sub-section (1) of section 4 in cases in which the total debts do not exceed ten thousand rupees;

(b) a Civil Judge, Junior Division, to whom applications may be made under sub-section (1) of section 4 in cases in which the total debts do not exceed ten thousand rupees;"

Now, a Civil Judge is a judicial officer, who, in the normal discharge of his duties as a judicial officer, exercises wide civil jurisdiction and acquires a bulk of judicial experience. Upon such a judicial officer the Legislature has conferred special jurisdiction in the matter of adjustment of debts. From the manner in which the Legislature has constituted the Boards, it is evident that the intention of the Legislature was that the judicial experience acquired by a judicial officer in the exercise of civil jurisdiction should be brought to bear upon and be exercised in matters which fall within the scope of the Act. The special jurisdiction which the Legislature has conferred upon a judicial officer constituting a Board is that he should entertain applications for adjustment of debts, issue notices upon the debtors and creditors, frame and decide preliminary issues, take accounts, examine the parties, decide whether the transfer is in the nature of a mortgage, determine the value of property, declare fraudulent alienations void, determine paying capacity, scale down debts, etc. In the discharge of these duties and the performance of these functions, it is inevitable that the judicial experience acquired by him as a result of having exercised civil jurisdiction would be a deciding factor, and that it should be so was the intention of the Legislature when it provided by enacting s. 5 of the Act that the Board should be constituted of a Civil Judge. Our view is that the intention of the Legislature in creating the Boards under the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act was that a civil Court which normally exercises civil jurisdiction would be called a Board when it decides applications under the Act. A mere change of name is immaterial. We must look to the scheme of the Act and the scheme, which I shall presently examine in details, shows that the Board constituted under the Act is a Court.

While performing the above functions, a Civil Judge does not act as persona designata. There are only two ways in which he could possibly act. He could act either as persona designata or as a Court. There is no reason for us to hold that when a Civil Judge who is a judicial officer discharges the duties imposed upon him under the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act—the duties of deciding matters which are of judicial or quasi-judicial nature—and adjudicates upon the rights of the debtors and creditors, he acts in his personal or independent capacity and not as a Court. It is clear in our view that since the word used in the statute (the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act) giving special jurisdiction in matters which are judicial or quasi-judicial is 'Board' and not 'Court', the scheme of the entire Act must be looked into in order to find out whether the matters are to be decided by the Civil Judge as a Court or in his personal capacity (See *Kiran Chandra v. Kalidas*¹). As we shall presently point out upon the examination of the scheme of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act, it is clear that the Civil Judge acting under the said Act does not act as a persona designata, but as a Court. In the body of the said Act, there is a scheme which clearly shows that the Legislature intended that the Civil Judge constituting a Board should act as a Court and not as persona designata. Section 54 provides:

"No application or proceeding in regard to the insolvency of a debtor shall be dealt with by any other Court."

The word 'other' in the expression 'any other Court' is significant. It has been used with a purpose, and the purpose is to show the intention of the Legislature that the Civil Judge, in the discharge of his duties under the Act, acts as a Court and not as a persona designata. This conclusion is, in our opinion, inescapable.

In the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act, 1939, there was s. 8 which provided:

"All proceedings under this Act before the Board shall be deemed to be judicial proceedings for the purposes of sections 193 and 228 of the Indian Penal Code."

When the Legislature said that the proceedings before the Board should be deemed to be judicial proceedings, though for a limited purpose only, i.e. for the purpose of ss. 193 and 228 of the Indian Penal Code, it clearly intended that they were not judicial proceedings properly so called. Even for the purpose of ss. 193 and 228 of the Indian Penal Code, they were only to be deemed to be judicial proceedings. In the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act, there are no provisions analogous to the provisions of s. 8 of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act, 1939, and this would point to the intention of the Legislature to consider the proceedings held before a Board as judicial proceedings.

Then in the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1939 there was s. 15 which said:

"A Board shall in all proceedings under this Act be subject to the control of the District Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction it is ... established."

Now if the Board under the said Act were a Court, it would not have been necessary to provide that it would be subject to the control of the District Court, for all Courts in a District are subject to the control of a District Court. In the Saurashtra Act, there is no section analogous to the provisions of s. 15 of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1939. This would also, in our opinion, show that the Legislature intended that the Board constituted under the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act should be a Court. If the Legislature had intended that the Board was not to be a Court, it would have also made a provision in the Act as to under whose authority and control the Board would be.

In the view we are taking, viz. that the Board constituted under the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act is a Court, we are fortified by the fact that the authority before whom the applications for adjustment of debts are made and who adjudicates upon the debts under the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1947 is, by the Legislature, called a Court. Because the Legislature has called him a Court, we do not find in that statute provisions analogous to the provisions of s. 7 of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1939, viz. the provisions regarding vesting of certain powers of civil Courts in that authority, but, on the contrary, we find s. 46 regarding the application of the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure to the proceedings held by him. These characteristics, viz. the absence in the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of the provisions analogous to those of s. 7 of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1939 and the presence in the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act of the provisions (see s. 44) analogous to those of s. 46 of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1947 would, in our opinion, be sufficient indication that the Board constituted under the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act is a Court.

In the case of People's Own Prov. & Gen. Ins. Co. v. Guracharya,¹ it was held that the Debt Adjustment Board set up under the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act, 1939, was not a Court subordinate to the High Court in order to attract the application of s. 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was held accordingly that no revisional application lay to the High Court from the orders of the Debt Adjustment Board. Now the People's Own Prov. & Gen. Ins. Co. v. Guracharya was a case under the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act, 1939, and the question that fell to be considered in that case was whether the Board established under the Act was a Court, and it was held that it was not a Court. It is to be noted, and this would substantially distinguish that case from the present case, that under the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1939, the word "Court" was defined, and the Legislature had provided that for the purpose of that Act, the word "Court", in ss. 17, 61 and 63 of the Act, and where it occurred for the first time in sub-s. (1) of s. 62 of that Act, meant a District Court to which an appeal lay against the award of a Board under s. 9. The Legislature provided further that in ss. 13, 14, 66, 67A, 75 and 83 and in s. 62 where the word 'Court' occurred for the second time in sub-s. (1), 'Court' meant a District Court, a Court of the Assistant Judge or a Court of a First Class Subordinate Judge, as the case might be, hearing an appeal against an award of a Board under s. 9. The Legislature then said that in the remaining provisions of the Act wherever the expression 'Court' occurred, it meant a civil Court of competent jurisdiction. Now, as the Board constituted under the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1939 did not answer the definition of 'Court' as given in the Act, it was held, and with great respect rightly, that the Board was not a Court.

Now, in the present case the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act does not define 'Court' and we have to gather the intention of the Legislature from the scheme of the Act. As I have stated above, the essence of the scheme of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act is that in the decision of the questions falling within the scope of the Act, the judicial experience of a Civil Judge who has exercised civil jurisdiction must play a vital and decisive role. We find it difficult to believe that when the Legislature conferred special jurisdiction upon a judicial officer under the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act, it intended to enact that the status which such judicial officer possessed while exercising normal civil jurisdiction should be withdrawn from him and he should cease to be a Court. While exercising special jurisdiction, which is in the nature of the jurisdiction of a Court, the Civil Judge who is acting as a Board may not be deciding civil suits properly so called, but because he adjudicates only upon debts and decides the rights as between debtors and creditors only, there is no reason why we should hold that he is acting as a persona designata and not as a Court.

There is another reason also why the decision in the People's Own Prov. & Gen. Ins. Co. v. Guracharya's case would not help Mr. Hathi's client. It was, as I said, a decision under the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1939. Now in the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1939, there was s. 7 which said:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act and any rules, the Board shall have the same powers as are vested in civil Courts under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, when trying a suit and in particular in respect of the following matters:

- (a) joining any necessary or proper parties;
- (b) summoning and enforcing the attendance of any person and examining him on oath;
- (c) compelling the production of documents;
- (d) issuing commissions for the examination of witnesses; and
- (e) proof of facts by affidavits."

The learned Chief Justice took the view that if the Board had been intended by the Legislature to be a Court, it would not have been necessary to provide that it shall have the same powers as are vested in civil Courts under the Code of Civil Procedure in respect of certain matters. The provision contained in s. 7, sub-s. (1), of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1939 regarding the vesting in the Board of certain powers of civil Courts under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, for certain purposes only would show that the Legislature did not intend the Board created under the said Act to be a Court. As I have said, in the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act, there is no section which speaks of vesting in the Board of the powers of a civil Court under the Code of Civil Procedure for certain specified purposes only, and this, in our opinion, would show that the Legislature intended the Board to be a Court, and, therefore, did not consider it necessary to enact that it should be vested with certain powers which are exercised by the civil Courts under the Code of Civil Procedure. If the Legislature, while enacting the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act, had intended that the Board should not be a Court, then, it would have made provisions analogous to the provisions of s. 7 of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1939; but it did not do so. Thus, the intention of the Legislature in enacting the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors Relief Act, in which there is no section analogous to s. 7 of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1939, would show that the Board established under the former Act is a Court.

Before I proceed further, I must revert to the provisions of s. 4 of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1939. Section 4 consists of several sub-sections and sub-s. (3) provides:

"(4) The Board shall consist of—

(a) one person who holds or has held office under the Crown in India, or who has been practising as a legal practitioner for such period as may be prescribed, or

(b) a body or association of persons, or

(c) persons not less than three and not more than five in number."

It would be interesting to compare the abovementioned constitution of the Board created under the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1939 with the constitution of the Board created under s. 5 of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors Relief Act. Under s. 5 of the latter Act, a Board has to consist of a Civil Judge, Senior Division, or a Civil Judge, Junior Division, and as I have stated above, a Civil Judge has judicial experience, and he normally exercises civil jurisdiction. In our view, the fundamental difference in the manner of the constitution of the Board under the two Acts would itself show why the Board constituted under the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1939 was not considered to be a Court. In our view, for the reasons stated above, namely the fundamental difference between the constitution of the Board under the two Acts and an examination of the scheme of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act, we must come to the conclusion that the Board established under the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act is a Court.

In the case of *Spring Mills, Ltd. v. Ambekar*¹ it was held that the mere fact that a statute provided an appeal to a Court from a particular body did not necessarily make that body a Court. It was observed that the Authority under the Payment of Wages Act was not a Court within the meaning of s. 115 and the High Court had no revisional jurisdiction over the orders of that Authority. This case can hardly help Mr. Hathi's client. We are not deciding that the Board established under the Saurashtra Act is a Court simply because a provision is made in the body of the Act for an appeal to the District Court from the decision of the Board. We have come to the conclusion that the Board is a Court upon a detailed examination of the provisions of the entire Act. We have come to the conclusion that the Board is a Court because the Civil Judge who constitutes the Board decides the matters falling within the scope of the Act not as a persona designata, but as a Court. Besides, it may be noted that Spring Mills Ltd. v. Ambekar was a case under the Payment of Wages Act and in the Payment of Wages Act there is a section, being s. 18. The provisions of s. 18 are:

"Every authority appointed under sub-section (1) of section 15 shall have all the powers of a civil Court under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, for the purpose of taking evidence and of enforcing the attendance of witnesses and compelling the production of documents."

It is in the light of the provisions of s. 18 that the Court interpreted the intention of the Legislature and held that the Authority under the Payment of Wages Act was not a Court within the meaning of s. 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 18 clearly provided that for certain limited or specified purposes only the Authority had the powers of a civil Court under the Code of Civil Procedure. The clear implication of this provision was that excepting for the purposes specified in the body of s. 18, the Authority was not to be construed as a Court. In the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act, there is no section analogous to s. 18 of the Payment of Wages Act. This also would show that the scheme of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act is that the Board constituted under the Act is a Court.

I have, in passing, already made reference to s. 44 of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act. Section 44 lays down:

"Save as otherwise expressly provided in this Act, the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, shall apply to all proceedings under this Chapter."

Here also we have got the inherent evidence of the intention of the Legislature in enacting the said Act. In the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of

1939, there are no provisions analogous to the provisions of s. 44 of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors Relief Act, whereas in the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1947, we do find in s. 46 thereof provisions analogous to those of s. 44 of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act. In our view, the fact that the Legislature enacted that the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, shall apply to all proceedings under Chapter II of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act would also be a good indication to show that the intention of the Legislature was that the Board constituted under the said Act should be a Court.

It is true that Lord Halsbury says in Vol. VIII at page 526 (Hailsham's edition):—

"There are tribunals with many of the trapping of a Court which nevertheless are not Courts in the sense of exercising judicial power. A tribunal is not necessarily a Court in the strict sense of exercising judicial power because it gives a final decision; hears witnesses on oath; two or more contending parties appear before it...it gives decisions which affect the rights of the subjects; there is an appeal to a Court."

But this passage cannot help Mr. Hathi's client. There is no doubt that tribunals which may possess some of the attributes of Courts are not necessarily Courts. As the passage itself shows, the essence of the tribunal being a Court lies in its exercising judicial power. As observed at an earlier stage (page 525) by the same learned author:

"The distinction appears to be not so much whether the particular tribunal is a Court of justice but whether it is a Court in law."

Therefore, we have to see not what the tribunal does, but what it is in law. For this purpose we have to go to the enactment which constitutes the tribunal and find out whether the enactment constitutes it into a mere tribunal other than a Court or into a Court in the strict sense of the word. On a careful analysis of the enactment in question, we have come to the conclusion that the Board constituted under the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act is a Court.

Our attention is also invited to a decision of the Calcutta High Court in the case of Gobinda Chandra v. Rashmoni Dassya.¹ It was a case under the Bengal Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act. We have not got before us the Bengal Act, and we are, therefore, unable to examine the scheme of that Act. In the body of the judgment the learned Judges, with great respect, did not examine the scheme of the Act, and, therefore, we are unable to appreciate the reasons upon which they held that the Board was not a Court. We are unable to agree with Mr. Hathi that the Calcutta case would assist his clients.

I must next refer to a decision of the Saurashtra High Court in Shah Kevashi Jethidas v. Zala Dilubha Mulsinkji.² In this case, it was held by a Division Bench of the Saurashtra High Court, consisting of the learned Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Baxi, that the Board exercising jurisdiction under the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act was not a Court. It was observed that a revision application to the High Court against the order of the Board was not accordingly competent. Upon a perusal of the judgment of the learned Judges in this case, it would appear that they referred to the Bombay case of the People's Own Prov. & Gen. Ins. Co. v. Guracharya and the Calcutta case which I have just mentioned. It appears from the judgment of the learned Judges that the distinction emerging from a comparative examination of the provisions of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Acts of 1939 and 1947, in relation to the provisions of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act was not brought to the notice of the learned Judges. Accordingly, with great respect, we do not feel called upon to follow that decision.

The result, therefore, is that upon an examination of the scheme of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act, we hold that the Legislature, in constituting the Boards under s. 5 of the Act, intended that the Board should be a Court. If a statute creating a tribunal says that the tribunal shall be a Court for the limited purpose of certain sections of certain enactments, then the tribunal is not a Court in the sense in which the word "Court" is used in the context of hierarchy of Courts established in the Union of India. But, in the body of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act, we do not find any such provision made in relation to the Board created under s. 5 of the Act. We must, therefore, hold for the reasons stated in the course of this judgment that a Board constituted under s. 5 of the Saurashtra Agricultural Debtors' Relief Act is a Court.

The next point which Mr. Hathi has endeavoured to make before us is that no opportunity was given by the Junagadh Board to the petitioner of being heard in the matter of his dues from his debtors-opponents Nos. 6 and 7. It is no doubt true that upon the admission of debts by opponents Nos. 6 and 7, the Junagadh Board did not consider it necessary to put the petitioner in the box and seek any explanation from him in respect of the various items which, according to the petitioner, were due to him from opponents Nos. 6 and 7. It is to be remembered, however, that the learned Assistant Judge, on appeal, went exhaustively into the question of debts which were due by opponents Nos. 6 and 7 to the various creditors, including the petitioner, and there is no doubt that when the appeal was heard by the learned Assistant Judge, the petitioner's learned advocate was present, and argued the case on behalf of his client. We, therefore, do not see much substance in the grievance which Mr. Hathi makes before us that his client was not heard by the Junagadh Board. Then again, if we peruse the appellate judgment of the learned Assistant Judge, it would appear that the learned Judge carefully went into the various books of account maintained by the petitioner. The petitioner maintained four books of account, and in these books of account there were various items of interest and various other items. The learned Judge paid careful attention to the question of these items and their relations inter se. He considered exhs. 18, 19, 20 and 21 which were the different books of account maintained by the petitioner. In our view, therefore, upon the finding of fact regarding the quantum of the debts due to the petitioner from opponents Nos. 6 and 7, the learned Judge has arrived at a correct conclusion. The learned Judge saw no reason to interfere with the view taken by the Junagadh Board in that connection. Therefore, on merits also, we see no substance in the contention pressed before us by Mr. Hathi.

In the result, the application fails and is rejected with costs.

Application rejected.

Central Provinces and Berar Sales Tax Act (XXI of 1947), Sec. 2(g)—Building materials purchased by contractor to carry out building contract—Whether such materials sold by contractor to owner of building within s. 2(g) of Act—Such materials whether liable to sales tax.

Building materials in a building contract which are purchased by a building contractor from third parties and which are used by him in the construction of a building and the property in which, under the contract, was not to pass to the owner when the goods were purchased by the contractor cannot be said to be sold by him to the owner of the building within the meaning of s. 2(g) of the Central Provinces and Berar Sales Tax Act, 1947, and are not, therefore, liable to any sales tax under the Act.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

K. M. Chhaya, for the applicant.

B. R. Sompura, Special Government Pleader, for the opponents.

VYAS J. These three Special Applications raise a common question and we propose to decide the question by a common judgment. The point which arises in these applications is whether the building materials in a building contract which are purchased by a building contractor from third parties and which are used by him in the construction of a building could be said to be sold by him to the owner of the building within the meaning of cl. (g) of s. 2 of the Central Provinces and Berar Sales Tax Act, 1947.

The petitioners entered into a contract for the construction of buildings. They supplied the entire material required for the construction of the buildings. It is contended on their behalf that the supply of the building materials by them, after purchasing the said materials from third parties, was not a sale of goods and, therefore, the State Legislature had no jurisdiction to declare such transactions as sale of goods or make them taxable as sale of goods. It is contended for the petitioners that the provisions of the Act—the Central Provinces and Berar Sales Tax Act, 1947—which are sought to be utilised by the State for the purpose of levying a tax upon the building materials, in so far as they are construed to interpret the supply of goods in the execution of a building contract as sale of goods liable to sales tax, are ultra vires and void. It is also the contention of the applicants that r. 4 of the rules framed under the Act, which has been framed for calculating the price of goods in a contract which includes price of goods as well as work and labour, is arbitrary and that the State Legislature has no power to delegate the function of laying down the principles of calculating price of goods in a building contract to the State Government.

In the Government of India Act, 1935, 7th Sch., List 2, there was an item, being Item No. 48, under which the Provincial Legislature was empowered to legislate in respect of taxes on the sale of goods. In the Constitution of India there is a corresponding provision and that provision is contained in Item No. 54, List II, Sch. VII. Under this item, the State Legislature has power to legislate on taxes on sale or purchase of goods other than newspapers. It is contended for the petitioners that the words "sale of goods" are not defined in the Government of India Act nor in the Constitution, but that, at the time when the Government of India Act came into operation or at the time when the Constitution came into force, the words "sale of goods" had a definitive meaning in law and were governed by the Indian Sale of Goods Act, which was based on the English Sale of Goods Act. In other words, the contention of the petitioners would seem to be that when the Constitution was drafted and came into force, it was clearly understood what in law amounted to sale of goods, and it is argued that the intention of the framers of the Constitution in conferring power on the State Legislature to legislate on the subject of imposing taxes on the sale of goods was not to confer anything more than a power to impose taxes on what was then understood in law as sale of goods. Thus the question which arises for our decision in these applications is whether, under a contract of building, the supply of building materials by the contractor for the construction of a building could be considered as sale of goods.

In our view, the contracts of the nature undertaken by these applicants are not contracts for the sale of goods. This is patently clear on the face of the contracts themselves. That being so, the Legislature of a State has no power to levy sales tax by treating these transactions as involving sale of goods so as to bring them within the purview of the Central Provinces and Berar Sales Tax Act, 1947. We must accept the submission of the applicants' learned advocate that the Legislature has no power to include within the definition of "sale" a transaction which is not a "sale" and so extend its power to tax transactions which are wholly outside their legislative field. In our view, until the building materials are affixed to the building, the property therein would remain with the building contractor, notwithstanding the fact that the materials might have been approved by the employer or his agent. Of course, if there is an agreement to the contrary, viz., an agreement to treat the property in building materials as having been transferred from the contractor to the owner as soon as the contractor purchases those materials from a third party for using them in the construction of a building, the case would assume a different aspect. But, with that aspect of the matter we are not called upon to deal in these applications. It is, therefore, clear to us that unless there is a contract intending specifically to pass the property in the materials as and when they are brought to the site, the property would pass only when the materials are affixed to the building. As Mr. Justice Sinha observed in the case of *D. Sarkar & Bros. v. Commercial Tax Officer*¹ (p. 292):

1 [1957] A. I. R. Cal. 223.

3 [1957] A. I. R. Madhya Bharat 139.

"...The contract is treated as an entire contract to build, and the price is to be paid on a lump-sum basis or the amount ascertained according to the schedule of rates after measuring the quantity."

It may be noted that in deciding the above-mentioned Calcutta case, Mr. Justice Sinha followed a decision of the Madras High Court in the case of Dunkley & Co. v. State of Madras.² It was held by the learned Judges of the Madras High Court that in construing the provisions of the Act, the Court should seek to ascertain the meaning and intention of the Parliament from the language of the statute itself. The learned Judges held that the expression "sale of goods" signified a contract whereby the property in the goods was actually transferred from the seller to the buyer. With respect, their Lordships put a plain and natural construction upon the words "sale of goods". Their Lordships pointed out that the legislative power of a Provincial Legislature to levy a tax on sale of goods was confined only to the transaction of the sale and they pointed out that building contracts, which expression included contracts for the construction of dams, road work, bridges etc., were always considered in law as entire and indivisible contracts in the sense that the complete fulfilment of the promise by one party was a condition precedent to the right of the other party to call for the fulfilment of any part of the promise by the other. In our view, there is no element of sale of the materials in a building contract, and the contract is an indivisible contract. It is impossible to accept the contention that as and when a building contractor goes on purchasing building materials, he goes on selling those materials to the owner of the building even before the building is completed. It is impossible to take the view that after the building materials are purchased by the contractor and sold by him to the owner, they are affixed to the building. It is clear to our minds that unless the work for the completion of which the contractor took the contract was completed, the contractor would not be entitled to the price fixed under the contract. We have looked into the contracts, which are the subject-matter of these applications. We are unable to discover anything in the terms of the contracts which would imply a contract for the sale of materials for a stipulated price. There is no doubt that the property in the materials passed to the owner of the land, not by virtue of delivery of the materials as goods under an agreement of sale which stipulated a price for the materials, but because the materials were affixed to the building in pursuance of the contract. When the property in the entire building would pass to the owner, then and then only, and not before then, the property in the materials which are fixed to the building would also pass to the owner. A building comprises several materials, and, that being so, we cannot conceive of two different points of time, one when the property in the materials would pass from the contractor to the owner and the next when the property in the building as distinct from the materials would pass to the owner. We have thought over the question, and have examined the contentions advanced before us by the learned advocates on behalf of both sides, but we find it impossible to accept the contention of the learned Special Government Pleader that the property in the building materials went on passing from the contractor to the owner as and when the contractor went on purchasing those materials from third parties. In the view which we are taking, we are fortified by the decisions above referred to of the Madras High Court and the Calcutta High Court.

1 [1957] A. I. R. Cal. 283.

2 [1954] A. I. R. Mad. 1130.

On behalf of the State the learned Special Government Pleader invited our attention to a decision of the Rajasthan High Court in the case of Bhuramal v. Rajasthan State.¹ The learned Judges in this case pointed out in para. 11 of their judgment:

"Though, therefore, the contractor is handing over a completed building or dam or bridge according to the terms of the contract, what he is really selling is the materials which are included in the building etc., in addition to the labour charges which he has incurred, and charges for his own work and skill."

Upon a careful consideration of the implication of these observations it would appear that even these observations would show that the building materials were not looked upon by the learned Judges as having been sold by the contractor to the owner as and when the contractor went on purchasing them from third parties. The learned Judges took the view that when a building was completed and when the contractor was handing over the completed building to the owner, he was selling the materials, which were used in construction of the building, to the owner. Now, so far as the view taken by the Rajasthan High Court is concerned, viz., that when the completed building was handed over by the contractor to the owner, he was selling the materials to the owner, we are, with respect, unable to follow that view. As we have stated above, a building contract is one and indivisible contract, in which there is no transfer of goods or selling of materials as and when the materials are purchased by the contractor. In our view, nothing passes from a contractor to the owner until the entire building is completed. We may look at the case from this aspect. If upon the completion of a building, the owner does not approve of the building with the result that the contractor is compelled to pull down the building and build another one to the satisfaction of the owner, what happens? Would the owner be liable to pay the price of the building materials used in that building to the contractor? The answer would be in the negative. This would show, apart from anything else, that the property in the building materials does not pass to the owner from the contractor unless and until the building is completed and approved of by the owner to whom the delivery of the building is handed over. Take another instance. If for some reason the owner repudiates the contract after the building materials are purchased by the contractor, what is the position? If the property in the goods has already passed from the contractor to the owner, would the contractor be entitled to call upon the owner to pay him the price for the goods used by him upto that point of time upon the contention that the owner rescinded the contract? Here again, the answer would be in the negative. Thus, it would be clear, upon an examination of the various aspects of the contract, that a building contract, being one and indivisible contract and the question of handing over of the building materials not arising until the whole building is completed, the property in the building materials would not pass to the owner as and when they are purchased by the contractor.

The learned Special Government Pleader has next invited our attention to a decision of the Nagpur High Court in the case of Pandit Banarsi Das v. State of Madhya Pradesh.² In this case, a Division Bench of the Nagpur High Court observed that if a building contract was not to be split up into its component parts, that is to say, material and labour, in legislative practice relating to the ordinary regulation of sale of goods, there was no warrant for holding that it could not be so split up even for purposes of taxation. The learned Judges said that building materials were goods and there was payment for materials although it was not made separately, but as part of a larger amount. Again, with respect, we find ourselves compelled to differ from the view taken by the learned Judges of the Nagpur High Court. Upon a plain construction of the expression "sale of goods" and upon a consideration of the fact that there is nothing contained in the contracts which are the subject-matters of these applications to suggest that the property in the goods was to pass as and when the goods were being purchased by the contractor, we must hold that the contract was one and indivisible and that the property in the building materials was not to pass from the contractor to the owner until the building was completed, and once the building was completed what passed from the contractor to the owner was proprietary right in the immovable property. What passed from the contractor to the owner was not the property in the building materials as distinct from immovable property, i.e., the building itself.

The learned Special Government Pleader has then invited our attention to a decision of the Madhya Bharat High Court in the case of F. & C. Osler (India) Ltd. v. M. B. State.¹ In this case, the learned Judges held that even assuming that in some of the contracts there was affixing of what at one time were chattels, the element of sale of chattel might be less predominant than the element of bringing into existence an immovable property and that for that reason they might not be said to involve a sale. We are unable to see how these observations could help the State. On the contrary they help the applicants. It would all depend upon what was the predominant element in a contract. If the predominant element was to bring into existence an immovable property, then the transaction would not involve a sale of the building materials. There is no doubt that in these applications what we are concerned with are transactions in which the predominant element was not the sale of the building materials, but the bringing into existence of an immovable property. That being so, even the Madhya Bharat case would not assist the learned Special Government Pleader.

Accordingly, for the reasons stated above, we are of the view that the building materials which were purchased by the applicants-contractors from third parties, and which were used by them in constructing the buildings for which they had taken the contracts, would not fall within the ambit of the expression "sale of goods" in cl. (g) of s. 2 of the Central Provinces and Berar Sales Tax Act, 1947. Therefore, they would not be liable to sales tax. In the light of this conclusion there does not survive any necessity to consider whether r. 4 of the rules framed under the Act is ultra vires or intra vires. The provisions of this rule would not be attracted in view of our finding that the supply of building materials by a contractor to the owner would not amount to a sale within the meaning of cl. (g) of s. 2 of the Act. All these applications are accordingly allowed, and it is declared that the building materials supplied by the applicants to the State in the course of the execution of the building contracts would not amount to a sale of the said materials within the meaning of cl. (g) of s. 2 of the Act and, therefore, they would not be liable to any sales tax. The opponent in all these cases will bear its own costs and pay the costs of the applicants.

Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947), Secs. 33, 33A, 36, 19(3)(d)—Industrial Disputes (Appellate Tribunal) Act (XLVIII of 1950), Secs. 22, 12—Meaning of expression "concerned in such dispute" in s. 33—Workers in ring frame department of mill dismissed pending dispute before Industrial Tribunal relating to seniority between workers in bleaching department of same mill—Mill not obtaining permission of Tribunal before dismissing workmen—Application by dismissed workers under s. 33A to Tribunal whether maintainable—Whether such workmen "concerned" in disputes pending before Tribunal.

The expression "concerned in such dispute" in s. 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, means really concerned or directly, personally or primarily concerned in such dispute, and not merely interested in such dispute.

Certain workers of a mill belonging to the ring frame department of the mill, who were working as doffers, were dismissed by the mill for misconduct. The workers made an application under s. 33A of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, to the Industrial Tribunal contending that at the date of their dismissal certain disputes between the mill and its workmen were pending before the Tribunal, that it was obligatory upon the mill to take permission of the Tribunal before dismissing them and that as the mill did not obtain such prior permission, the mill violated the provisions of s. 33 of the Act. The disputes pending before the Tribunal when these workers were dismissed related to determination of seniority between certain workers of the bleaching department of the mill and the change over which was to be effected upon the basis of the seniority. On the question of the maintainability of the application under s. 33A of the Act:—

Held, that the applicant workers were not the workmen concerned in the disputes which were pending before the Tribunal at the date upon which they were dismissed and that, therefore, the provisions of s. 33 of the Act were not attracted and the Tribunal had no jurisdiction to entertain the application under s. 33A of the Act.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

I. V. Nanavaty for H. M. Chinoy, for the applicant.

M. P. Thakkar, for respondents Nos. 2, 3 and 4.

VYAS J. This is a petition under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India, made by the New Jehangir Vakil Mills Ltd., Bhavnagar, and it arises out of an order made by the Industrial Tribunal, Rajkot, in Miscellaneous Application No. 196 of 1956. This petition raises an interesting question, and the question raised is the one of construing s. 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. This question has arisen in this way. Miscellaneous Application No. 196 of 1956 was an application which was filed by certain three workers of the New Jehangir Vakil Mills Ltd., Bhavnagar, under s. 33A of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. The three workers complained under s. 33A of the Act that they were dismissed by notices served upon them on April 17, 1956, and the dismissal was ordered without the previous permission of the Industrial Tribunal, Rajkot. The complaint of the three workers was that at the date of their dismissal, certain disputes in which the New Jehangir Vakil Mills Ltd. and also its workmen were concerned were pending before the Tribunal and, therefore, it was obligatory, under the Act, for the Mills to have sought the previous permission of the Tribunal before dismissing the workmen. It may be noted that the three workmen who made the application under s. 33A of the Act were the workmen belonging to the ring frame department of the New Jehangir Vakil Mills Ltd., at Bhavnagar. They were working as doffers. They were dismissed by the Mills on April 17, 1956, and the ground for the dismissal was the misconduct of those workers, the misconduct being that the workers threw bobbins at the Technical Manager. On the date of their dismissal, two disputes were pending before the Tribunal. Those two disputes were Adjudications Nos. 56 and 62 of 1955. In Adjudication No. 56 of 1955, the dispute to be adjudicated upon was a dispute relating to compensation payable to the workers of the winding and warping department. In Adjudication No. 62 of 1955, the dispute to be adjudicated upon was in regard to the determination of seniority between the three workers of the bleaching department and the change over which was to be effected upon the basis of the said seniority. Now, the three workmen Hira Ramji, Prema Nanji and Popat Bhikha, who were dismissed by the Mills on April 17, 1956, contended that since the adjudication proceedings mentioned above were pending at the date of their dismissal, it was obligatory upon the Mills to take the permission of the Industrial Tribunal before dismissing them, and that as the Mills did not obtain such prior permission from the Industrial Tribunal, they violated the provisions of s. 33 of the Act. It was upon these contentions that the three workmen complained under s. 33A of the Act to the Industrial Tribunal, so that the Tribunal might adjudicate upon their complaint.

Upon the above complaint being filed by the three workmen of the ring frame department of the Mills, the Mills raised a preliminary objection to the maintainability of the workmen's application under s. 33A of the Act. The preliminary objection which was taken by the Mills was that the three workmen were not concerned in the disputes which were pending before the Tribunal and, therefore, the provisions of s. 33 would not be attracted and accordingly the Tribunal would have no jurisdiction to entertain the workmen's complaint under s. 33A of the Act.

The Industrial Tribunal at Rajkot, upon the abovementioned preliminary objection being taken by the Mills, held that although it was true that the three workmen, Hira, Prema and Popat, were not directly concerned in the disputes which were pending adjudication in Adjudications Nos. 56 and 62 of 1955, they became concerned in those disputes, since the orders of reference in those disputes, which were pending adjudication, styled the disputes as those between the New Jehangir Vakil Mills Ltd., Bhavnagar, and its workmen represented by the Mill Kamdar Union, Bhavnagar, and since the three workmen mentioned above were members of the said Union. Upon this view of the matter, which the learned Member of the Industrial Tribunal took, he held that the workmen Hira, Prema and Popat were entitled to make an application to the Tribunal under s. 33A of the Act. It is from this order of the Tribunal that the present petition under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India is filed by the New Jehangir Vakil Mills Ltd., Bhavnagar.

Now the point which falls to be determined in this petition is a point of construction of s. 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. Section 33 provides:—

"During the pendency of any conciliation proceedings or proceedings before a Tribunal in respect of any industrial dispute, no employer shall—

(a) alter, to the prejudice of the workmen concerned in such dispute, the conditions of service applicable to them immediately before the commencement of such proceedings; or

(b) discharge or punish, whether by dismissal or otherwise, any workmen concerned in such dispute, save with the express permission in writing of the conciliation officer, Board or Tribunal, as the case may be."

Now, the subject-matter of controversy in this case is the expression "concerned in such dispute". Now it is clear that an industrial dispute may be of various kinds. There may be a dispute which might affect the entire body of workmen; for instance, a dispute in the matter of dearness allowance, or fixation of wage scale, or in the matter of leave rules, etc. On the other hand, there might be disputes which might pertain only to a class of workers as distinguished from the entire body of workers, or a part of the establishment. For instance, there may be a dispute relating to the dismissal of a new worker. There may be a dispute relating to service conditions of a particular part of the establishment. There may be a dispute in respect of wages, say, of workers of the winding department, and so on. There may be various kinds of industrial disputes. Before the provisions of s. 33 of the Act can be invoked, the Court must be satisfied that the employer had, to the prejudice of the workmen concerned in a dispute, altered the conditions of service applicable to them. We have carefully considered the various submissions which were advanced before us by the learned advocate Mr. Nanavaty for the Mills and the learned advocate Mr. Thakkar for the workmen, and we have come to the conclusion, having regard to the plain language used in s. 33 of the Act, that the expression "concerned in such dispute" means really concerned or directly, personally or primarily concerned in such dispute, and not merely interested in such dispute. It is not inconceivable that if a particular workman working in a particular department of the Mills is dismissed, the workers of the other departments of the Mills might sympathise with him and might make a common cause with his grievance. It is, therefore, conceivable that in a dispute in which only a particular worker might be concerned, the workers of the other departments of the Mills might be interested. But such an interest would not be the same thing as being "concerned" within the meaning of s. 33 of the Act. What we are emphasising is that in the case of legal or quasi-legal proceedings, a person without being a party to the proceedings may still be interested in the result of the proceedings because of various circumstances, such as a close relationship with the parties, or the pendency of other proceedings in which he is involved and in which the same question may be raised. The word "interest" is a wide generic word which clearly enough has not the same legal import as the word "concerned". In our opinion, the word "concerned" connotes a kind of specific, direct interest, and in a given legal or quasi-legal proceedings, it implies a direct and personal interest which a party to the proceedings would have in the result of those proceedings, when the same are capable of directly affecting him in any adjudication beneficially or prejudicially according to the result. It is clear that a mere indirect or altruistic interest in the result of the proceedings is not to be confused with the direct and personal concern in the proceedings. A personal concern in the proceedings would imply that the proceedings are of such a nature that their result would directly benefit or prejudice the persons concerned in the proceedings as parties to those proceedings. Clearly, therefore, if in a given case the entire body of workers make a common cause with a workman who is dismissed from the employment of the Mills and sympathise with the case of that particular worker in a dispute which is raised by that worker, it could not be contended with any validity that the entire body of workers became concerned in the dispute within the meaning of s. 33 of the Act.

At this stage, it would be proper to turn to the orders of reference made in the two disputes which were pending adjudication at the date of the dismissal of these workers, viz., Adjudications Nos. 56 and 62 of 1955. Both these orders of reference were similarly worded. It would, therefore, suffice if I refer to only one of these orders. Now the order of reference in Adjudication Proceeding No. 62 of 1955 was in these words:

"Whereas an Industrial Dispute has arisen between the New Jehangir Vakil Mills Co. Ltd., Bhavnagar, and its workmen represented by the Mill Kamdar Union, Bhavnagar, so far as the Government is aware in respect of the matters specified in schedule I hereto annexed.

Schedule I

(1) Whether Ganpat Gopala, Klerman in temporary 3rd shift of bleaching department is covered by Award in Adjudication No. 20 of 1950.

(2) To decide the relative seniority of the three workers of the Kler section of the bleaching department working in the three shifts of this section. These workers are (1) Jayantlal Gopalji, (2) Ramnarayan Nathuram, (3) Ganpat Gopala.

(3) After deciding the above two issues, how actually the change-over should be made in this sub-section of the bleaching department."

This was the order of reference which was made in Adjudication No. 62 of 1955. Now the question is who were the parties to the dispute which was referred to the Tribunal for adjudication. It is contended for the Mills that the parties to the adjudication were the New Jehangir Mills Co. Ltd., Bhavnagar, and the three workers of the bleaching department viz., Jayantilal Gopalji, Ramnarayan Nathuram and Ganpat Gopala. On the other hand, it is contended for the workers, who are the opponents in this petition, that the parties to the above adjudication were the Mills on the one hand and the entire body of workmen on the other hand. We have taken into anxious consideration the arguments canvassed before us on this point by the learned advocates on both sides, and we have felt ourselves constrained to reject the contention of the workers. Upon the plain language of the preamble to the order of reference, the language being, "whereas an Industrial Dispute has arisen between the New Jehangir Vakil Mills Co. Ltd., Bhavnagar, and its workmen represented by the Mill Kamdar Union, Bhavnagar, so far as the Government is aware in respect of the matters specified in schedule I hereto annexed", we are of the view that the parties to the adjudication were the Mills on the one hand and the workers concerned in the matters which were specified in schedule I on the other hand. It is no doubt true that the words "represented by the Mill Kamdar Union, Bhavnagar" were used immediately after the word "workmen" in the preamble to the order of reference, but this would not, in our opinion, make the Mill Kamdar Union a party to the adjudication proceedings. The parties in our view were the workmen who were concerned in the dispute in respect of the matters specified in schedule I, but the representation of these workers before the Tribunal was to be made by the Mill Kamdar Union, Bhavnagar. In this connection, we have only to turn to s. 36 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. Section 36 provides:

"A workman who is a party to a dispute shall be entitled to be represented in any proceeding under this Act by—

- (a) an officer of a registered trade union of which he is a member;
- (b) an officer of a federation of trade union to which the trade union referred to in clause (a) is affiliated;..."

Now in the language of s. 36 of the Act, the distinction between a workman who is a party on the one hand and the person representing the said party on the other hand is perfectly clear. But for this distinction which the Legislature had in view, the Legislature would not have used the words "workman who is party to a dispute shall be entitled to be represented etc., etc." It is clear, therefore, that the Mill Kamdar Union, Bhavnagar, who represented the workmen before the Tribunal in the adjudication proceedings, was not itself a party to the proceedings. The parties were the workmen, and they were represented by the Kamdar Union. Upon the language of the preamble to the order of reference, it is clear that the workmen were the persons concerned in the dispute in respect of the matters which were specified in schedule I.

If the entire body of the workers were to be deemed to be a party to Adjudication No. 62 of 1955, they would be bound by the result of the adjudication. There is no doubt that in the Adjudication No. 62 of 1955, the parties bound by the result of the adjudication would be the Mills and the employees or the workmen of the bleaching department of the Mills. There could possibly not be any controversy upon this point. Section 18 of the Act is clear. Sub-section (3), cl. (d) of s. 18 provides:

"(3) A settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings under this Act or an award of a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal which has become enforceable shall be binding on—...

- (d) Where a party referred to in clause (a) or clause (b) is composed of workmen, all persons who were employed in the establishment or part of the establishment, as the case may be, to which the dispute relates on the date of the dispute and all persons who subsequently become employed in that establishment or part."

Now there is no dispute that on the date of the dispute, the three workmen concerned viz., Jayantilal, Ramnarayan and Ganpat, were members of the bleaching section or department of the Mills. The dispute which was referred to the Tribunal for adjudication was a dispute regarding the relative seniority of those three workers of the bleaching department. Therefore, the decision of the Tribunal in that dispute would bind, not the entire body of the workers of the Mills, but only the members of the bleaching section of the Mills who were working in that section on the date on which the dispute arose and also the persons who might subsequently become employed in the bleaching department of the company. No other conclusion is possible upon a plain and natural reading of the provisions of cl. (d) of s. 18 of the Act. The point we wish to emphasise is that it would not be the entire body of the workmen employed by the New Jehangir Vakil Mills, Ltd., Bhavnagar, who would be bound by the result of Adjudication No. 62 of 1955. It would only be a class of workers viz., the persons working in the bleaching department of the company who would be bound by the result of the adjudication. Therefore, it is impossible for us to accept the learned advocate Mr. Thakkar's contention that parties to the Adjudication No. 62 of 1955 were the Mills on the one hand and the entire body of workers of the Mills on the other hand.

Then again, if Shri Thakkar's contention were right, the language of the preamble to the order of reference would have been : "Whereas an Industrial Dispute has arisen between the New Jehangir Vakil Mills Co. Ltd., Bhavnagar, and the Mill Kamdar Union, Bhavnagar". But that was not the language of the preamble and deliberately so. The language used was "Whereas an Industrial Dispute has arisen between the New Jehangir Vakil Mills Co. Ltd., Bhavnagar, and its workmen represented by the Mill Kamdar Union, Bhavnagar", and in our view, this language must mean that the parties to the adjudication were the Mills on the one hand and the workmen of the Mills who were concerned in the dispute in respect of matters referred to in schedule I.

The well-known rule of construction is that a word here or a word there must not be picked up and separated from its context. The word "workmen" which has found place in the preamble to the order of reference must not be separated from the rest of the words used in the preamble. The entire preamble must be read together, and upon a proper reading of the preamble, there is no doubt that the words "its workmen" must be read in the context of words "in respect of the matters specified in schedule I hereto annexed". If we turn to the schedule, we find a reference made to the three workers of the bleaching department. We also find a reference made to the subject-matter of the dispute, viz., the question about the relative seniority and the consequent question of change-over. There is, therefore, no doubt that the persons really concerned or directly concerned in that dispute were the persons who were interested in the question of relative seniority in the bleaching department, viz., the three persons Jayantilal, Ramnarayan and Ganpat. It would be upon the determination of the relative seniority of these persons that the question of change-over would depend. Therefore, it might be said that a certain class of workers of the Mills, viz. those who were working in the bleaching department of the Mills, were the persons directly concerned in the dispute which was the subject-matter of the Adjudication Proceeding No. 62 of 1955, and not the entire body of workers. At this stage, it may be noted, and this is important, that the opponents to the present petition, viz., Hira, Prema and Popat, were not the workers in the bleaching department of the Mills. They were workers in the ring frame department of the Mills. They were doing the work of doffers. That being so, it is difficult to accept Mr. Thakkar's contention that these three workers who were working as doffers in the ring frame department were really concerned or directly, personally or primarily concerned in the dispute which was referred to the Tribunal for adjudication in Adjudication Proceeding No. 62 of 1955.

As I have mentioned above, one of the tests for deciding whether a particular section of the workers was "concerned" in a particular dispute which was referred to the Tribunal for adjudication would be whether those workers would be bound by the award of the Tribunal. Clearly enough if the award of the Tribunal would not be binding upon a class of persons, the said persons could by no stretch of imagination be held to have been the people concerned in the dispute. If they were concerned in the dispute, the result of the dispute viz., the adjudication, must bind them. I have already referred to cl. (d) of sub-s. (3) of s. 18 of the Act. Upon a proper construction of cl. (d) of sub-s. (3) of s. 18 of the Act and upon its application to the facts of the present case, there would be no doubt that only the workers of the bleaching department of the Mills would be bound by the result of the Adjudication Proceeding No. 62 of 1955. By no stretch of imagination could it be said, and indeed that was not the submission of Mr. Thakkar also, that the entire body of the workers of the Mills would be bound by the result of Adjudication No. 62 of 1955. Therefore also we feel ourselves fortified in our view that in the present case, the workmen concerned in the dispute which was pending before the Tribunal in Adjudication Proceeding No. 62 of 1955 were Jayantilal, Ramnarayan and Ganpat, and through them perhaps all the workers of the bleaching department. Certainly, the employees who had nothing to do with the bleaching department of the Mills could not be said to have been concerned in the dispute.

There is another test also which could be usefully applied for determining whether the entire body of the workmen of the Mills could be said to have been the persons concerned in the dispute to which I have referred. For this purpose, we must turn to s. 22 of the Industrial Disputes (Appellate Tribunal) Act, 1950. Section 22 provides:

"During the period of thirty days allowed for filing of an appeal under section 10 or during the pendency of any appeal under this Act, no employer shall—

(a) alter, to the prejudice of the workmen concerned in such appeal, the conditions of service applicable to them immediately before the filing of such appeal, or

(b) discharge or punish, whether by dismissal or otherwise, any workmen concerned in such appeal, save with the express permission in writing of the Appellate Tribunal."

It is to be noted that the expression "workmen concerned in such appeal" which occurs in the body of s. 22 of the Industrial Disputes (Appellate Tribunal) Act, 1950, is similar to the expression "workmen concerned in such dispute" which occurs in s. 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. Now if we turn to s. 12 of the Industrial Disputes (Appellate Tribunal) Act, 1950, it would appear that s. 12 provides:

"An appeal under this Act against any award or decision of an Industrial Tribunal may be presented to the Appellate Tribunal by any party which is aggrieved by the award or decision."

It is clear that a party who is aggrieved by the award could only be a party who is bound by the award. A party who is not bound by the award could certainly not at any time feel itself aggrieved by the award, and I have already pointed out, while dealing with s. 18 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, that the persons bound by the award would be the persons employed in the establishment or a part of the establishment, as the case may be, to which the dispute relates on the date of the dispute, and all the persons who subsequently might become employed in that establishment or part. In the context of the present case, therefore, it would be clear that only those persons who were employed in the bleaching section of the Mills on the date upon which the dispute arose, and all those who might subsequently become employed in that section, would be bound by the award of the Tribunal. Therefore, only those persons would be entitled to appeal against the award under s. 12 of the Industrial Disputes (Appellate Tribunal) Act, 1950. This would mean that only those persons, and not the entire body of the workmen, would be concerned in the appeal within the meaning of the expression "workmen concerned in such appeal" in s. 22 of the Industrial Disputes (Appellate Tribunal) Act, 1950. It would be impossible for us to put a wider construction upon the word "concerned" when the dispute is at the initial stage or the original stage and a narrower construction upon the same word when the dispute reaches an appellate stage. The word "concerned" whether used in the context of the initial stage or the appellate stage must bear the same connotation, and as I have just stated, the persons concerned in the appeal would be, not the entire body of the workmen, but only those who were directly affected by the dispute. In this case, I have stated above that only the workers of the bleaching section would be directly concerned by the result of the adjudication. Therefore, only they would be concerned in the filing of the appeal. Therefore, at the original stage also of the dispute, we must hold that only the workers of the bleaching section would be the persons concerned in the dispute. Thus then, in the provisions of ss. 12 and 22 of the Industrial Disputes (Appellate Tribunal) Act, 1950, we have a test to decide whether the word "concerned" which finds place in s. 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act means directly, personally and primarily concerned, or whether it means remotely interested. We are unable to accept the contention of Mr. Thakkar that anybody who might sympathise with a dismissed employee or who might take interest in the cause of a dismissed employee would also be said to be a person concerned in the dispute.

For the reasons stated above, we are of the view that the opponents to this petition, viz., Hira Ramji, Prema Nanu and Popat Bhikhu were not the workmen concerned in the disputes which were the subject-matter of Adjudications Nos. 55 and 62 of 1955 which were pending at the date upon which they were dismissed, viz., on April 17, 1956. That being so, the provisions of s. 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act would not be attracted in this case and the Industrial Tribunal at Rajkot would have no jurisdiction to entertain the complaint which was filed by these workers under s. 33A of the said Act. The application is accordingly allowed. We make no order as to costs. A writ of prohibition shall issue and the Tribunal shall be directed not to proceed further with the complaint which was filed before it under s. 33A of the Industrial Disputes Act by the opponents.

Application allowed.

No. 2 was Bainabai's sister and defendants No. 3 and 4 were the sons of defendant No. 2. Defendant No. 5 was the brother of Bainabai. Defendants Nos. 6 to 10 were the friends of defendants Nos. 3 to 5. The present suit was filed by the plaintiff for damages for defamation against the defendants. The defamation alleged against the several defendants was that defendant No. 10 made an anonymous application to the District Superintendent of Police which contained the defamatory words that "the plaintiff was pregnant." This application was enquired into and statements were recorded by the police at Dapori on April 29, 1950. The application was read to the plaintiff in the presence of other persons. The plaintiff, however, stated that the application was in the handwriting of defendant No. 10, though it was not signed by him. Defendant No. 9 made an anonymous application on May 3, 1950, to the District Superintendent of Police, Amravati, and other police authorities. This application also, according to the plaintiff, contained defamatory words against her. It was stated in the application that the plaintiff was pregnant and that the plaintiff caused forcible miscarriage of a child and concealed the birth of that child. The plaintiff stated that defendant No. 3 sent two applications respectively on June 26, 1950, and July 19, 1950, to the District Superintendent of Police, Amravati, containing false and defamatory statements that one Bapurao was the cause of the plaintiff's pregnancy and the plaintiff absconded with Bapurao to cause forcible miscarriage. The plaintiff further stated that during the investigation which started upon the said application, defendants Nos. 1, 3, 4, 6 and 8 also made similar statements before the police authorities. So far as defendant No. 5 was concerned, the plaintiff's case was that he published a notice in the local newspaper 'UDAYA' dated July 25, 1950, on the instructions and on behalf of defendant No. 1. The notice which was published in the newspaper mentioned that the plaintiff's character was not good, that the plaintiff was morally defamed, that she became pregnant by illegitimate connection, that in order to cause forcible miscarriage she absconded from the village, and that she had thus brought disgrace to her family. A copy of this notice was got served by defendant No. 5 upon Bapurao who received it on August 3, 1950. Bapurao thereafter showed this notice to the plaintiff. The plaintiff has contended that all these statements in the notice as also those made before the police officers were malicious and caused her immeasurable harm. It was further stated by the plaintiff that defendant No. 7 made two applications on September 22, 1950, under the false signature of one Vinayak Balkrishna Pande to the District Superintendent of Police, Amravati. These two applications also contained defamatory words to the effect that the plaintiff caused forcible miscarriage at Dhamangaon, tahsil Chandur. On September 22, 1950, Champat, (defendant No. 8), made an application to the Station Officer, Nagpur Gate Police Station, Amravati, falsely signed as Vinayak Balkrishna Pande. This application also contained defamatory words and it stated that the plaintiff caused forcible miscarriage at Dhamangaon. The plaintiff states that the several applications and the statements made by the aforesaid defendants were defamatory statements made against her chastity and moral character and they were, therefore, liable in damages.

The defendants resisted the suit. Defendant No. 1, who is the mother-in-law of the plaintiff, in her written statement denied having made any defamatory statements before the police as alleged by the plaintiff. She also stated that she did not give any notice to the plaintiff in 'UDAYA'. Defendant No. 5 remained ex parte. He did not file any written statement nor did he enter the witness-box and give any evidence on his behalf. Defendant No. 6, however, took up two defences: One of justification (truth of the statements made by him) and the other of absolute privilege. He stated in his written statement that it was a reality that the plaintiff was pregnant in 1950 and that one Bapurao, plaintiff's husband's cousin, was the cause of this pregnancy, and that the plaintiff did abscond with Bapurao and caused forcible miscarriage. He further stated that he made these statements during the police investigation and those statements were true. He did not make any false statements and he stated that he was justified in making those statements. Defendant No. 7, however, denied having made any application or statements before the police officers. Defendant No. 8 took up the same defences as were taken up by defendant No. 6. In his written statement, he stated that it was a reality that the plaintiff was pregnant in 1950 and that one Bapurao, brother-in-law (plaintiff's husband's cousin), was responsible for it. The plaintiff had absconded with Bapurao who caused miscarriage. This defendant, during the police investigation, spoke these things which were true. He did not make any false statement. It was denied that it caused any defamation of the plaintiff. Defendants Nos. 9 and 10 denied having made any anonymous application to the police officers or having made any statements before them in the course of the investigation.

The trial Court held that defendants Nos. 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 9 and 10 were liable for the plaintiff's claim and dismissed the suit as against defendants Nos. 1, 5 and 7. The trial Court held that the words employed by the defendants amounted to a very gross kind of defamation and that the allegations made by the defendants were untrue, and that they had been actuated by malice in making those false statements. It also held that the privilege such as was attached to the statements made by these defendants was qualified and was shown to have been destroyed by the fact that these defendants had made those statements falsely and maliciously. The trial Court awarded Rs. 2,000 as damages to the plaintiff.

First Appeal No. 139 of 1952 was filed by defendants Nos. 6, 8, 9 and 10. First Appeal No. 22 of 1953 was filed by defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4 and the plaintiff filed First Appeal No. 23 of 1953 against defendants Nos. 1, 5 and 7.

DATAR J. [His Lordship after stating the facts as above and dealing with points not material to this report, proceeded.] Then Mr. Padhye argues that defendants Nos. 6 and 8 were entitled to a privilege, which according to Mr. Padhye, is an absolute privilege, and says Mr. Padhye, no matter how outrageous the lie which was propagated by these witnesses and no matter how malicious the motive of these persons who made the statements that they made and to which they adhered, they would still be protected and their statements would not be at all actionable. Before I consider this point as to whether defendants Nos. 6 and 8 are entitled to an absolute privilege or to a qualified privilege which is liable to be destroyed by proof of malice, I must set out as a statement of fact that the statements complained of by the plaintiff were made before the police officers in the course of the investigation stated to have started upon certain applications. It is not quite clear whether the police officers in the course of a regular investigation under the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure, having registered an offence, called upon these persons, particularly defendants Nos. 6 and 8, to make the statements. It is true that one of these defendants says that in answer to the police officer's query the statements were made; but that cannot clearly show that these statements were made in the course of the investigation of the nature which the police officer has got to start and carry on under the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure. But for the sake of Mr. Padhye's argument I may assume that these statements were made in the course of the investigation. Then the question arises: were the statements absolutely privileged or was only a qualified privilege attached to those statements? In support of his contention, reliance is mainly placed upon two decisions; one reported in *Madhab Chandra v. Nirod Chandra*¹ and the other in Sanjivi Reddy v. Koneri Reddi.² In Sanjivi Reddy v. Koneri Reddi it has been held that the statements made in a complaint to a Magistrate under s. 107, Criminal Procedure Code, praying that security should be taken from a person for keeping the peace and a repetition of the same statements before a police officer to whom the Magistrate referred the complaint for enquiry and report are absolutely privileged and no action for defamation in respect of such statement is maintainable. In the Calcutta case, the learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court held (p. 478):

"No action for libel, or slander lies, whether against Judges, counsel, witnesses or parties, for words written or spoken in the course of any proceeding before any Court recognised by law and this though the words were written or spoken maliciously without any justification or excuse, and from personal ill-will and anger against the person defamed. Further, the statements made with a view to repeating them on oath in a subsequent judicial proceeding are similarly protected. Hence statements made by a party in reports to police and statements made by him in subsequent judicial proceedings as a witness are absolutely privileged even though they are defamatory and false." These two decisions have, however, not been approved in a decision of our own Court which is reported in Gangappagouda Gadigeppagouda v. Basayya Shivarudrayya,³ where it was held that a Mahalkari holding a preliminary enquiry in the conduct of a police patil on the directions of the Collector in order to report to the Collector is not acting in a judicial capacity, nor exercising the attributes of a Court and that the evidence given before the Mahalkari in such an enquiry is not absolutely privileged. It is true in this case the statements were made before the Mahalkari and not before a police officer as in the instant case. But the principle underlying the decision was that if a statement is not made before a Court or a tribunal having the attributes of a Court, then it could not be said that the statement was absolutely privileged. This has been made clear by the learned Chief Justice in the course of his judgment when he has stated (p. 218):

"...I am clearly of opinion that it is impossible to hold that the Mahalkari was acting in a judicial capacity, or was exercising the attributes of a Court."

The learned Chief Justice also referred to the well-known case of Watson v. M'Ewan: Watson v. Jones,⁴ and to the Madras and Calcutta cases to which I have already referred. The learned Chief Justice in the final paragraph of his judgment observed that he was disposed to think that the Madras and the Calcutta cases referred to above went too far, and could not be reconciled with the decision of the Privy Council in O'Connor v. Waldron.⁵ If the test that has been laid down in this case that a statement, if made before an officer who was not acting in a judicial capacity or who was not exercising the attributes of a Court, could not be said to have been absolutely privileged, is correct, then the statements made in this case before the police officers cannot be regarded as absolutely privileged. The police officer can never be stated to have been acting in a judicial capacity or exercising the attributes of a Court when he purported to record the statements in the present case and, therefore, I have no doubt that the statements such as were made before the police officers were not absolutely privileged but that only a qualified privilege attached to them. I am bound by the decision reported in Gangappagouda Gadigeppagouda v. Basayya Shivarudrayya in so far as it goes and I must, therefore, hold that these statements were not absolutely privileged. Incidentally I may also refer to a subsequent decision of the Calcutta High Court itself which is reported in Joseph Mayr v. Charles Warwick,⁶ where the learned Judge, Mr. Justice Blagden, has reviewed all the cases and has held that a written communication to the Commissioner of Police, containing defamatory statements, is not absolutely privileged. The learned Judge has, in the course of his judgment, observed that a statement to an officer of the police with a view to his setting the criminal law in motion is certainly not, as such, privileged absolutely in England. After considering the position of law in England, he has further held that it is certainly not the policy of the law in India either to prevent a judicial enquiry into the motive of a person who says something to a policeman defamatory of somebody else. The learned Judge has considered the case reported in Madhab Chandra v. Nirod Chandra and has observed (p. 616):

"I think, with great respect, that their Lordships understood Watson v. MacEwan to decide more than it really did decide. That was not, as is stated at p. 580, a case of a witness claiming protection for a statement which he repeated in a 'subsequent' judicial proceeding, for the proceeding was pending at the publication and not merely contemplated; and it was a case of a witness, pure and simple, and not of a party who in fact gave evidence."

The learned Judge has also referred to the case in Sanjivi Reddy v. Koneri Reddi and also to a subsequent case reported in Bapalal v. Krishnaswami Iyer,¹ but he was not inclined to accept the reasoning in either of these two cases. But so far as this case is concerned, as I have already stated, the decision in Gangappa-gowda Gadigepagowda v. Basayya Shivarudrayya is clear upon the point and I must, therefore, hold that the statements were not absolutely privileged.

Then the question arises whether the plaintiff has been able to prove malice. As I already stated that the evidence on record shows that the statements made by the defendants were made with full knowledge that those statements were untrue. This itself, in my opinion, is a conclusive proof of malice. It was stated before me in the course of arguments submitted by Mr. Padhye that they might have believed that when the whole village was saying that the plaintiff was carrying, the plaintiff was really pregnant. To say the least, this would be a totally unreasonable belief in the rumour or the gossip of the village and I cannot say that there was any justification for the defendants to have such belief. It is rather surprising that defendants having known that these statements were untrue to their knowledge, they were adhered to and were even repeated during the course of the trial. The defendants persisted again in making these statements in the written statement and repeated the other statements which they had admitted that they had made before the police officers. This conduct itself is some indication of the malice which actuated them in making the statements. When no serious attempt was made to prove these reckless statements, I should think that these statements were made by these defendants having been actuated by the malice which is necessary to be proved before the plaintiff can say that the defendants are not entitled to the qualified privilege. If, therefore, the learned trial Judge has held that the statements being defamatory and untrue, malice can be easily inferred, I have no doubt that this is a case where the statements were made by the defendants being actuated by malice.

RAMBHAU SAKHARAM NAGRE v. D. G. TATKE.*

Minimum Wages Act (XI of 1948), Secs. 26(2), 26(2a), 5, 6—Notification issued by Government under s. 26(2) withdrawing exemption from application of Act whether a quasi-judicial or an administrative act—Whether before issuing such notification necessary for Government to conform to principles of natural justice—Notification when can be challenged as an arbitrary act.

A notification issued by the State Government under s. 26(2) of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948, withdrawing an exemption from the application of the Act previously granted by it, is an administrative act, and therefore before issuing the notification it was not necessary for the Government to conform to the principles of natural justice.

Province of Bombay v. K. S. Advani,¹ referred to.

Such a notification can be challenged as an arbitrary administrative act, if only one party is heard before issuing the notification and no opportunity to be heard is given to the other side.

VYAS J. These are applications under art. 227 of the Constitution wherein the petitioners have prayed for the issue of an appropriate writ to set aside the order dated November 6, 1957, of the Authority appointed under the Minimum Wages Act. By the said order the Authority held that the workers in certain bidi manufacturing concerns were not entitled to be paid at the revised rate of Rs. 2-2-0 per thousand bidis from September 1, 1956, to December 15, 1956. These applications raise common questions, and the questions are:

(1) Is the issue of a notification by the State Government under s. 26, sub-s. (2), of the Minimum Wages Act a quasi-judicial act or an administrative act?

(2) Even if it be an administrative act, could it be challenged as an arbitrary act, if only one party is heard before issuing the notification and no opportunity to be heard is given to the other side?

These questions arise upon the following facts. The petitioner in application No. 68 of 1958 is the President of the Sangamner Akola Bidi Kamgar Union. Petitioner No. 1 in application No. 614 of 1958 is a legal practitioner at Sangamner and petitioner No. 2 is an official of the Sangamner Akola Bidi Mazdoor Sabha. The applicants in application No. 614 of 1958 have been authorised in writing to act on behalf of the bidi workers. These petitioners (the applicants in applications Nos. 68 and 614 of 1958) filed applications before the Authority appointed under the Minimum Wages Act, contending that they were paid less wages than what they were entitled to under the Notification dated April 19, 1955, issued by the State Government under s. 26, sub-s. (2) of the Act. The petitioners' case is that the Government of the State of Bombay, by a notification issued by them on April 19, 1955, fixed wages for workers in bidi manufacturing concerns in certain areas at the rate of Rs. 2-2-0 per thousand bidis. By the various notifications, including the notifications dated June 30, 1955, and June 28, 1956, the bidi manufacturers in certain areas were exempted from the application of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948. This exemption was extended from time to time till December 31, 1956. The exemption, however, was withdrawn or cancelled by the Government by a notification dated August 22, 1956. The cancellation of the exemption was to be effective from September 1, 1956. The petitioners' contention is that consequent upon the withdrawal of the exemption, they became entitled to the wages at the rate of Rs. 2-2-0 per thousand bidis from September 1, 1956, to December 31, 1956. In these applications we are concerned only with the period from September 1, 1956, to December 31, 1956. The petitioners contend that notwithstanding this position, the owners of the bidi manufacturing concerns, who are respondents in these applications, paid wages to them at the rate of Rs. 2 only per thousand bidis so far as the bidi industry at Sangamner was concerned and at the rate of Re. 1-15-0 only per thousand bidis so far as the bidi industry in the villages within seven miles of Sangamner and Akola was concerned. When this happened, the workers claimed difference between the wages which were due to them under the notification dated April 19, 1955, and the wages that were actually paid to them by the employers and they made applications under s. 20 of the Act before the Authority. The owners of the bidi manufacturing concerns submitted a written statement, wherein they raised contentions regarding the constitutionality of s. 3, sub-s. (3), cl. (a), sub-cl. (iv), of the Act and also the constitutionality of the notifications dated April 19, 1955, and August 22, 1956. The Authority negatived these contentions of the employers, but he substantially upheld one contention of theirs, viz., that the notification issued by the Government of the State of Bombay on August 22, 1956, withdrawing the exemption was issued "arbitrarily, dishonestly and in a manner which was contrary to the principles of natural justice." Consistently with this view which the Authority took on the question of the validity of the notification, dated August 22, 1956, he held that the workers would not be entitled to wages in accordance with the notification dated April 19, 1955, during the period from September 1, 1956, to December 31, 1956, since the exemption from the application of the Act would extend to December 31, 1956. It is against this finding of the Authority that the present applications have been filed by the petitioners.

Now, the questions regarding the constitutionality of s. 3, sub-s. (3), cl. (a), sub-cl. (iv), of the Act and also about the constitutionality of the notification issued by the State of Bombay on April 19, 1955, have been decided by us in Special Civil Application No. 67 of 1958. So far as the present petitions are concerned, the question for consideration is about the validity of the notification issued by the Government of Bombay on August 22, 1956, withdrawing the exemption which had been previously granted by the State Government by notifications dated June 30, 1955, and June 28, 1956. It is the contention of the petitioners that the withdrawal of exemption from the application of the Act by a notification of the State Government under sub-s. (2) of s. 26 was an administrative act of the Government, that it was not a judicial or a quasi-judicial act, and that, therefore, the rules of natural justice would not be attracted in this case and it was not necessary for the State Government to hear the parties, consider their representations, record their evidence etc. before issuing the notification. On the other hand, the contention of the owners of the bidi manufacturing concerns is that the granting of exemption from the application of the Act and the withdrawal of the said exemption were quasi-judicial acts and, therefore, it was obligatory on the State Government to follow the rules of natural justice before issuing notifications in that connection under sub-s. (2) of s. 26. Thus, a question arises whether the granting of an exemption from the application of the Act by a notification issued by the appropriate Government under s. 26, sub-s. (2), of the Act and the subsequent withdrawal of the said exemption by a notification are quasi-judicial acts or administrative acts. It may be noted, and this is important, that in these applications we are not called upon to decide whether the initial fixing of minimum rates of wages and revision of those rates are quasi-judicial acts or administrative acts. The question is this: the minimum rates of wages having already been fixed under the Act, whether the grant of exemption from the application of the Act and the withdrawal of that exemption are quasi-judicial acts or administrative acts.

It would be convenient at this stage to set out the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 26 of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948. This is what the sub-section provides:

"The appropriate Government may, if for special reasons it thinks so fit, by notification in the official Gazette, direct that for such period as it may specify the provisions of this Act or any of them shall not apply to all or any class of employees employed in any scheduled employment or to any locality where there is carried on a scheduled employment."

The intention of the Legislature must be gathered from the language used by the Legislature, and the words used by the Legislature in sub-s. (2), viz. "may, if for special reasons it thinks so fit...direct" would clearly show that the Government was not required to adopt any particular procedure before notifying that the Act shall not apply to all or any class of employees employed in any scheduled employment or to any locality where there was carried on a scheduled employment. The Legislature has left it to the discretion of the appropriate Government to grant the exemption if for special reasons it thinks fit to do so. What reasons should be considered special reasons for the exemption is left entirely to the appropriate Government to decide. It is for the Government to see whether the reasons which it considers special reasons are sufficient to justify the grant of the exemption. It would be appropriate in this context to turn to ss. 5 and 6 of the Act. Section 5 prescribes a certain procedure which Government is required to follow in fixing minimum rates of wages. Section 6 lays down a procedure for the revision of minimum rates of wages. We are not suggesting that the Legislature intended to import a judicial element in that procedure or that it intended that the Government should adopt a judicial approach in following that procedure. As I have stated, we are not called upon in this case to decide that question. All that we wish to point out is that in the matter of initial fixation of minimum rates of wages and revision of those rates, the Legislature clearly intended that the Government must follow a certain procedure and expressed that intention by using appropriate words in ss. 5 and 6. If the intention of the Legislature in enacting sub-s. (2) of s. 26 had been to lay down that the Government, before granting exemption from the application of the Act, was required to follow a certain procedure, it would have used language to that effect. In that case it would not have used the words "may, if for special reasons it thinks so fit...direct." Upon a proper construction of the language of sub-s. (2) of s. 26 which, in our view, is free from any ambiguity, it must follow that in granting exemption under this section the Government is not required to follow any particular procedure. It is not required to appoint an advisory committee, or publish its proposal, or invite objections in any other manner, or hear the parties, consider their representations, record evidence or weigh evidence etc. The Government is the sole and absolute judge to decide in such manner as it considers fit whether there are special reasons which, in its judgment, would justify exemption. To the power which is conferred upon the appropriate Government by sub-s. (2) of s. 26 there is not attached any statutory obligation to follow any procedure or adopt any particular mode of approach. When the Legislature leaves it to the executive authority to form an opinion whether it is or is not necessary to apply the provisions of the Act, as a condition precedent to the issue of a notification, it is a subjective satisfaction of the executive authority that a necessity does or does not exist for enforcing the Act. The formation of opinion on the matter whether it is necessary or not necessary to apply the Act, after the minimum rates of wages have already been fixed, to a particular locality or to a particular class of employees in a scheduled employment, is a purely subjective process and a notification which is founded on such subjective process is a purely administrative act. As

"It is well established that if the Legislature simply confides the power of doing an act to a particular body if in the opinion of that body it is necessary or expedient to do it, then the act is purely an administrative, i.e. an executive act as opposed to a judicial or quasi-judicial act, and, in the absence of proof of bad faith, the Court has no jurisdiction to interfere with it and certainly not by the high prerogative writ of certiorari."

Here, in sub-s. (2) of s. 26 of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948, the expression used is "may, if for special reasons it thinks so fit...direct" and there is no doubt that this expression is analogous to the expressions such as "if it appears to", "if in the opinion of", "if so and so is satisfied." In Advani's case Mr. Justice Das said that when such expressions were used in the body of the statute, discretion was confided by the Legislature in a particular Authority, and if an act was done in pursuance of that discretion, it could not be said to be a quasi-judicial or a judicial act, but must be held to be an administrative act.

It is well-settled that the tests for deciding whether an act is a judicial or a quasi-judicial act or an administrative act are whether the authority taking the action has legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of subjects and whether a duty is cast upon that authority to act judicially. In Province of Bombay v. K. S. Advani, Kania C.J. said (p. 633):

"...It seems to me that the true position is that when the law under which the authority is making a decision, itself requires a judicial approach, the decision will be quasi-judicial. Prescribed forms of procedure are not necessary to make an inquiry judicial, provided in coming to the decision the well-recognised principles of approach are required to be followed."

It would be interesting at this stage to compare the language of s. 3 of the Bombay Land Requisition Ordinance which came up for consideration in Advani's case with the language of sub-s. (2) of s. 26 of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948. Section 3 of the Bombay Land Requisition Ordinance was in these words:

"If in the opinion of the Provincial Government it is necessary or expedient to do so, the Provincial Government may, by order in writing, requisition any land for any public purpose etc., etc."

I have stated above that sub-s. (2) of s. 26 provides:

"The appropriate Government may if for special reasons it thinks so fit, by notification in the official Gazette direct that for such period as it may specify the provisions of this Act or any of them shall not apply to all or any class of employees employed in any scheduled employment or to any locality where there is carried on a scheduled employment."

In Advani's case it was held that the opinion and satisfaction of the Provincial Government under s. 3 of the Ordinance were subjective and that the action founded upon that subjective satisfaction was an administrative action. On the same principle, we must hold that the action taken by Government under sub-s. (2) of s. 26 of the Minimum Wages Act would also be an action founded upon a subjective opinion which the Government may form in the exercise of the discretion conferred upon it by the section and would, therefore, be an administrative action. While dealing with the point whether the action taken by Government under s. 3 of the Bombay Land Requisition Ordinance was quasi-judicial action or an executive action, Mr. Justice Fazl Ali in Advani's case said that the test was whether there was any duty to decide judicially, and he observed that in the Ordinance there was nothing to show that the Provincial Government had to decide the existence of a public purpose judicially or quasi-judicially. Likewise, in the Minimum Wages Act, there is nothing to show that the appropriate Government has to adopt a judicial approach in order to come to an opinion that it is not necessary to apply the provisions of the Act to all or any class of employees employed in any scheduled employment or to any locality where there is carried on a scheduled employment. In the same case (Advani's case), Mr. Justice Mahajan said that the question whether an act was a judicial or quasi-judicial one or a purely executive act depended on the terms of the particular rule, the nature, the scope and effect of the particular power, in exercise of which the act might be done. Here, the nature and scope of the power conferred upon the appropriate Government under s. 26, sub-s. (2) of the Act leave no doubt that the power is an absolute power and the discretion conferred upon the appropriate Government is unfettered discretion. That being so, the notification issued under sub-s. (2) of s. 26 in pursuance of the power and discretion conferred upon the appropriate Government under that section would be an administrative act.

Mr. Kotwal for the owners of the bidi manufacturing concerns contends that the notification withdrawing the exemption from the application of the Act was a quasi-judicial act and, therefore, it was necessary for the State Government to conform to the principles of natural justice. Mr. Kotwal contends that the rules of natural justice were violated by the State Government in that the Government gave a hearing to Mr. Nagre only who was a representative of the employees and they did not give an opportunity to the employers to be heard in the matter. Mr. Kotwal says that the decision taken by Government to withdraw the exemption from the operation of the Act affected the rights of the parties. It made the Act applicable and thereby affected the employers adversely, making them liable to pay increased wages to the workers. That being so, says Mr. Kotwal, the notification was a quasi-judicial act of the Government and it was obligatory upon the Government to observe the rules of natural justice before issuing the notification. In support of his contention, Mr. Kotwal has invited our attention to sub-s. (2a) of s. 26 which was added by Act XXVI of 1954. Sub-section (2a) provides:

"The appropriate Government may, if it is of opinion that, having regard to the terms and conditions of service applicable to any class of employees in a scheduled employment generally or in a scheduled employment in a local area, it is not necessary to fix minimum wages in respect of such employees of that class as are in receipt of wages exceeding such limit as may be prescribed in this behalf, direct, by notification in the Official Gazette and subject to such conditions, if any, as it may think fit to impose, that the provisions of this Act or any of them shall not apply in relation to such employees."

Mr. Kotwal contends that the Legislature imported a judicial element in the procedure prescribed by sub-s. (2a), in that it made it obligatory upon the Government to pay adequate regard to the terms and conditions of service regulating relationship between the employers and the employees before coming to a conclusion whether it was necessary or not necessary to fix minimum wages in a particular area. Mr. Kotwal says that sub-s. (2) of s. 26 should not be severed from the rest of the Act and that we should have an "over-all picture" of the provisions contained in s. 5, s. 6, s. 10, sub-s. (2a) of s. 26 and other sections. Mr. Kotwal says that, upon an over-all picture of the entire Act being taken, it would appear that the intention of the Legislature was that even in the matter of issuing a notification under sub-s. (2) of s. 26, regard should be had to the principles of natural justice and the approach to be adopted should be a judicial approach. In support of this contention, Mr. Kotwal has invited our attention to certain observations made by Mr. Justice Das in Advani's case. The observations to which our attention is invited are these (p. 725):

"What are the principles to be deduced from the two lines of cases I have referred to? The principles, as I apprehend them, are:

(1) that if a statute empowers an authority, not being a Court in the ordinary sense, to decide disputes arising out of a claim made by one party under the statute which claim is opposed by another party and to determine the respective rights of the contending parties who are opposed to each other, there is a lis and prima facie and in the absence of anything in the statute to the contrary it is the duty of the authority to act judicially and the decision of the authority is a quasi-judicial act;..."

It is to be noted, however, that in the present case, upon the date on which the notification withdrawing the exemption was issued by the Government of the State of Bombay, there was no dispute pending before the Government which arose out of a claim made by one party against the other party. That being so, the above observations in Advani's case, to which Mr. Kotwal has referred us, would not assist his clients. We have no doubt, upon the plain language of sub-s. (2) of s. 26 and upon a consideration of the principles laid down by the Supreme Court in Advani's case, that the power conferred by sub-s. (2) of s. 26 upon the appropriate Government by the Legislature is an absolute power, that pursuant to the said power the appropriate Government is made the sole judge for the purpose of forming an opinion whether it is necessary or not necessary to apply the provisions of the Act in a particular area and that to that power there is not attached any statutory obligation to follow a particular procedure or adopt a particular approach. Accordingly, we must uphold Mr. Gokhale's contention that the notification dated August 22, 1956, issued by the State Government, withdrawing the exemption previously granted by it under its notifications dated June 30, 1955, and June 28, 1956, was not a quasi-judicial act, but was an administrative act and, therefore, it was not necessary for the State Government to conform to the principles of natural justice before issuing the notification.

Mr. Kotwal's next contention is that even if the notification withdrawing the exemption from the application of the Act was an administrative act of the State Government, even so the said act was done in an arbitrary manner and, therefore, its validity could be challenged. In support of this contention, Mr. Kotwal has drawn our attention to a decision of the House of Lords in the Board of Education v. Rice.¹ It was a case under s. 7 of the Education Act, 1902. The duty of maintaining and keeping efficient a non-provided school was imposed, by s. 7 of the Act, upon a local education authority. A local education authority refused to pay salaries to teachers in a non-provided school at the same rate at which it paid the teachers in provided schools. The managers of the non-provided school complained, and the Board of Education directed an inquiry, the result of which was a report that the local education authority had failed to maintain the school and keep it efficient. The questions required by s. 7, sub-s. (3), of the Education Act to be determined by the Board of Education were: (1) Whether the local education authority had, in fixing and paying the salaries of the teachers, fulfilled their duty under s. 7, sub-s. (1)? and (2) Whether the salaries inserted in the teachers' agreements were reasonable in amount and ought to be paid by the authority or what salaries the authority ought to pay? The Board purported to give its decision in a document which failed to deal with the matters in issue. It was held by the House of Lords that inasmuch as the Board had not determined the questions, the decision must be quashed by certiorari, and a mandamus must issue commanding the Board to determine the questions. In the course of his address to the House of Lords, Lord Loreburn L. C. said (p. 182):

"Comparatively recent statutes have extended, if they have not originated, the practice of imposing upon departments or officers of State the duty of deciding or determining questions of various kinds. In the present instance, as in many others, what comes for determination is sometimes a matter to be settled by discretion, involving no law. It will, I suppose, usually be of an administrative kind; but sometimes it will involve matter of law as well as matter of fact, or even depend upon matter of law alone. In such cases the Board of Education will have to ascertain the law and also to ascertain the facts. I need not add that in doing either they must act in good faith and fairly listen to both sides, for that is a duty lying upon every one who decides anything... They [meaning thereby the Board of Education] can obtain information in any way they think best, always giving a fair opportunity to those who are parties in the controversy for correcting or contradicting any relevant statement prejudicial to their view."

The principle laid down in this case is that it is the duty of everyone who decides anything to give a fair hearing to both sides. Where there are two parties in a controversy, as in the present case where the parties are the employers and the employees, a fair opportunity must always be given to both of them for correcting or contradicting any relevant statement prejudicial to their view. In the present case it would appear that after the exemption from the application of the Act was granted by the State Government by its notifications, Mr. Nagre, a representative of the employees, met the authorities of the Government and discussed the matter with them. The Government thereafter gave no opportunity to the employers to put their views before them. It was impossible for the employers to know what might have been stated by Mr. Nagre to the State Government. It is not improbable that the statements made by Mr. Nagre to the State Government might have been prejudicial to the interests of the employers, in which case it was but fair to give an opportunity to the employers to correct or contradict those statements. The State Government had to decide a question whether it was necessary or not necessary to withdraw the exemption already granted, and upon the principle laid down in Board of Education v. Rice it was the duty of the Government to hear the employers upon this point since a hearing had been given by them to a representative of the employees. Mr. Gokhale says that the principle laid down in the House of Lords case would not be attracted in the present case, since the Board of Education was in the nature of an arbitral Tribunal, whereas the character conferred by sub-s.(2) of s. 26 upon the appropriate Government is not that of an arbitral Tribunal. Under sub-s. (2) of s. 26, the State Government is made the sole judge of the question whether it is necessary or not necessary to apply the provisions of the Act, and that being so, says Mr. Gokhale, it was not the duty of the State Government to hear both the sides before forming a subjective opinion on the point. Even if it be assumed that the view which Mr. Gokhale takes of the decision in the House of Lords case is correct, even so it may be remembered that in the present case one party (the employees) was heard by the State Government. It might have been a different matter if the Government had not heard either side. In that case, we might perhaps have accepted the contention of Mr. Gokhale and might have made a distinction between the House of Lords case and the present case. Here, however, since the Government did give a hearing to Mr. Nagre on behalf of the employees before issuing the notification of August 22, 1956, it was its duty, in the interests of fairness and justice, to give a hearing to the other side also. But the other side was admittedly not heard. As the Authority has pointed out in the course of his judgment, there was nothing to show prima facie that any change in the material facts had taken place so as to justify the withdrawal of the exemption. In these circumstances, the Authority has given a finding that the notification issued by the Government on August 22, 1956, withdrawing the exemption, was issued arbitrarily. We see no reason why we should take a different view of the matter from the one taken by the Authority. As the notification withdrawing the exemption was issued arbitrarily by the State Government in this case, we must uphold the contention of Mr. Kotwal pressed before us on behalf of the employers, the owners of the bidi manufacturing concerns, that it was an illegal and invalid notification. Once we come to this conclusion, we must confirm the finding of the Authority that the employees would not be entitled to claim wages at the revised scales, that is to say, at the scales prescribed in the notification dated April 19, 1955, during the period from September 1, 1956, to December 31, 1956.

There is one more point which was pressed before us by the learned advocate Mr. Nargolkar for the petitioner in application No. 68 of 1958. Mr. Nargolkar says that the Authority had no jurisdiction to decide the question of the legality or validity of the notification withdrawing the exemption and, therefore, the Authority, in holding that the notification dated August 22, 1956, was arbitrarily issued, held something which he had no authority to hold.

Mr. Kotwal on the other hand contends that this point, regarding jurisdiction of the Authority, not having been taken before the Authority himself, it is not open to the employees now in an application under art. 227 of the Constitution to raise it for the first time. In support of this contention, Mr. Kotwal has invited our attention to a decision of this Court in Gandhinagar Motor Transport Society v. State of Bombay.¹ It was held by the learned Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Dixit in that case that before a question of jurisdiction of a tribunal could be raised on a petition under arts. 226 and 227, objection to jurisdiction ought to have been taken before the Tribunal whose order was being challenged. Mr. Nargolkar on the other hand has referred us to a decision in *Municipal Corpn., Bombay v. Labour App. Trib.*², where a Division Bench of this Court consisting of Mr. Justice Shah and Mr. Justice Gokhale took the view that whether the Tribunal did or did not transgress the limits of its jurisdiction could only be ascertained after the judgment was delivered by the Tribunal and not before. The learned Judges said that it might appear a little presumptuous on the part of a litigant to remind a judicial tribunal that it would be wrong for it to transgress the restrictions imposed by the Legislature upon its powers. Relying upon that case, Mr. Nargolkar says that the employees could not have anticipated, until the judgment was pronounced by the Authority, that the Authority would embark upon the decision on a point which it had no jurisdiction to decide. It is to be noted, however, that the expression of the view of this Court in Municipal Corporation, Bombay v. Labour Appellate Tribunal was limited expressly to the circumstances of that case. Mr. Justice Shah who delivered the judgment of the Bench said: "The principle of the case to which our attention has been invited has, in our judgment, no bearing whatever on this case," which would show that the principle laid down in Municipal Corporation, Bombay v. Labour Appellate Tribunal was limited to the facts of that particular case. Therefore, turning to the facts of the present case, it would appear that in the written statements filed by the owners of the bidi manufacturing concerns in the various applications made by the employees, the bidi owners contended that the notification issued by the State of Bombay withdrawing the exemption was an invalid notification because it was a notification issued arbitrarily and not in good faith. Not only was such a contention expressly taken by the employers, but evidence was also led by them to show that the cancellation of exemption was not done in good faith and that it was done in an arbitrary manner. Not only was evidence led by the employers to that effect, but when Mr. Nagre went into the witness-box, he was cross-examined with a view to show that the withdrawal of the exemption was not done in a bona fide way. That being so, it was amply brought to the notice of the employees that the Authority was being called upon to decide about the legality and validity of the notification cancelling the exemption. In these circumstances, it was necessary for the employees to contend before the Authority that what the employers were wanting him to decide, he had no jurisdiction under the Act to decide. In these particular circumstances of the present case, we must hold that the principle laid down by this Court in Gandhinagar Motor Transport v. State of Bombay, must govern the case. Since the contention about jurisdiction was not taken by the employees before the Authority, we must uphold Mr. Kotwal's contention that it is not open to them to take this point now in an application under s. 227 of the Constitution.

In the result, both these applications Nos. 68 and 614 of 1958 fail and are rejected. No order as to costs. We must put it on the record that the Court was greatly assisted by the able arguments of the learned advocates on both the sides.

Applications rejected.

Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act (Bom. LXVII of 1948), Secs. 29(3), 25(1)†
—Whether Mamlatdar can extend time originally granted by him to tenant to pay arrears of rent—Prant Officer whether has also such jurisdiction to enlarge time.

Under s. 29(3) of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, the Mamlatdar has jurisdiction to extend the time originally granted by him to the tenant under s. 25(1) of the Act to pay up the arrears of rent. The Prant Officer, as an appellate authority, has also jurisdiction to enlarge the time granted by the Mamlatdar within which the tenant was called upon to pay up the arrears of rent.

VYAS J. This application is made by the petitioner Sonajee Krishnajeet Mujumdar under art. 227 of the Constitution of India and herein the petitioner prays for setting aside the order of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal dated October 14, 1957, by which order the Tribunal confirmed the order of the Prant Officer dated May 31, 1957.

The petitioner is the landlord owning S. No. 509/1 of village Mamurabad, Taluka Jalgaon, District East Khandesh. He filed an application under s. 29 of the Tenancy Act before the Extra Aval Karkun of Jalgaon for recovering possession of this land upon the ground that the tenant had committed three defaults in the payment of rent. He alleged before the Extra Aval Karkun in his application under s. 29 that the tenant had failed to pay rent for the years 1952-53, 1953-54 and 1954-55. The Extra Aval Karkun came to the conclusion that the tenant had paid rent for the years 1952-53 and 1953-54, that even for the year 1954-55 the rent had been paid by the tenant, but it had been paid a little late, and held that so far as the year 1955-56 was concerned, the tenant had not paid the rent to the landlord. In the light of the above findings, the Extra Aval Karkun on October 30, 1956, passed a conditional order granting 15 days' time to the tenant, within which to pay up the arrears of rent. By the said order the Extra Aval Karkun directed that on the tenant's failure to pay up the arrears of rent within 15 days from the date of that order, the possession of the land would have to be handed over by the tenant to the landlord. The tenant failed to pay the arrears of rent; so says the landlord. Therefore, on November 19, 1956, the Extra Aval Karkun made an order directing the tenant to hand over possession of S. No. 509/1 to the landlord. It may be noted that before the Extra Aval Karkun made the aforesaid order on November 19, 1956, the tenant appealed to the Prant Officer from the Extra Aval Karkun's order dated October 30, 1956. In that appeal, the Prant Officer passed an order on May 30, 1957. By that order the Prant Officer found that the Extra Aval Karkun's findings regarding payment of rent by the tenant for the years 1952-53 and 1953-54, regarding the late payment of rent by the tenant for the year 1954-55 and regarding the non-payment of rent by the tenant for the year 1955-56 were correct. By the said order of his, the Prant Officer granted 15 days' more time to the tenant to pay the arrears of rent, that is to say, the rent for the year 1955-56. The 15

† The relevant sections run thus:—

29. (3) On receipt of application under sub-section (1) or (2) the Mamlatdar shall, after holding an inquiry, pass such order thereon as he deems fit.

25. (1) Where any tenancy of any land held by any tenant is terminated for non-payment of rent and the landlord files any proceeding to eject the tenant, the

Mamlatdar shall call upon the tenant to tender to the landlord the rent in arrears together with the cost of the proceeding, within fifteen days from the date of order, and if the tenant complies with such order, the Mamlatdar shall, in lieu of making an order for ejectment, pass an order directing that the tenancy had not been terminated and thereupon the tenant shall hold the land as if the tenancy had not been terminated.

days' time that was granted by the Prant Officer was granted from May 31, 1957, which was the date upon which the Prant Officer made his order. From that order of the Prant Officer the landlord went in revision before the Bombay Revenue Tribunal and the Tribunal rejected that application on October 14, 1957. It is from that order dated October 14, 1957, that the present application has been filed by the petitioner-landlord under art. 227 of the Constitution of India.

Now, the learned advocate Mr. Samant appearing for the petitioner-landlord has raised three points before us: (1) The Prant Officer had no jurisdiction to enlarge the time granted by the Extra Aval Karkun within which the tenant was called upon to pay up the arrears of rent. (2) As the tenant did not file an appeal from the Extra Aval Karkun's order dated November 19, 1956, by which order he (the tenant) was directed to hand over the possession of the land to the landlord, the Prant Officer had no jurisdiction to alter the said order of the Extra Aval Karkun, dated November 19, 1956. (3) The discretion which the Prant Officer exercised in the matter of granting more time to the tenant to pay up the arrears of rent, being a judicial discretion, grounds should have been assigned before using that discretion. The Prant Officer did not assign any grounds for granting 15 days' time to the tenant with effect from May 31, 1957, to pay up the arrears of rent to the landlord.

Now, so far as the first point is concerned, it raises a question whether the Extra Aval Karkun himself has jurisdiction to extend the time, once granted by him to the tenant, to pay up the arrears of rent. It is not disputed that if the Extra Aval Karkun himself has got jurisdiction to enlarge the time originally granted by him, then of course the Prant Officer, being an appellate authority, has also got that jurisdiction. Now, the position in law seems to be quite clear. Section 29 of the Act provides that if a landlord makes an application before the Mamlatdar in a prescribed form to obtain possession of his land, the Mamlatdar shall hold an enquiry and thereafter he shall pass such order on the landlord's application as he deems fit. It is not disputed before us that even in a case where the tenant has been found guilty of having committed three defaults in the payment of rent, it is within the jurisdiction of the Mamlatdar to give him time to pay the arrears of rent to his landlord. The power which is conferred by the Legislature upon the Mamlatdar under sub-s. (3) of s. 29 is an unfettered power and this is clear from the words "the Mamlatdar shall...pass such order thereon as he deems fit". Whether the Mamlatdar should grant time or the extension of time to the tenant for payment of the arrears of rent to the landlord is a question which the Mamlatdar himself has to answer upon the facts and circumstances of each case, and in answering that question the Legislature has left it entirely to his discretion to pass such orders as he considers appropriate. Mr. Samant contends that although the Mamlatdar has got an unfettered power to grant extension of time to the tenant even in a case where the tenant has committed three defaults in the payment of rent, he has not got a similar jurisdiction where a tenant has committed one default or two defaults. Now, this is a position which it is difficult to understand. If the intention of the Legislature in enacting the Act is, as it obviously is, that the Mamlatdar should have unfettered jurisdiction in the matter of granting relief to the tenant, upon the tenant's paying up the arrears of rent, even if he has committed three defaults, it is not understood why the Legislature should have circumscribed that power of the Mamlatdar in a case where the tenant has committed only one default or two defaults in the payment of rent to the landlord. There is no doubt that under s. 29(3) the Mamlatdar would be competent to grant such time as he considers fit to the tenant to pay the arrears of rent. If the Mamlatdar can do so, we do not understand why, in a case where he initially granted time to the tenant within which to pay the arrears of rent, he could not subsequently extend the time and grant further time to the tenant. In this connection, it is important to bear in mind that s. 25(1) does not in terms say that if the tenant fails to comply with the initial order made by the Mamlatdar regarding time within which he is called upon to pay the arrears of rent to the landlord, an order of ejectment shall be made by the Mamlatdar. The Legislature has in terms stated while enacting sub-s. (1) of s. 25 that if the tenant pays up the arrears of rent to his landlord, the Mamlatdar shall, in lieu of making an order for ejectment, pass an order directing that the tenancy had not been terminated, and thereupon the tenant shall hold the land as if the tenancy had not been terminated. But the Legislature has not stated that if the tenant does not comply with the order regarding payment of arrears within a certain time the Mamlatdar shall pass an order directing ejectment of the tenant. We have no doubt that if the intention of the Legislature had been to circumscribe the jurisdiction of the Mamlatdar and to provide that the Mamlatdar shall not extend the time once granted by him, they would have made a provision to the effect that upon the tenant failing to comply with the order of the Mamlatdar regarding the payment of arrears within a certain time the Mamlatdar shall pass an order of ejectment. But there is no such provision in s. 25(1). Therefore, we have no doubt that the Mamlatdar has jurisdiction under the Act to enlarge the time originally granted by him under s. 25(1). If the Mamlatdar has got that jurisdiction, the Prant Officer as an appellate authority has also got it. That being so, we see no substance in the first point pressed before us by the learned advocate Mr. Samant for his client, the landlord.

So far as the second point is concerned, it also has no force. Mr. Samant contends that as the tenant did not appeal from the Extra Aval Karkun's order dated November 19, 1956, by which order he was called upon to hand over possession of the land to the landlord, the Prant Officer could not alter the said order of the Mamlatdar dated November 19, 1956. Now, if we are to accept Mr. Samant's contention, it would completely nullify the effect of the Prant Officer's order granting 15 days' time to the tenant with effect from May 31, 1957, to pay the arrears of rent to the landlord. If the arrears of rent are paid by the tenant, surely he must get relief against forfeiture; and if such relief is not to be granted to him simply because he did not appeal from the Extra Aval Karkun's order dated November 19, 1956, the Prant Officer's order would be as good as though it were not passed at all. It is to be remembered in this case that the order made by the Extra Aval Karkun on November 19, 1956, had no independent existence, that is to say, existence independent from his earlier order dated October 30, 1956. The two orders were inter-related and the latter order followed the former. That being so, if the former order dated October 30, 1956, passed by the Extra Aval Karkun was modified or reversed or varied, it would not avail the landlord to say that the latter order, namely, the order dated November 19, 1956, should be given effect to.

In this case, a principle which we might, with advantage, follow by way of analogy was laid down by the Calcutta High Court in *Talebali v. Abdul Aziz*¹. It was held by their Lordships of the Calcutta High Court that an appeal from a preliminary decree was not incompetent if the final decree was made before the appeal was presented and that in such a case it was not necessary for the party aggrieved by the preliminary decree to appeal against the final decree, although the final decree, apart from its being based on the preliminary decree, was otherwise correct. The same view was taken by the Bombay High Court in *Baswant v. Kallappa*². By analogy it must follow that since the Extra Aval Karkun's order dated November 19, 1956, had no existence apart from his earlier order dated October 30, 1956, once the order dated October 30, 1956, was varied or modified, the subsequent order dated November 19, 1956, must stand rescinded in the light of the said variation or modification.

Apart from what has been stated above, it is important to bear in mind, and this is material in an application under art. 227 of the Constitution, that this point was not raised by the petitioner-landlord in his revision application before the Bombay Revenue Tribunal. This by itself would be a sufficient reason for us to reject this particular contention of his at this late stage. However, upon merits also, as I have just stated, the contention has no substance.

The last point raised by Mr. Samant is also a point without substance. Mr. Samant contends that the Prant Officer in giving 15 days' time to the tenant with effect from May 31, 1957, within which to pay up the arrears of rent to the landlord, did not exercise his discretion judicially. In our view, the discretion was exercised for good reasons. This is a case in which the petitioner-landlord went to the Extra Aval Karkun with allegations which were found untrue. He had the hardihood to say before the Extra Aval Karkun in his application that the tenant had defaulted in the payment of rent for the years 1952-53 and 1953-54. This allegation was found without substance by the Extra Aval Karkun, who came to the conclusion that the rent was paid for the years 1952-53 and 1953-54 and that even for the year 1954-55 it was not true that the tenant had not paid the rent, but that the fact was that the payment was made a little late. Upon these circumstances, which in our view were properly appreciated by the Prant Officer, he decided quite rightly to give 15 days' time with effect from May 31, 1957, to the tenant within which to pay the arrears of rent.

The result, therefore, is that all the three contentions raised before us by Mr. Samant are without substance. The application must, therefore, fail and be rejected with costs.

VITHOBA TATYA NANDARKAR.*

Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act (Bom. LXVII of 1948), Secs. 14, 24—Landlord seeking to eject tenant for acts of destruction and permanent injury to land—Whether landlord must give two separate notices to tenant under s. 14 and s. 24 respectively—Landlord whether absolved from giving notice to tenant under s. 24 if notice given under s. 14—Landlord by notice under s. 14 calling upon tenant to hand over possession of land upon expiry of three months from date of its receipt—Whether such notice valid—Validity of notice under s. 14 terminating tenancy forthwith by such notice.

Under the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, when a landlord seeks to eject the tenant upon the ground that the tenant had done acts of destruction and permanent injury to the land, he must give two separate notices to the tenant, one under s. 14 of the Act intimating to him that he had done an act which was destructive of or permanently injurious to the land, and another under s. 24 of the Act after the expiry of three months from the date of the first notice i.e. after the tenancy of the tenant had terminated, specifying the act of destruction or injury and intimating to the tenant that if he failed within a period of one year from the date of the receipt of the notice to restore the land to the condition in which it was before the act of destruction or injury was done to it, he would be ejected from the land.

By a notice under s. 14 of the Act the landlord can only communicate to his tenant his decision to terminate his tenancy after the lapse of three months from the service of the notice. If the landlord goes beyond it and calls upon the tenant to do something which the landlord is not entitled to ask the tenant to do under the provisions of s. 14, e.g. calls upon the tenant to hand over possession of the land to him upon the expiry of three months from the date of receipt of the notice then, in so far as he calls upon the tenant to do something which he cannot ask him to do under s. 14, the notice is an invalid notice. A notice under s. 14 does not terminate a tenancy forthwith i.e. with effect from the date of its receipt and, therefore, a notice under s. 14 would also be invalid if it tells the tenant distinctly that by that notice itself his tenancy is terminated.

S. G. Patwardhan, for opponent No. 1.

VYAS J. This is an application under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India by the petitioner Satyanarayan Shrishankar Marwadi, wherein the petitioner has prayed for the quashing of the order passed by the Bombay Revenue Tribunal on November 8, 1957, by which order the Tribunal confirmed the order made by the Prant Officer on July 3, 1957. It may be noted that the Prant Officer by his order dated July 3, 1957, had confirmed the order of the Mamlatdar dated January 31, 1957.

This application raises a question under ss. 14 and 24 of the Tenancy Act, and the question is this: where a landlord seeks to eject the tenant upon the ground that the tenant had done acts of destruction and permanent injury to the land, must he give two separate notices to the tenant, one under s. 14 and the next one under s. 24? In other words, can a landlord start a proceeding under s. 24 for ejectment of the tenant without having given him in the first instance a notice under s. 14, or, if a notice under s. 14 is given by him, is he absolved from giving a notice under s. 24? This question arises in the following circumstances:

The petitioner contends that he is the owner of the land comprised in S. Nos. 1047 and 1247 of Mangalvedha, District Sholapur. Opponent No. 1 Vithoba Taty Nandarkar is a tenant of this land. The petitioner says that in order to prevent soil erosion and also in order to drain off the excess of rain water he had constructed certain 'bunds' and 'tals' upon his land. It is the petitioner's case that opponent No. 1-tenant destroyed these 'bunds' and 'tals' by doing ploughing operations upon that portion of the land also. Then the petitioner says that opponent No. 1 constructed a new 'tal' in front of the outlets and thereby diverted the flow of the rain water. These acts of opponent No. 1, says the petitioner, resulted in reducing the fertility of the soil and increasing the chances of soil erosion. These acts were, therefore, destructive of the land and had caused permanent injury to it. Upon these facts, says the petitioner, he gave a notice to opponent No. 1 on June 17, 1954. In the said notice he specified the acts of destruction of the land and injury to the land, that were done by opponent No. 1. The petitioner says that by the said notice, which was given by him under s. 14 of the Tenancy Act, he terminated the tenancy of opponent No. 1. Notwithstanding the termination of his tenancy, opponent No. 1 failed to restore possession of the land to the petitioner and, therefore, the petitioner made an application before the Mamlatdar, being Tenancy Case No. 294 of 1956, to obtain possession of the land from opponent No. 1. The Mamlatdar took the view that the notice which was given by the petitioner on June 17, 1954, was a notice under s. 24 of the Tenancy Act, that a separate notice under s. 14(1)(b) of the Act was necessary, but had not been given by the petitioner to opponent No. 1, and that, therefore, the petitioner was not entitled to obtain possession of the land from opponent No. 1. Accordingly, he rejected the petitioner's application for possession. From that order of rejection passed by the Mamlatdar on January 31, 1957, the petitioner went in appeal before the Prant Officer. The Prant Officer observed:

"Section 24 speaks of one year's notice while s. 14 prescribes three months notice. The appellant combined these two notices into one and applied for possession. The Mamlatdar, therefore, rightly dismissed the application."

Thus, the Prant Officer also agreed with the view of the Mamlatdar that a separate notice under s. 14(1)(b) ought to have been given by the petitioner, but was not given by him, and accordingly he also dismissed the appeal of the petitioner. This he did by his order dated July 3, 1957. From this order of the Prant Officer the petitioner went in revision before the Revenue Tribunal and the Revenue Tribunal rejected the revisional application. It is from this order of the Revenue Tribunal that the petitioner has filed the present application under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India.

It would appear that all the Courts below took the view that the notice dated June 17, 1954, which was given by the petitioner to opponent No. 1 was not a proper notice. Now, reading s. 14 and s. 24 of the Act, we have no doubt that the Legislature, while enacting these sections, clearly contemplated that two notices were necessary to be given by a landlord to his tenant in a case where a landlord seeks to eject the tenant upon the ground that the tenant had done acts of destruction and/or permanent injury to the land. If we turn to s. 24, it opens with the words

"Where any tenancy of any land held by any tenant is terminated on the ground that the tenant has done any act which is destructive or permanently injurious to the land."

Having used these words, the Legislature went on to say in s. 24: "no proceeding for ejectment against such tenant shall lie". It is clear, therefore, that before a proceeding for ejectment under s. 24 of the Act can lie against a tenant, there should have taken place a termination of the tenancy of the tenant by a notice under s. 14 of the Act. In the Tenancy Act there is only one section which deals with the termination of tenancies and that section is s. 14; and it is clear upon the reading of the plain language of s. 24 that before a proceeding for ejectment can be taken by a landlord against his tenant, there should already have taken place a termination of the tenant's tenancy by a notice under s. 14. The important words in s. 24 are the words "such tenant". There is no doubt that the words "such tenant" mean the tenant against whom there has already been issued a notice of termination of tenancy under s. 14 of the Act by his landlord. It is, therefore, clear that the Act contemplates two notices, one under s. 14, that is to say, a notice terminating the tenancy of the tenant, and the other one under s. 24, that is, a notice about a proceeding to eject the tenant. This is also evident from the language used by the Legislature in s. 24. Section 24 says:

"Where any tenancy of any land held by any tenant is terminated on the ground that the tenant has done any act which is destructive or permanently injurious to the land, no proceeding for ejectment against such tenant shall lie unless and until the landlord has served on the tenant a notice in writing specifying the act of destruction or injury complained of and the tenant fails within a period of one year from the service of notice to restore the land to the condition in which it was before such destruction or injury."

The important words are: "where any tenancy...is terminated..., no proceeding for ejectment...shall lie..." It is clear, therefore, that the termination of tenancy must precede the commencement of a proceeding for ejectment. In the present case, the petitioner gave only one notice to opponent No. 1, and that, in our view, was a notice under s. 14. I shall presently point out that even this notice, namely, the notice under s. 14, was a defective notice. For the present, suffice it to say that in this case the landlord gave only one notice and that was a notice under s. 14; he did not give another notice, namely, a notice under s. 24, prior to the proceeding for ejectment, which he started on June 20, 1956.

The learned advocate Mr. Malpani appearing for the petitioner-landlord contends that the notice dated June 17, 1954, which was given by his client to opponent No. 1, was a notice under both the sections, namely, ss. 14 and 24 of the Act. Mr. Malpani says that the Legislature, while enacting s. 24, did not contemplate a separate notice, i.e., a notice distinct from a notice under s. 14, before the institution of a proceeding for ejectment. Upon the reading of the section, it is impossible to accept the contention of Mr. Malpani. If the Legislature had intended that a notice of termination of tenancy under s. 14 would also be a notice for ejectment, the Legislature would not have said:

"no proceeding for ejectment against such tenant shall lie unless and until the landlord has served on the tenant a notice in writing specifying the act of destruction or injury complained of and the tenant fails within a period of one year from the service of notice to restore the land to the condition in which it was before such destruction or injury."

In that case, the Legislature would have stated:

"where any tenancy of any land held by any tenant is terminated on the ground that the tenant has done any act which is destructive or permanently injurious to the land, no proceeding for ejectment against such tenant shall lie until after the expiry of one year from the service of notice of termination of the tenancy."

But such are not the provisions of s. 24. Besides, as Mr. Malpani himself has fairly pointed out, a notice upon the ground of destruction of land or permanent injury to the land, which is required to be given under s. 14, is not required to specify the act of destruction or injury complained of. Now, this itself would clearly suggest that two distinct notices are contemplated by the Legislature before a tenant could be ejected from the land upon the ground of destruction or permanent injury caused by him to the land. In the first instance, a notice under s. 14 should be given to the tenant, intimating to him that he had done an act which was destructive of or permanently injurious to the land, and after the expiry of three months from the date of that notice, i.e., after the tenancy of the tenant is terminated, another notice under s. 24 specifying the act of destruction or injury should be issued against the tenant, intimating to him that if he fails, within a period of one year from the date of receipt of that notice, to restore the land to the condition in which it was before the act of destruction or injury was done to it, he would have to be ejected from the land. It is impossible to accept the contention of Mr. Malpani that the Legislature intended to combine two notices into a single notice. In the present case, only one notice was given by the petitioner-landlord, and that was a notice under s. 14 of the Act; he did not give any notice under s. 24 of the Act before filing a proceeding for ejectment on June 20, 1956, against opponent No. 1.

The Revenue Tribunal in their order dated November 8, 1957, stated two grounds for holding that the notice given by the landlord to the tenant in this case was not a valid notice. One of the grounds, in the words of the Tribunal, was:

"If the landlord noticed that his land was not restored to its original condition within one year from the service of his first notice, he should have given another notice under section 14(b)."

This would suggest that the view taken by the Tribunal in respect of the notice dated June 17, 1954, which was given by the landlord to the tenant was that it was a notice under s. 14 of the Act. This was a correct view to take. But the Tribunal was wrong when it said that the landlord should have given another notice under s. 14(b). As I have stated above, the Legislature contemplated two separate notices, one under s. 14 and another under s. 24 of the Act. It was not necessary for the landlord to give another notice under s. 14(b) to the tenant before starting a proceeding for ejectment of the tenant.

The next ground upon which the Tribunal held that the notice was a bad notice was expressed in these words:

"The landlord cannot, however, claim possession until one year has passed. A period of one year is given under section 24, in order that the tenant may repair the land and restore it to the original condition. So, apart from any other question, the notice itself does not comply with the provisions of section 24."

This view of the Tribunal was a correct view of a notice under s. 24. It is clear from the provisions of s. 24 that if the destruction or permanent injury caused by the tenant to the land is repaired, and if the land is restored to its original condition within one year commencing from the date of receipt of a notice under that section, the possession of the land could not be claimed by the landlord upon the ground of destruction or injury to the land. Before the landlord could succeed in his proceeding for ejectment, it must be established by him that the tenant had failed to restore the land to its original state within one year from the date of service of the notice to be given to him under s. 24. The point we wish to emphasise is that a notice under s. 14 is only a notice of termination of tenancy. Upon the termination of the tenancy, however, the landlord does not become entitled to possession automatically. He must next ask for possession, and for that purpose the Legislature has provided a procedure under s. 24. Before obtaining possession the landlord must give a notice under that section (s. 24), and only if the land is not restored to its original state within one year of the receipt of that notice, would he be entitled to the possession.

The notice which was given by the landlord in this case on June 17, 1954, was a defective notice. Section 14 provides:

"Notwithstanding any agreement, usage, decree or order of a Court of law, the tenancy of any land held by a tenant shall not be terminated unless such tenant...

Provided that no tenancy of any land held by a tenant shall be terminated on any of the grounds mentioned in this sub-section, unless the landlord gives three months' notice in writing intimating the tenant his decision to terminate the tenancy and the ground for such termination."

The important words in the proviso are the words "intimating the tenant his decision to terminate the tenancy and the ground for such termination". It is clear, therefore, that what the Legislature contemplated while enacting s. 14 was that the notice to be given under this section must contain an intimation by the landlord to the tenant that the landlord had arrived at a decision to terminate the tenancy of the tenant after three months from the date of receipt of the notice. In other words, by a notice under s. 14 the landlord could only communicate to his tenant his decision to terminate his tenancy after the lapse of three months from the service of the notice. If the landlord goes beyond it and calls upon the tenant to do something which he (the landlord) is not entitled to ask the tenant to do under the provisions of s. 14, then, in so far as he calls upon the tenant to do something which he cannot ask him to do under s. 14, the notice is an invalid notice. Now, if we turn to the notice in this case, it would appear that the landlord called upon the tenant to hand over possession of the land to him upon the expiry of three months from the date of receipt of the notice. This the landlord was not entitled to ask for under the provisions of s. 14, and upon this ground we must agree with the view of the Tribunal that the notice was an invalid notice. I have already stated above that so far as the notice under s. 24 of the Act is concerned, the landlord did not give any such notice to the tenant.

There is another reason also why we must hold that the notice given by the landlord to the tenant on June 17, 1954, was an invalid notice. Under s. 14, a notice could only terminate the tenancy upon the expiry of three months from the date of service of the notice. A notice under s. 14 does not terminate a tenancy forthwith, that is to say, with effect from the date of receipt of the notice itself. This is clear enough from the language of the section itself and no more comments are necessary upon this point. If we turn to the notice given in this case, it did not intimate to the tenant-opponent No. 1 that his tenancy would be terminated after the expiry of three months from the date of service of the notice. It told him distinctly that by the notice itself his tenancy was terminated. This is, therefore, a case of "termination forthwith" by the very act of giving a notice on June 17, 1954. Upon this ground also the notice given by the petitioner to opponent No. 1 was an invalid notice.

The result, therefore, is that the landlord has failed to comply with the statutory requirement of s. 24 of the Act, namely, the requirement that even if a notice of termination of tenancy under s. 14 is given to the tenant, another notice under s. 24 must be given to him intimating to him that in case he failed to restore the land to its original condition within one year from the date of service of that notice, he would have to be ejected. The landlord has also failed to comply with the statutory requirement of a notice under s. 14 itself, in that beyond terminating the tenancy by that notice he went further and asked for possession of the land from the tenant upon the expiry of three months from the date of receipt of that notice. Besides, the landlord sought to terminate the tenancy of the tenant by the very notice itself which also he could not do. The notice dated June 17, 1954, being thus an invalid notice upon various grounds, the landlord's application for ejecting the tenant was rightly dismissed by all the Courts below, though, as I have stated above, the view which they took of the notice was an incorrect view.

This application must accordingly fail and be rejected with costs.

Application rejected.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

Before Mr. Justice Datar and Mr. Justice Tarkunde.

THE STATE v. MAHOMEDKHAN NAVRANGKHAN.*

Foreigners Act (XXVI of 1946), Secs. 2(a), 13, 3, 14—Foreigners Order, 1948, Para. 7—Accused, a natural born British subject, entering India on Pakistan passport on July 12, 1956—Visa obtained by accused valid for certain period after entry into India—Accused failing to leave India after expiry of such period—Whether accused a foreigner, when he entered India, within s. 2(a) of Act before its amendment—Accused whether had contravened para. 7 of Order—Words "said period" in para. 7 whether refer to period mentioned in visa.

The accused who was a natural born British subject within the meaning of s. 2(a)(i) of the Foreigners Act, 1946, (before the section was amended by the Foreigners Laws (Amendment) Act, 1957) entered India on July 12, 1956, on a passport obtained from the Government of Pakistan. He had obtained a visa from the High Commissioner for India in Pakistan which was valid for three months from the date of entry into Indian territory. The accused did not leave India after the expiry of this period and he was thereupon prosecuted for an offence under s. 14 of the Foreigners Act, 1946, for having contravened para. 7 of the Foreigners Order, 1948, and s. 13 of the Act:—

Held, that the accused was not a foreigner when he entered India on July 12, 1956, as defined in s. 2(a)(i) of the Act as it stood then and therefore he was not obliged to comply with the provisions of para. 7 of the Order.

Union of India v. Haseenali,¹ referred to.

The words "the said period" occurring in para. 7 of the Foreigners Order, 1948, refer to the period indicated in the permit issued by the Registration Officer and not to the period mentioned in the visa.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

Y. V. Chandrachud, Government Pleader, for the State.

V. J. Desai (appointed), for the accused.

DATAR J. This is an appeal filed by the State of Bombay against the order of acquittal passed by the Judicial Magistrate, First Class, Ankleshwar, in Criminal Case No. 996 of 1957.

The case of the prosecution was that the present respondent Mahomedkhan Navarangkhan is a foreigner being a national of Pakistan. As such national he obtained a passport from the Government of Pakistan at Karachi on June 9, 1952, which was valid upto June 9, 1957.

On July 3, 1956, he applied for visa for India to enable and authorise him to enter the Indian territory to see his father and other relatives in the State of Bombay. The High Commissioner for India in Pakistan granted him visa of the category 'C' being No. 49900 and dated July 3, 1956. It was stated in the visa that it was valid for three months from the date of entry, which meant that the respondent, in whose favour it was issued, was to remain in India for a period of three months from the date of his arrival on the Indian territory. The respondent entered India on July 12, 1956, and accordingly he was allowed to stay in India till October 11, 1956. But he did not leave India even after October 11, 1956.

On June 21, 1957, the District Police Superintendent, Broach, gave him a notice stating that in spite of the last date of the visa obtained from the High Commissioner for India in Pakistan, he was illegally staying in Bharat, and he was therefore ordered to quit Bharat within one month from the date of the receipt of the notice, failing which legal steps would be taken against him in a Court of law and thereafter he would be deported from India. This notice was served upon the respondent on June 22, 1957.

Even after the period mentioned in the notice expired, the respondent did not leave India. Hence, the Police sub-inspector of Ankleshwar filed a complaint on July 31, 1957, against the respondent stating that he was a foreigner under s. 2(a) of Foreigners Act of 1946 and that he had not left Bharat in spite of the notice served on him on June 22, 1957, and had continued to stay in Ankleshwar (Bharat) illegally in spite of the expiry of the notice and had therefore committed a breach of r. 7 of the Foreigners Order, 1948, and s. 13 of the Foreigners Act, 1946, and thus committed an offence punishable under s. 14 of the Foreigners Act, 1946.

The Judicial Magistrate, before whom the case came up for trial, framed a charge against the respondent as follows:—

"That you on or about the 25th day of July 1957 at Ankleshwar being a foreigner entered into India under the authority of 'C' Visa No. 49900 dated July 3, 1956 on July 12, 1956 and were permitted to stay in India upto October 11, 1956 but you did not leave India even after the D.S.P. Broach gave you notice which was served on you on June 22, 1957, and thereby contravened r. 7 of the Foreigners Order, 1948 and also s. 13 of the Foreigners Act, 1946, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 14 of the Foreigners Act, 1946."

The respondent resisted the charge. His defence was that he was not a national of Pakistan but was a citizen of India. He was born at Ankleshwar and was officiating as Talathi till 1951 when he resigned from his office. Then he started business, but due to loss in the business he had to stop it in a short time. Thereafter he could not secure a good job or any good business and in search of good service and for a short time he went to Pakistan (Karachi). He did not go to Pakistan permanently. He had no reason, except for service, in going to Pakistan. After going to Pakistan, he found that it was not suitable for him to stay there. He intended to come back to Bharat in a short time; and when he made movements to return to Bharat, he was informed that it was impossible to return to Bharat, unless he obtained the passport of Pakistan for returning to Bharat. At last he obtained the passport from Pakistan. Thereafter, he applied for visa. He further says that he was not informed that he would be considered as national of Pakistan when he obtained the passport and the visa from his agent in Pakistan. The agent had taken his signature on the blank forms and he filled up all the particulars according to his (agent's) wish and he was not made aware of the particulars written by the agent and if it was stated that he was a national of Pakistan in the application for visa, that fact was mentioned in the application without his knowledge and no such declaration was ever made by him.

The learned Magistrate, on appreciation of the evidence led before him, held that the respondent was born in India in 1921 or 1922, that he served as a Talathi from 1944 till 1951 in the District of Broach and that he left India either towards the end of 1951 or in early 1952. He also held that the prosecution had not proved that the respondent migrated from India to Pakistan with the intention of residing and settling in Pakistan and that therefore art. 7 of the Constitution did not apply and in view of art. 5 of the Constitution, the respondent was a citizen of India and not a foreigner. Accordingly, on November 30, 1957, he acquitted the respondent of the offence with which he had been charged.

The State has now come to this Court in appeal against the order of acquittal.

The learned Government Pleader, who appears for the State, contended that even from what had been stated by the respondent in his defence at the trial, the migration of the respondent from India to Pakistan had been more than amply proved. According to the learned Government Pleader 'migration' did not mean leaving one country for another, with a view permanently to reside and settle in the other country. But it only meant leaving one country for another with a view to pursue any normal avocation in the other country. The second contention that was raised by the learned Government Pleader was that in view of r. 3 specified in Sch. III of the Citizenship Rules, 1956, made under s. 18 of the Citizenship Act, 1955, the fact that the respondent (though originally a citizen of India) had obtained a passport on June 9, 1952, from the Government of Pakistan shall be conclusive proof of his having voluntarily acquired the citizenship of that country before that date, and therefore it was not now open to the respondent to contend that he still retained the citizenship of India. The learned Government Pleader also drew our attention to the declaration made by the respondent in his application for visa before the High Commissioner for India in Pakistan, wherein he had stated that he was a Pakistani national and that he had migrated from India in August 1948. In view of these solemn declarations in the application, contended the learned Government Pleader, the respondent could not be regarded as a citizen of India, but was only a foreigner so long as no attempt had been made by him to show that he had been induced to make those declarations either because of some fraud or misrepresentation. The learned Government Pleader also pointed out that in view of the provisions of s. 9 of the Foreigners Act, 1946, the onus of showing that he was not a foreigner was entirely upon the respondent, and in the absence of any relevant evidence in that behalf, it must be held that the respondent was a foreigner and therefore guilty of the offence with which he was charged.

In our view, it is not necessary to consider any of these submissions made by the learned Government Pleader, as this appeal can be disposed of on the ground that the respondent was not a foreigner when he entered India on July 13, 1956, as defined in the Act as it then stood and that the facts proved by the prosecution in this case do not at all make out any case of the contravention of r. 7 of the Foreigners Order, 1948, or s. 13 of the Act, for which the respondent was charged in the trial Court. We have set out the entire charge as framed by the learned Magistrate. Indeed it appears the learned Magistrate while framing the charges relied upon the averments and the allegations made by the sub-inspector in his written complaint filed on July 31, 1957. Both the charge and the written complaint refer to the contravention of r. 7 of the Foreigners Order, 1948, and also s. 13 of the Foreigners Act. Section 13, so far as material, states that any person who fails to comply with any direction given in pursuance of any such order (made under the provisions of the Act) shall be deemed to have contravened the provisions of the Act. The orders referred to in s. 13 are those orders which the Central Government may make in the exercise of their power conferred upon them by s. 3 of the Foreigners Act, 1946. Section 3(1) of the Act says that "The Central Government may by order make provision, either generally or with respect to all foreigners or with respect to any particular foreigner...for prohibiting, regulating or restricting the entry of foreigners into India or their departure therefrom...

(2) In particular and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing power, orders made under this section may provide that the foreigner...

(c) shall not remain in India or in any prescribed area therein..."

Under s. 12 of the Act, it seems, the Central Government has been authorised to delegate its powers under s. 3 to any authority subordinate to it. Section 12 reads:

"Any authority upon which any power to make or give any direction, consent or permission or to do any other act is conferred by this Act or by any order made thereunder may, unless express provision is made to the contrary, in writing authorise, conditionally or otherwise, any authority subordinate to it to exercise such power on its behalf..."

From the wording of s. 13 mentioned above, it is clear that it refers to the non-compliance of a direction given in pursuance of any order made by the Central Government under s. 3 or by any authority subordinate thereto under s. 12 of the Act. It is for this reason that the learned Government Pleader relied more upon the reference to the contravention of r. 7 of the Foreigners Order, 1948, than upon the reference to s. 13 in the charge. It is only when there is an order of a competent authority under the Act that the question of any direction being given in pursuance thereof can arise. Therefore, the only question that falls to be considered is whether there was any order the contravention of which amounted to an offence punishable under s. 14 of the Act. The prosecution, as is clear from the complaint and the charge, relies upon the contravention of only para. (rule) 7 of the Foreigners Order, 1948. The Foreigners Order, 1948, was made by the Central Government in the exercise of its powers conferred by s. 3 of the Foreigners Act, 1946. Paragraph 7 (mentioned as r. 7 in the charge) of the Foreigners Order states that:

"Every foreigner who enters India on the authority of a Visa issued in pursuance of the Indian Passport Act, 1920 (XXXIV of 1920) shall obtain from the Registration Officer having jurisdiction... a permit indicating the period during which he is authorised to remain in India and shall, unless the period indicated in the permit is extended by the Central Government, depart from India before the expiry of the said period; and at the time of foreigner's departure from India the permit shall be surrendered by him to the Registration Officer having jurisdiction at the place from which he departs."

The wording of this paragraph makes it clear that before there could be any contravention of the provisions thereof it must be shown that the person who entered India was a foreigner, and that having entered India he failed in the first instance to obtain a permit from the requisite authority indicating the period during which he was authorised to remain in India and thereafter failed to depart from India before the expiry of the said period. If so, then the question arises, was the respondent a foreigner on July 12, 1956, when he entered India? As s. 2(a) of the Foreigners Act, 1946, stood on that date, "foreigner" was defined as meaning a person who

(i) is not a natural-born British subject as defined in sub-sections (1) and (2) of section 1 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, or

(ii) has not been granted a certificate of naturalisation as a British subject under any law for the time being in force in India, or

(iii) is not a citizen of India."

It is not disputed, and indeed it cannot be disputed in view of the evidence on the record and the finding of the learned Magistrate, that the respondent was at the material time a natural born British subject within the meaning of s. 2(a)(i) of the Foreigners Act of 1946. Therefore, even assuming that the respondent was not a citizen of India, still he was not a foreigner as defined in the Act inasmuch as he was a natural born British subject within the meaning of s. 2(a)(i) of the Act.

The learned Government Pleader tried to construe the three clauses of the definition as meaning that if a person was not a citizen of India, then even though he was a natural born British subject or had obtained a certificate of naturalization as required by cl. (i) or by cl. (ii) of s. 2(a) of the Act, he must nevertheless be deemed to be a foreigner. We do not think that it is possible to put any such construction upon the three clauses mentioned in the definition. In *Union of India v. Hasanali*¹ it was held that the Foreigners Act, 1946, did not authorise the Government to extern all non-citizens and the only person who could be externed under the provisions of the Act was a person who was a foreigner as defined by the Act. In the course of the judgment the learned Chief Justice observed that it is possible for a person not to be a citizen and yet not to be a foreigner within the meaning of the Act.

It may be noted that s. 2(a) of the Foreigners Act, 1946, was amended by the Foreigners Laws (Amendment) Act, 1957, which came into force on January 19, 1957. By this Amendment Act, cls. (i) and (ii) in s. 2(a) were deleted and "Foreigner" was defined as meaning only a person who was not a citizen of India. But this Amendment Act came into force long after the respondent entered India. We have to determine whether the respondent was a foreigner by reference to the definition as it was in force when he entered India; and in view of the undisputed position that he was a natural born British subject within the meaning of s. 2(a), cl. (i), of the Act, it must be held that he was not a foreigner and therefore not obliged to comply with the provisions of para. 7 of the Foreigners Order, 1948. Further even assuming that the respondent was a foreigner on the date of his arrival in India, it is not clear in what respect there has been any contravention of para. (rule) 7 of the Foreigners Order, 1948. It is not the prosecution case that the respondent contravened the provisions of para. (rule) 7 in that he failed to obtain from the Registration Officer a permit indicating the period during which he was authorized to remain in India. It is also not the gravamen of the charge. It is also not disputed that there was no permit ever obtained by the respondent from the Registration Officer. The learned Government Pleader suggests that there was a failure on the part of the respondent to depart from India before the expiry of the said period as mentioned in para. (rule) 7 of the Foreigners Order, 1948, and therefore there was a contravention of the provisions of the said paragraph. We cannot accept this suggestion. The words "the said period" occurring in the paragraph must refer to the period indicated in the permit. When there was no permit and when failure to obtain such permit was never made the ground of the present complaint, we do not see how any failure to depart from India before the expiry of the period indicated in such permit could ever occur and could be made the basis of the complaint as suggested by the learned Government Pleader.

The learned Government Pleader further suggested that even though it was true that no permit had been obtained by the respondent from the requisite authority and failure to obtain such permit had not been made the subject-matter of the present complaint or the charge, all what para. (rule) 7 mentioned was that the foreigner should depart from India before the expiry of the period mentioned in the visa itself. In other words, the contention of the learned Government Pleader was that the "period" referred to in the paragraph was the period mentioned primarily in the visa and that such period had only to be restated in the permit. If, therefore, there was no departure from India before the expiry of the period mentioned in the visa, there was contravention of the provisions of para. 7 of the Foreigners Order, 1948, which was made punishable under s. 14 of the Act. We do not think that this contention is right. The paragraph expressly refers to the period indicated in the permit and not to the period mentioned in the visa. The visa only mentions that it is valid for three months from the date of entry in India. The date of the issue of visa and the date of entry in India cannot in most cases be the same. It is only when a foreigner enters India, that para. 7 of the Foreigners Order, 1948, makes it incumbent upon him to approach the Registration Officer and obtain a permit from him indicating the period during which he is authorised to remain in India. This period obviously has to be computed from the date of his entering India which is known only after he arrives in India.

Then it was further argued that the notice which was issued by the District Police Superintendent of Broach on June 21, 1957, was in the nature of a direction given in pursuance of a valid order and the contravention thereof was contravention of the provisions of the Act in view of s. 13 of the Act. It is true that the Central Government could delegate its powers under s. 3 to any authority subordinate to it. The Notification S.R.O. No. 1562 issued by the Government of India, so far as material, states that in exercise of the powers conferred by cl. (i) of art. 258 of the Constitution, the President with the consent of the Government of Bombay hereby entrusts to that Government the functions of the Central Government in making orders of the nature specified in cl. (c) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Foreigners Act, 1946 (XXXI of 1946) in respect of foreigners other than enemy foreigners as defined in the Enemy Foreigners Order, 1939, subject to the following conditions namely:—

“(1) that notwithstanding this entrustment the Central Government may itself exercise the said function either generally or in any particular case or class of cases, and

(2) that the State Government shall not exercise the said function in a manner inconsistent with any orders which have been, or may hereafter be, issued by the Central Government under the said Act.”

In view of this Notification we can proceed on the basis that the State Government has got the power of making appropriate order under s. 3(2)(c) of the Act.

But so far as the record of the present case stands, we do not find any such order produced on behalf of the prosecution. The learned Government Pleader contends that inasmuch as a notice was issued to the respondent by the District Police Superintendent of Broach that notice must have been given only in pursuance of a valid order of the State Government. It is not possible to accept this contention. In the first place, there is no reference to any such order in the notice given by the District Police Superintendent of Broach; nor is there any mention of any such order either in the written complaint or in the charge. What is mentioned in the charge is only the notice of the District Police Superintendent. In the absence of any reference to any order of the State Government in the evidence of the present case, it is impossible to hold that the State Government had passed the requisite order and had further given directions to the District Police Superintendent of Broach to give the notice which he issued on June 21, 1957. Besides, the evidence on record does not show and the complaint and the charge do not even mention that the order of the State Government (if it existed) was brought to the notice of the respondent before he was charged with contravention thereof or of any direction given in pursuance thereof. It must, therefore, be held that the respondent was neither guilty of any contravention of the provisions of para. (rule) 7 of the Foreigners Order, 1948, nor of the provisions of s. 13 of the Foreigners Act, 1946.

The learned Government Pleader made a grievance that the points upon which we are disposing of the appeal were entirely new and we should not, therefore, consider and give effect to them for the first time in appeal. But it may be noted that these points suggested themselves to us as we proceeded to hear the arguments of the learned Government Pleader and were also urged by the learned advocate on behalf of the respondent. These points could be considered and disposed of on the facts already proved and admitted in the case and the respondent in an appeal against acquittal could support the order of acquittal on any grounds available to him if those grounds did not necessitate any further investigation into facts.

The result is that the order of acquittal is confirmed and the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed: acquittal confirmed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

[NAGPUR BENCH]

Before Mr. Justice Gokhale.

GAJANAN DHUNDIRAJ DESHPANDE

v.

SHRIDHAR MORESHWAR DESHPANDE.*

Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights (Estates, Mahals, Alienated Lands) Act (I of 1951), Secs. 4(1) & (2), 38(1) & (2), 2(g), 3(1)—Central Provinces Land Revenue Act (II of 1917)—Central Provinces Tenancy Act (I of 1920)—Home-farm land held as khudkasht and in possession of persons on date of vesting under Act I of 1951—Title of other persons in such land subsisting at time of coming into force of Act—Whether title of such persons affected by Act—Dispute as to title to land how to be decided.

Under the Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights (Estates, Mahals, Alienated Lands) Act, 1950, where a home-farm land stands in the name of certain persons as khudkasht land and is in their possession on the date of vesting under the Act, the rights and interests of other persons in this land which were subsisting at the time of the coming into force of the Act are not affected by the Act but are kept intact, and if any dispute arises as to the title to this land, that dispute will have to be decided by the civil Court as contemplated under s. 38 of the Act. If, however, before the coming into force of the Act the persons in whose name the land stands had obtained exclusive title to the land against the other persons who were co-owners of the land, by virtue of adverse possession or by relinquishment or otherwise, then under s. 4(2) of the Act they would be entitled to retain possession of the land and they would become malik makbuzas of the land under s. 38(1) of the Act.

*Rahmatullah Khan v. Mahabir Singh*³ and Mahadeo v. Yamunabai,⁴ referred to.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

B. H. Mandlikar, for the appellant.

M. B. Bobde and G. J. Ghate, for the respondent.

GOKHALE J. These two second appeals are filed by the original plaintiff against the dismissal of his two suits by both the lower Courts. The few facts which it is necessary to state for appreciating the points involved in these appeals are as follows:—

Moreshwar and Gajanan were brothers and they were co-sharers in two villages of Nandora and Tuljapur. It appears that on May 14, 1930, there was a partition between these two brothers with respect to the home-farm lands in possession of their family, but the proprietorship in respect of these two villages was not partitioned. Moreshwar, the elder brother, acted as the lambar-dar in both these villages. In 1931 pre-emption proceedings were started by Moreshwar with regard to field No. 17 of Nandora. These proceedings lasted for five years from 1931 to 1936, and ultimately in January 1936, field No. 17 was acquired by Moreshwar as a result of these proceedings. In 1937 a portion of two acres out of field No. 34/1 situated in mouza Tuljapur was acquired by Moreshwar in ejectment proceedings against one Wajirkhan. This Wajirkhan held at mouza Tuljapur three fields, namely, Nos. 34/1, 36/1 and 52. Field No. 34/1 consisted originally of 12.60 acres, but as I have already *Decided, August 6/7, 1953. Second Appeal No. 49 of 1955 (with Second Appeal No. 50 of 1955), against the decision of K. B. Tayade, District Judge at Wardha, in Civil Appeal No. 52-A of 1953, confirming the decree passed by K. K. Kolhekar, First Civil Judge, Class II, at Wardha, in Civil Suit No. 63-A of 1952.

1. [1953] Nag. 702.

2. (1957) First Appeal No. 15 of 1952, decided by S. T. Desai J., on December 6, 1957 (Unrep.).

3. [1955] Nag. 983.

4. (1950) Second Appeal No. 323 of 1948, decided by Choudhury J., on January 22, 1954 (Unrep.)

stated, two acres out of it were obtained by Moreshwar in ejectment proceedings against Wajirkhan. Subsequently, by two surrender deeds dated April 16, 1937, and November 12, 1937, Moreshwar acquired the remaining land in field No. 34/1, with the result that field No. 34/1 came to be recorded as 34/1 and 34/8. These two fields were known as khari lands. Field No. 16/2 at mouza Nandora was acquired by Moreshwar in ejectment proceedings on October 14, 1938, from its tenant Balaji. Then on November 27, 1940, under a surrender deed Moreshwar acquired the Bhivesni lands, namely, fields Nos. 36/1 and 52 situated at mouza Tuljapur. As I have already stated, the lands at mouza Tuljapur originally were owned by Wajirkhan, and despite the fact that Moreshwar acquired all his lands under separate proceedings, there were disputes between Moreshwar and Wajirkhan resulting in proceedings under s. 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. But these disputes were regarding khari lands only, that is to say, fields Nos. 34/1 and 34/8 only and they ended in favour of Moreshwar on September 6, 1938. So far, therefore, as the chapter of acquisition of lands by Moreshwar as lambārdar was concerned, that chapter closed in 1940. Moreshwar had two sons, Waman and Shridhar, and it appears that Shridhar attained majority sometime before 1942 and he filed a suit for partition against Moreshwar and Waman, being Civil Suit No. 17-A of 1942. Gajanan, the separated uncle, was, it appears, helping Shridhar in this suit and that suit resulted in a compromise. The result of that compromise was that fields Nos. 16/2 and 17 of the village of Nandora were allotted to Waman, while fields Nos. 34/1, 34/8, 36/1 and 52 of mouza Tuljapur were allotted to Shridhar. Moreshwar seems to have died on December 27, 1943, and the fields which had been allotted to Waman and Shridhar in the partition suit came to be respectively entered into their names in the records of the two villages. Nothing happened thereafter till 1952 when Gajanan, the present appellant-plaintiff, filed the two suits, being Civil Suits Nos. 62-A of 1952 and 63-A of 1952. Suit No. 62-A was filed by him against Waman claiming partition and separate possession of half share in fields Nos. 16/2 and 17 of mouza Nandora, and suit No. 63-A was filed by him against Shridhar for partition and separate possession of his half share in fields Nos. 34/1, 34/8, 36/1 and 52 situated at mouza Tuljapur. It is out of these suits that the present two appeals have arisen. Second Appeal No. 50 of 1955 having arisen out of original civil suit No. 62-A of 1952 and Second Appeal No. 49 of 1955 having arisen out of civil suit No. 63-A of 1952. As these two appeals raise common questions, this judgment will govern both of them.

These suits came to be filed by the plaintiff on the basis that being a co-sharer with Moreshwar in the two villages of Nandora and Tuljapur, and as Moreshwar had obtained these suit fields by ejectment, surrender and pre-emption proceedings, they were held by Moreshwar on behalf of the proprietorship belonging to himself and the plaintiff, and these fields came to be entered in the name of Moreshwar as his khudkasht lands and the plaintiff was, therefore, entitled to claim partition and separate possession of $\frac{1}{2}$ share in all these fields. The suits were resisted by the defendants in the two suits, Waman and Shridhar, on several grounds. But the principal contentions of the defendants were that the plaintiff had refused to pay his contribution for the acquisition of these fields; that the fields were possessed by Moreshwar, and after his death, as a result of the partition, by the defendants as their own khudkasht lands, and the plaintiff was, therefore, not entitled to any share therein. They also alleged that the plaintiff was excluded from enjoyment of these fields, and, therefore, even assuming that he had any original title, that was lost by adverse possession. They also pleaded that the plaintiff was estopped from claiming any share in the property because he had taken an active part in helping Shridhar in Civil Suit No. 17-A of 1942 representing to the defendants that these fields belonged to them only. These were the principal defences to the suit on facts.

A point of law was also raised by the defendants and that point was that as a result of the Madhya Pradesh Abolition of Proprietary Rights (Estates, Mahals, Alienated Lands) Act, 1950 (I of 1951), hereinafter referred to as the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, the proprietorship in the two villages had ceased, and as the plaintiff had ceased to be a proprietor, he could not file a suit for partition and separate possession of these fields.

The trial Court came to the conclusion that the plaintiff's suit was not barred by virtue of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act which came into force on March 31, 1951. It, however, held against the plaintiff on issues of fact and came to the conclusion that the plaintiff had refused to contribute towards the cost of acquisition in respect of field No. 16/2 and also held that the plaintiff was estopped from claiming a share by virtue of the part that he played in the partition suit between Waman and Shridhar. It also found that the plaintiff had been ousted by the defendants for the requisite period, and, therefore, the plaintiff's suit for partition was barred by limitation. On these grounds, amongst others, both the suits were dismissed by the trial Court. The plaintiff filed two appeals against this decision. Civil Appeal No. 51-A of 1953 was filed by him against the decision in Civil Suit No. 62-A of 1952, whereas Civil Appeal No. 52-A of 1953 was filed by him against the decision in Civil Suit No. 63-A of 1952. Both these appeals were disposed of by a common judgment by the learned District Judge at Wardha, who found as a fact that the plaintiff had never been approached for contribution for expenses of acquisition of the suit fields and that there was no estoppel against the plaintiff as alleged by the defendants and also no question of the defendants having acted upon any representation on the part of the plaintiff. The lower appellate Court also came to the conclusion that since the acquisitions were by Moreashwar as lambardar, the plaintiff would be entitled to his share as a co-sharer in respect of these fields and no ouster was proved for the requisite period against the plaintiff by the defendants. But, on the question of law raised by the defendants as regards the effect of the coming into operation of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, the learned Judge was of the view that the plaintiff's suits must fail since the suits were brought by the plaintiff in his capacity as the proprietor of the villages, and that character having been lost by the plaintiff by virtue of the abolition of the malguzari, the plaintiff's claim could not be enforced. That was why, for a different reason, the lower appellate Court confirmed the decision of the trial Court in dismissing the plaintiff's suits. That is why the plaintiff has filed these two appeals.

Mr. Mandlekar, learned advocate appearing on behalf of the plaintiff in both the appeals, has contended in the first instance that the view of the lower appellate Court that the suits were incompetent by virtue of the provisions of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act is erroneous in law. Mr. Mandlekar also supports the findings of fact which were given in the plaintiff's favour by the lower appellate Court. According to Mr. Mandlekar, if the view of the learned appellate Judge as regards the effect of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act is wrong, then he must get a decree in his favour in both the appeals. Now, the short argument of Mr. Mandlekar is that what the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act does is to abolish the proprietorship of villages. It does not affect the private lands belonging to proprietors, nor does it affect their nature. Mr. Mandlekar contended that Moreashwar was admittedly a lambardar of the two villages of Nandora and Tuljapur. Though in 1930 the home-farm lands belonging to the family of Moreashwar and his client were partitioned, there was admittedly no partition of the proprietorship of these two villages. In between the years 1931-40 Moreashwar acquired the six lands in suit in the two villages by surrender, ejection and pre-emption proceedings, and these he could only initiate as a lambardar acting on behalf of the whole body of the proprietors of the two villages, which consisted of himself and Gajanan, the plaintiff. The lands were, therefore, acquired by Moreashwar not for himself but for the whole proprietary body, and, therefore, the plaintiff got 0/8/0 share in these lands acquired by Moreashwar and he would be entitled to get separate possession of these lands on his paying his share in the expenses incurred by Moreashwar in acquiring these lands. And Mr. Mandlikar contends that there is nothing in the provisions of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act which precludes him from filing a suit against the defendants for his share in the suit lands which are home-farm lands. As against this Mr. Bobde, the learned advocate appearing on behalf of the defendants, admits that no doubt Moreashwar instituted pre-emption, surrender and ejectment proceedings as a lambardar and, therefore, acquired these lands as a lambardar, and consequently Mr. Bobde says that the plaintiff initially might have been entitled to a share in these lands. But Mr. Bobde contends that after the chapter of acquisition, as he puts it, was over, right from the time when these lands were acquired, Moreashwar remained in possession of these lands and cultivated these lands as his own home-farm lands, and all these lands were entered in his name as khudkashi lands. Since the plaintiff could only claim a share in respect of these lands on the basis that he was a co-sharer in the proprietorship of these two villages, and since this proprietorship itself was abolished under the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, the lower appellate Court was right in its view that the plaintiff's suits were not maintainable. Alternatively, Mr. Bobde contended that even assuming that the suits were maintainable, the evidence on record was not properly appreciated by the lower appellate Court, and according to Mr. Bobde, the lower appellate Court has erred in law in coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff had not been excluded for the statutory period and that his title to the lands was not extinguished.

In order to examine the respective contentions of the parties on the question of the effect of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, it is necessary to refer to some of the provisions of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, 1917 (II of 1917), the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, 1920 (I of 1920), and the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act. There is no dispute that the suit lands are entered in the name of the defendants to the two suits as khudkashi lands. Section 2(5) of the C. P. Land Revenue Act defines a khudkashi land as that part of the home-farm of a mahal which is cultivated by the proprietor as such and which is not sir land. It is not necessary to refer to the two explanations to this definition. Section 2(17) defines sir land, but it is not necessary to refer to that definition either. Section 2(6) defines 'lambardar' as meaning the proprietor of a mahal appointed to discharge the duties imposed on a lambardar by the Act. Section 188(1) enumerates the duties of the lambardar, while s. 188(2)(a) states that the lambardar shall, in the mahal or patti for which he is appointed, be deemed to be the landlord within the meaning of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, 1898; and under cl. (d) of s. 188(2), the lambardar has the power, if necessary, to institute suits and take other proceedings relating to the exercise of his powers of the lambardar and against trespassers on the common property. Then we turn to the provision of the C. P. Tenancy Act, 1920. Section 6-A of this Act refers to landlord's right of pre-emption. Sections 23 and 24 dealt with the landlord's right to recover arrears of rent by ejectment of the tenant and the procedure to be followed by a Revenue Officer in execution of a decree for arrears by ejectment. These two sections are omitted by the C. P. Tenancy (Amendment) Act, 1939; but there is no dispute that when Moreashwar filed ejectment proceedings against the tenants, these provisions of the Tenancy Act were in force. Section 89 of this Act refers to surrender of holding by a tenant in favour of the landlord. As I have already stated, the suit lands were acquired by Moreashwar by instituting ejectment and pre-emption proceedings and getting surrender of some of these lands. Under s. 188(2) of the C.P. Land Revenue Act, as already seen, the lambardar is to be deemed to be the landlord within the meaning of the C. P. Tenancy Act, and it is the lambardar who would be taking proceedings and instituting suits on behalf of the proprietary body in pre-emption and ejectment proceedings and getting surrender deeds from the tenants. There can, therefore, be no doubt that when Moreashwar obtained these lands before 1940, he was acting as the lambardar of the two villages and acquired the lands for the whole body of the proprietors consisting of himself and his brother Gajanan, and since he acquired these lands for the proprietors, Gajanan would be entitled to a share in those lands, subject to his liability to contribute the necessary amount of expenses incurred by Moreswar; and as I have already stated, Mr. Bobde does not dispute this legal position that so far as the acquisition proceedings are concerned, they were taken by Moreswar as a lambardar and he acquired these lands for the proprietorship, which consisted of himself and his brother Gajanan. But then Mr. Bobde's contention is that the definition of khudkasht shows that it is a land which is cultivated by the proprietor as such, and, therefore, since Moreswar was in possession of these lands and cultivating them, and since Gajanan had nothing to do with this cultivation, these lands became the khudkasht of Moreswar alone, and they were entered as such in the records of the two villages. And Mr. Bobde further contends that since the only title on which Gajanan can base his present suits for partition being that of a co-sharer in the proprietorship of these two villages and since that proprietorship itself has been abolished, the suits are not maintainable. That takes me to the provisions of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act.

Section 2(g) of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, so far as it is material, states:

"Home-farm' means,—

(1) in relation to the Central Provinces—

(i) land recorded as sir and khudkasht in the name of a proprietor in the annual papers for the year 1948-49,"...

And Mr. Bobde says that so far as the suit lands are concerned, they were entered as khudkasht in the names of Waman and Shridhar respectively in the two villages of Nandora and Tuljapur. But, if they were recorded in the names of Waman and Shridhar in the annual papers for the year 1948-49 as khudkasht, they could only be so recorded in their names as proprietors; and if admittedly in 1948-49 Gajanan was also a co-sharer in the proprietorship of these two villages, the mere fact that these lands came to be entered in the names of Waman and Shridhar would not, in my judgment, affect the rights of Gajanan in these lands. Under s. 3(1) of this Act—

"Save as otherwise provided in this Act, on and from a date to be specified by a notification by the State Government in this behalf, all proprietary rights in an estate, mahal, alienated village or alienated land, as the case may be, in the area specified in the notification, vesting in a proprietor of such estate, mahal, alienated village, alienated land, or in a person having interest in such proprietary right through the proprietor, shall pass from such proprietor or such other person to and vest in the State for the purposes of the State free of all encumbrances."

By virtue of s. 4(1)(a) when the notification under s. 3 in respect of any area has been published in the Gazette, then, notwithstanding anything contained in any contract or in any other document, all rights, title and interest vesting in the proprietor or any person having interest in such proprietary right through the proprietor shall cease and be vested in the State for purposes of the State free of all encumbrances. Sub-section (2) of s. 4, however, provides as follows:—

"Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1), the proprietor shall continue to retain the possession of his home-stead, home-farm land, and in the Central Provinces also of land brought under cultivation by him after the agricultural year 1948-49 but before the date of vesting."

The date of vesting under the Act was March 31, 1951, so that on that date the interest not only of Gajanan but also of the defendants in the proprietorship of the two villages ceased and vested in the State. But that did not lead to a cesser of the interests of these proprietors in their home-stead or home-farm lands. They continued to have the right to retain possession of their home-farm lands. Now, Mr. Bobde's contention is that if the right of proprietaryship ended on March 31, 1951, the very basis on which the plaintiff claimed to have his right to a share in these lands enforced, ended, so that Waman and Shridhar alone had the right to retain possession of the suit lands which were entered in their names as khudkasht. I am not prepared to accept that contention. As I have already stated, the lands were entered in the name of Moreswar till the partition suit, and as a result of the partition suit, in the names of Waman and Shridhar, as khudkasht, because they were the proprietors of the two villages. But they alone were not the exclusive owners of these villages but the plaintiff had admittedly an 0/8/0 share in both these villages. The acquisition of lands being for the whole proprietary body, unless it is shown that the plaintiff had lost his right either by adverse possession or by relinquishment or otherwise, it would be difficult to hold that by virtue of s. 4(1) and (2) of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, the plaintiff ceased to have any right to claim a share in these lands. In this connection, reference may be made to the provisions of s. 38 of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act. Under s. 38(1) every proprietor, who is divested of his proprietary rights in an estate or mahal, shall, with effect from the date of vesting, be a malik-makbuz of the home-farm land in his possession. The C. P. Land Revenue Act, by s. 2(9), defines 'malik-makbuz' as meaning any person who owns one or more plots of land separately assessed to land-revenue in a mahal. Now, Mr. Bobde very strenuously relies on s. 4(2) and s. 38(1) of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, in support of his argument that the plaintiff had no right whatever in the suit lands. According to him, it is Waman and Shridhar, the two defendants in the suits, who continued to have the rights to retain possession of the home-farm land, and Mr. Bobde further contends that under s. 38(1), from the date of the vesting i.e. March 31, 1951, it is the defendants who became the *malik-makbuz*s of the home-farm lands in their possession. But Mr. Bobde's argument assumes that the entire proprietary rights on the date of vesting were in Waman and Shridhar. That assumption, in my opinion, is entirely erroneous. In this connection, reference may also be made to sub-s. (2) of s. 38 of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, which provides:

"If there are more persons than one having interest in land held as sir or khudkasht immediately before the date of vesting, any such person may apply for a partition of his share in the land and the Revenue Officer may, subject to rules made by the State Government in this behalf, after hearing the objection of the co-sharers, divide the land and apportion the assessment:

Provided that no such partition shall be made if any question of title is raised until such question has been decided by a civil Court.

Explanation.—For the purposes of the aforesaid proviso, the claim of any proprietor that he holds any land in exclusive ownership or that he had acquired any khudkasht land exclusively for himself shall be deemed to be a question of title."

These provisions would, therefore, clearly indicate that where a home-farm land stands in the name of certain persons, the rights or interests of other persons in this land are not intended to be affected by the provisions of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act: they are kept intact; and if any dispute arises as to the title to this land, that dispute has to be settled by the civil Court. It is true that if, before this Act came into force, Waman and Shridhar had obtained exclusive title to these lands as against the plaintiff by virtue of adverse possession, or in any other manner, then under s. 4(2) they would be entitled to retain possession of the home-farm land and they would become *malik-makbuz*s of these lands under s. 38(1); but the coming into force of this Act cannot have any effect on the title of the plaintiff if that title was subsisting at the time when this Act came into force. The trial Court took the view that the plaintiff did not lose his share in the suit lands by virtue of the provisions of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act. The lower appellate Court, however, disagreed with the view of the trial Court and relied upon the decision in *Chhote Khan v. Mohammad Obedullakhan*¹ in support of its view. All that that case decides is that the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act was not retrospective in its operation, and the majority view was that the landlord's powers to institute a suit for evicting the unauthorised occupant of an abadi site had come to an end by virtue of ss. 50 and 60 of that Act. The only question, that was before the Court in that case was whether the proprietor was entitled to continue the suit filed by him as lambardar after the coming into operation of the Act, and it was held that the office of the lambardar itself having ceased because of the Act, the lis could not be continued by him. Mr. Mandlekar seems to be right in his contention that this case does not come in the way of the plaintiff in the present suits, which are filed by him for enforcing his right to partition and getting separate possession of his share in the home-farm lands. I have already referred to the relevant provisions of the C. P. Land Revenue Act, 1917, as well as the C. P. Tenancy Act, 1920. As Sinha C.J., as he then was, points out in Chhote Khan's case, a lambardar had a dual character. He was an agent of the Government for collecting and paying into Government treasury the Government share in the collections from tenants and he had other duties like assisting Government agents in the mofussil in the discharge of their duties. Secondly, he was the statutory agent of the proprietors of the village. Under s. 188(2)(a) he was deemed to be the landlord, and under s. 188(2)(b) he had to exercise the powers of the proprietors in matters relating to the village abadi and the enjoyment of their rights and privileges by tenants and others over the wasteland of the village including the grazing of cattle thereon. Under s. 188(2)(c) he was empowered to collect village profits and was under an obligation to render an account of the same to the proprietors within six months of the close of the agricultural year. And under s. 188(2)(d), if necessary, he was entitled to institute suits and take other proceedings in relation to the common property of the proprietors. As a lambardar, when he instituted suits for ejectment or pre-emption, or obtained surrenders from the tenants, he did it in his representative capacity. The effect of the abolition of the Proprietary Rights Act is, as Sinha C.J. points out, to wipe out the interest of the intermediaries between the State and the actual tillers of the soil, with the result that the State comes into direct relationship with persons who are in actual occupation of agricultural lands or house-sites and buildings on such house-sites being parts of village sites. The proprietor as the receiver or collector of rent and as lambardar has been abolished under the Act. But that does not mean that he loses all his private rights and it would be clear from s. 4 that lands in his possession such as home-stead and home-farm lands and any claim of money before the date of vesting of the proprietary rights in the State are saved to him. That is the effect of s. 4(2) and (3) of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act. Section 5 also saves the outgoing proprietor certain rights including all open house-sites, buildings, places of worship, wells situated in and trees standing on lands included in such enclosures or house-sites or land appertaining to such buildings or places of worship within the limits of the village site, though he can hold these lands on such terms and conditions as may be determined by the State. The home-farm lands, therefore, which are in possession of the proprietor on the date of vesting still continue to belong to the proprietor, and if he claims exclusive title to the khudkashi lands which stand in his name and that claim of his is challenged by the other ex-proprietors, then that would be a question of title which will have to be decided by a civil Court as contemplated under s. 38 of the Act. As I have already pointed out, under sub-s. (2) of s. 38, if there are more persons having interest in the land held as sir or khudkashi immediately before the date of vesting, any such person may apply for a partition of his share in the land and the Revenue Officer may, subject to rules made by the State Government in this behalf divide the land and apportion the assessment. But, if a question of title is raised, no such partition shall be made unless that question is decided by a civil Court. In my opinion, therefore, the case relied upon by the lower appellate Court has no application to the facts of this case.

Mr. Mandlekar also relied upon a recent decision of the Nagpur High Court in *Rahmatullah Khan v. Mahabir Singh*¹ where the majority of the Judges held that the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act does not altogether eliminate the interest of the proprietor who has acquired the right to hold specific plots of land as owner of those plots, and a suit for possession of khudkasht land by the owner thereof is thus maintainable in spite of the Act. In this case, Chhote Khan's case was cited and was distinguished by Sinha C.J. who observed as follows (p. 988) :—

"To give effect to the argument raised on behalf of the appellant in this case would be to hold that if a proprietor has been wrongfully dispossessed of a part of the property being khudkasht, the defendant trespassing upon the property can claim to continue his trespass. A distinction has to be made between a suit brought by a proprietor in his character as such for possession of property which the law then in force authorized him to claim by a suit for the benefit of the entire body of proprietors and a suit based upon trespass upon his individual rights obtained by him irrespective of his character as such. In the instant case the plaintiff had purchased specific plots of khudkasht lands and would have continued in possession in spite of the enactment of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act but for the defendant's trespass. The aforesaid enactment does not govern such a suit. It only substitutes the State for the proprietor in respect of such lands as are not occupied lands. That legislation terminates the character of the landlord as such but does not deprive him of his rights to possess specific lands as his khudkasht or home-farm or his own abad site which he has appropriated to his personal use and occupation; in other words, the Act aforesaid abolishes the intermediaries between the State and the actual occupier of land for cultivation or residential purposes subsidiary to those purposes, but does not altogether eliminate the interest of the proprietor who has acquired the right to hold specific plots of land as owner of the property."

Hidayatullah J., however, differed from this view, and the matter was referred to Mr. Justice Mudholkar who agreed with the view of the learned Chief Justice. Mr. Bobde tried to distinguish this case on the ground that it was a case of khudkasht land which was not recorded as khudkasht in the revenue records because of an error on the part of the revenue officers and it was held by Mr. Justice Mudholkar that an erroneous recording of the khudkasht land as occupancy land would not in law alter the real character of that land, and despite the wrong entry the land must be regarded as having always been the khudkasht of the respondent, who was, therefore, entitled to maintain a suit in spite of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act against a person who had trespassed upon it. I am unable to accept the argument that this distinction would make the case inapplicable. In the present case, it is not disputed that the nature of the land in suit is khudkasht. What is contended is that the defendants in the two suits alone are the owners of these khudkasht lands. As I have already pointed, the lands were acquired by Moreswar in his capacity as the proprietor for the benefit of the proprietary body consisting of himself and his brother Gajanan, the present plaintiff. Gajanan may lose his right therein by adverse possession or in any other manner, but the provisions of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act can have no effect on Gajanan's rights if those rights continued till the date of vesting.

Mr. Bobde then drew my attention to an unreported decision of this Court in Zamasao v. Hirralal.² That case again is distinguishable because the lands in that case were not recorded as khudkasht in the jamabandi or the khasra of the year 1948-49 and the suit was brought by the plaintiffs in that case to enforce their right to these lands in accordance with the shares and it was held that the plaintiffs' case did not fall under sub-s. (2) of s. 4 of the Act. Then reliance was placed on *Mahadeo v. Yamunabai*³, in which Mr. Justice Choudhury held that the plaintiffs' right to claim a share in the khudkasht lands in suit was not maintainable as the character of the plaintiffs as proprietors of the village had been lost under the M.P. Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, and in taking this view Mr. Justice Choudhary relied upon the decision of the Nagpur High Court in Chhote Khan v. Mohammad Obedullah Khan to which I have already made a reference. It is true that this case is in favour of Mr. Bobde's contention; but it appears that Mr. Justice Choudhary, with respect, relied upon the authority of Chhote Khan's case which has been subsequently explained and distinguished in a later decision of the Nagpur High Court in Rahmatullah Khan v. Mahabirsingh to which I have already referred and which is against Mr. Bobde's contention. As I have already observed the facts in Chhote Khan's case are distinguishable from the facts of the instant case. In the present case, the plaintiff does not claim a half share in the suit lands in his capacity as the proprietor of the two villages, because the rights of proprietorship which vested in Waman, Shridhar and the plaintiff had already ceased to have any existence because of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act. Waman and Shridhar claim the suit lands as their exclusive home-farm lands and they claim to retain possession of these lands by virtue of the provisions of s. 4(2) of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act. That claim of theirs is challenged by the plaintiff, who says that he has 0/8/0 share in these lands, these lands having been originally acquired for the whole body of the proprietors. The question of title, therefore, arises and that must be decided by the civil Court as contemplated under s. 38 of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act. The result is that the only ground on which the lower appellate Court non-suited the plaintiff must be held to be erroneous in law.

But Mr. Bobde further contends that he was entitled to support the decree of the lower appellate Court on the ground that assuming that the plaintiff had a title to these lands, the same was extinguished because of ouster on the part of the defendants for the statutory period. In this connection, Mr. Bobde has drawn my attention to the fact that so far as field No. 17 is concerned, which is the subject-matter of Second Appeal No. 50 of 1955, that was obtained by Moreswar by pre-emption in January 1936 and that was an absolute occupancy land and Mr. Bobde points out that the period of limitation in the case of this land would be three years by virtue of art. 1 of the Second Schedule to the C. P. Tenancy Act. But Mr. Mandlekar contends that after Moreswar acquired this land, it became the khudkasht land of the proprietor and, therefore, ceased to be an absolute occupancy land. But there can be no dispute that so far as the other lands are concerned, the period of limitation would be 12 years from the date of exclusion. Now, Mr. Bobde argues that the lower appellate Court which delivered one judgment disposing of both the appeals has really mixed up the questions of estoppel and adverse possession and has not considered the documentary as well as the oral evidence on the record separately. That grievance seems to be well-founded. In this connection, he has pointed out that the plaintiff, Gajanan, had, in execution of his decree against Moreswar, actually attached field No. 17 of Nandora as the property belonging to Waman and Moreswar and that attachment was objected to by Waman and Moreswar on the ground that a partition had taken place between Gajanan and themselves on June 8, 1936, and since then they were in possession of these fields in their own right. It is also clear from the finding of the trial Court in Civil Suit No. 63-A of 1952 that Moreswar had sold part of the khari lands in suit, namely, fields Nos. 84/1 and 84/8 to Shrawan, Shiva and Mahadeo in 1938, and Mr. Bobde also points out that in the partition suit filed by Shridhar against his father Moreswar and Waman, the present plaintiff actually helped Shridhar and that suit resulted in a compromise, under which the suit lands at Tuljapur which are the subject-matter of Civil Suit No. 63-A of 1952 fell to the share of Shridhar and the suit lands at Nandora which are the subject-matter of Civil Suit No. 62-A of 1952 fell to the share of Waman, and Mr. Bobde contends that in view of the fact that the plaintiff took active part on the side of Shridhar in negotiating this compromise, he knew that these fields had fallen to the share of these two brothers as their exclusive property. Mr. Bobde argues that the lower appellate Court has not given a clear finding on the question of ouster, and I would, therefore, be entitled to interfere, in second appeal, with that decision. At any rate, Mr. Bobde contends that so far as field No. 17 is concerned, Waman claimed it as his own when Moreswar and he raised an objection to the plaintiff's attachment as evidenced by exhs. D-8 and D-9. Mr. Bobde also says that so far, at any rate, as khari lands at Tuljapur, fields Nos. 84/1 and 84/8, are concerned, since they were sold by Waman in 1938, adverse possession would commence from that time, and Mr. Bobde contends that I should remand the case to the lower appellate Court for arriving at a clear finding on the question of ouster and for disposing of the suits in accordance with law. There is considerable force in Mr. Bobde's arguments.

Mr. Mandlekar, on the other hand, contends firstly that Mr. Bobde is not entitled to support the decree of the lower appellate Court on the ground that the plaintiff's claim is barred by limitation because that finding is in favour of the plaintiff and no cross-objections have been filed by the respondents. This contention of Mr. Mandlekar is clearly against the provisions of O. XLI, r. 22, of the Code of Civil Procedure, under which any respondent, though he may not have appealed from any part of the decree, may not only support the decree on any of the grounds decided against him in the Court below, but take any cross-objection to the decree which he could have taken by way of appeal; so that the respondent would be entitled to support the decree even on grounds which are decided against him in the Courts below. Mr. Mandlekar has relied, in this connection, upon Mahagu v. Narayan.¹ That case is clearly distinguishable because a part of the decree in that case was against the respondents who filed no cross-objections, and Mr. Justice Mudholkar held that the respondents were not entitled to challenge the finding of the Court below, they having not filed any cross-objections regarding that part of the decree which was against them. On the merits, Mr. Mandlekar supports Mr. Bobde's request that instead of deciding the matter here on evidence, the issue as to ouster and adverse possession should be dealt with by the lower appellate Court on the basis of the evidence on the record and that Court should also consider whether art. 1 of the Second Schedule to the C. P. Tenancy Act would apply in the case of field No. 17. Mr. Bobde has no objection to this being done.

Mr. Bobde also raised a new point of law in this appeal in support of the decree of the lower Courts and his contention was that the plaintiff's suits for partition and separate possession of his shares were incompetent by virtue of s. 38 of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act. According to Mr. Bobde, under s. 38(2), if there are more persons than one having interest in land held as khudkashi, and one of them wants partition, he has to apply for partition of his share to the revenue authorities, and according to Mr. Bobde, by virtue of the provisions of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, the civil Court would have no jurisdiction to entertain suits for partition and separate possession of khudkashi lands. I have allowed Mr. Bobde to raise this point because it is a pure point of law. But there does not seem to me to be any substance in that contention. As I have already pointed out, if any person claims exclusive ownership with regard to khudkashi lands, which is challenged by another claiming interest in those lands, a question of title is raised and that question can only be decided by a civil Court by virtue of the explanation to the proviso to s. 38(2). It appears that before the coming into operation of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, the plaintiff had, as a matter of fact, filed proceedings before the revenue authorities for partition of his share in the proprietary rights of the two villages as well as partition of these khudkashi lands. But these proceedings, which were proceedings for imperfect partition under Chapter II of the C. P. Land Revenue Act were dropped and ordered to be filed when the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act came into force. The civil Court, therefore, would be competent to decide the question of title as between the plaintiff and the defendants, but as regards the actual partition of the land, the plaintiff will have to approach the revenue authorities as contemplated under s. 38(2), just as in the case of revenue-paying lands under O. XX, r. 18(1), of the Civil Procedure Code.

The result is that I hold that the plaintiff would be entitled to 0/8/0 share in the suit lands subject to the decision of the question of limitation which I propose to remit to the lower appellate Court. I, therefore, allow both these appeals, set aside the decrees of the lower appellate Court and remand the cases to the lower appellate Court, with a direction that it will consider the evidence on the record and give a finding as to whether the plaintiff's title to the lands has been barred by adverse possession of the defendants and this will include the question as to whether in the case of field No. 17, art. 1 of the Second Schedule to the C. P. Tenancy Act will apply. These will be the only issues that will be open to the lower appellate Court to consider. After giving its finding, the lower appellate Court will dispose of the appeals in accordance with law in the light of this judgment. As the plaintiff has only partially succeeded in this appeal, there will be no order as to costs in these two appeals. Costs of both the lower Courts will be decided by the lower appellate Court. As these two suits were filed in 1952, I direct the lower appellate Court to dispose of these appeals as expeditiously as possible. The records should be sent down immediately.

Appeals allowed.

VISHVANATH KRISHNA GOKHALE v. MAHADEO ARJUN KOKATE.*

Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Secs. 144, 120—Suit by purchaser for possession of undivided interest of separated member of joint Hindu family in property kept joint at partition—Whether such suit governed by art. 120 or 144—Such suit whether must be filed within twelve years from date of purchase or within twelve years on which purchaser's title denied.

Article 144 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, applies to a suit for possession by the purchaser of the undivided interest of a separated member of a joint Hindu family in property, which was kept joint at the time of the partition or when members of the joint family separated from each other. The purchaser must file his suit for possession within twelve years from the date on which his title is actually denied.

If a person purchases the share of a separated member in property, which was not actually partitioned but which continues to be held jointly by the separated members of the family, by his purchase, such a person acquires all the rights of his vendor, including his right as a co-owner to joint possession of the property jointly held and also his right to obtain by partition separate possession of his share in that property.

CHAINANI J. These three second appeals have been referred to a Division Bench by Mr. Justice Shah, as in his opinion they involved a question as to the interpretation of arts. 120 and 144 of the Indian Limitation Act. Appeal No. 1490 of 1955 arises out of Suit No. 302 of 1949 filed by Mahadeo Arjun Kokate, to whom I will hereafter refer as the plaintiff. There are six defendants in this suit, who belong to the Gokhale family. Defendant No. 1 Vishwanath had three brothers Kashinath, Ganesh and Parsram. Defendants Nos. 2 and 3 are the sons of Kashinath. Defendant No. 4 Ganesh died during the pendency of the suit and his son Anant has been brought on record in his place. Defendant No. 6 is the widow of Parsram, while defendant No. 5 is Parsram's grandson. The defendants' family and their Bhaubhands jointly owned several properties, in which they had one-fourth share. The defendants' bhaubhands sold their 12 annas share to Limayes prior to 1913. In 1903 defendant No. 1 and his brothers separated from each other. In 1913 Limayes filed a suit for partition of their 12 annas share and obtained a decree. On November 8, 1913, Kashinath, who had a $\frac{1}{4}$ th share in the properties belonging to the Gokhale family, sold his share to Bapuji Vasudeo Lele. In 1937 Limayes filed Suit No. 804 of 1937 against the defendants for partition and separate possession of some properties in which they had twelve annas share. Lele was made a party to that suit. He also claimed partition and possession of the share in the properties purchased by him. His claim was denied by the defendants, who contended that the transaction in his favour was a sham and bogus one. No relief was granted to Lele in this suit. Sometime thereafter, Lele leased four pieces of the suit lands, Hissa Nos. 1, 3, 7 and 10 of Survey No. 132, to one Moru Dhondu Jathar and one other land Survey No. 105/1 to Antu Dhondu Gurav. On January 8, 1948, Lele sold the properties purchased by him from Kashinath to the plaintiff Kokate. The plaintiff then obtained possession of the properties. Defendant No. 1 then filed Suit No. 180 of 1948 under s. 9 of the Specific Relief Act and obtained possession of the properties in execution of the decree passed in that suit. Thereafter the plaintiff filed Suit No. 302 of 1949, out of which appeal No. 1490 arises, for partition and separate possession of his $\frac{1}{4}$ th share in the suit lands. The defendants resisted the suit on various grounds. Their principal contentions were that Lele had not acquired any title to or interest in the suit lands, as the transaction between him and Kashinath was a hollow and sham one, not intended to be acted upon, and that the suit was barred by limitation. The trial Court held that the plaintiff had failed to prove his or his predecessor Lele's title to the suit properties, and also their possession within twelve years before the suit. The suit was, therefore, dismissed. The plaintiff appealed to the District Court. The learned District Judge held that the defendants were not entitled to challenge the plaintiff's title to the properties and that the plaintiff was entitled to a partition thereof. It was urged before him that the suit was barred by limitation under art. 120 of the Limitation Act. The learned District Judge, however, held that art. 144 and not art. 120 applied to the suit. He also held that, as the plaintiff had filed the suit within twelve years from the date on which defendants Nos. 2 and 3 had filed their written statement in Suit No. 304 of 1937 denying the plaintiff's title, the suit was in time. He, therefore, allowed the appeal filed by the plaintiff and passed a decree in his favour. Against this decree appeal No. 1490 of 1955 has been filed by defendants Nos. 1 and 3.

After defendant No. 1 obtained possession of the properties in execution of the decree passed in his favour in Suit No. 180 of 1948, Jathar and Gurav made applications to the Mamlatdar under s. 29 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act for obtaining possession of the lands. In these applications they contended that they were the tenants of the lands. Their contentions were accepted by the Mamlatdar, and in appeal by the Collector. The Bombay Revenue Tribunal dismissed the revision applications filed by defendant No. 1. Thereafter defendant No. 1 filed Suit No. 146 of 1950 against Jathar, the plaintiff Mahadev Kokate and his brother for obtaining possession of the four lands, of which Jathar had taken possession. He filed another Suit No. 147 of 1950 against Gurav, Mahadev Kokate and Krishna Kokate. He succeeded in both these suits and obtained decrees for possession of the five lands leased to Jathar and Gurav. The appeals filed by Jathar, Gurav, and Kokate to the District Court were dismissed. Against the orders passed by the District Court, Jathar and Mahadev Kokate have filed second appeal No. 1099 of 1955, while Gurav and Kokate have filed second appeal No. 1100 of 1955.

In appeal No. 1490 of 1955, the only question, which has been urged by Mr. Kotwal on behalf of the appellants, is that the suit was barred by limitation. He has contended that the article of limitation applicable to the suit is art. 120 and not art. 144. In support of his argument he has relied on Bai Shevantibai v. Janardan Warick, *Janardan Warick v. Bai Shevantibai*¹. In that case it was held that under Hindu law a purchaser from a member of a joint family does not acquire a right to be considered himself a member of the joint family in place of the vendor, or a right to have joint possession of the family property in place of the vendor or even a right to possession of any specific part of the property, that being a right which the vendor himself did not possess and that the only right which the purchaser has in such a case is a right to sue for partition and ask for being allotted to himself the share which would have gone to his vendor. It was also observed that as the purchaser from a co-parcener is not entitled to joint possession of the family property, he cannot rely on the ordinary rule that the possession of one co-tenant is the possession of all. Article 144 applies to a suit for possession of immoveable property and the period of limitation runs from the date when the possession of the defendant becomes adverse to the plaintiff. If, however, the plaintiff is not entitled to possession, the possession of the other person cannot become adverse to him, because as observed by Beaumont C.J., adverse possession denotes exclusion of somebody entitled to possession. A purchaser of an undivided interest of a coparcener in the joint family property cannot, as of right, claim joint possession of the property or separate possession of the portion representing the undivided share of his vendor in the property. By his purchase he acquires a right to partition and not a right to possession prior to partition. Consequently, it was held in Bai Shevantibai v. Janardan Warick, that art. 144 does not apply to a suit for partition and possession brought by a purchaser of an undivided interest of a coparcener in the joint family property and that the article applicable is the residuary art. 120. An alienation by a coparcener does not put an end to the coparcenary, whether he alienates the whole or part of his interest in the family property and he continues to be a member of the joint family with rights of survivorship between himself and other coparceners in respect of all the family property; see para. 389 in Mayne's Hindu Law and Usage, 11th edition. The position is, however, different when the coparcenary has come to an end. The above decision will not, therefore, apply where the members of the joint family have separated and where the joint family has ceased to exist. After separation, the separated members hold the properties, not actually divided, not as joint tenants, but as tenants-in-common, that is, as co-owners. The rule about the exclusion of the purchaser of an undivided portion of the joint family property from possession of the property will not apply in such cases, for there is no longer any joint family or joint family property. If, therefore, a person purchases the share of a separated member in property, which was not actually partitioned but which continues to be held jointly by the separated members of the family, his rights will be governed by the ordinary law.

By his purchase, he acquires all the rights of his vendor, including his right as a co-owner to joint possession of the property jointly held and also his right to obtain by partition separate possession of his share in that property. A suit for possession by a co-owner, who is not in possession, against the other co-owners, who are actually in possession is governed by art. 144 of the Limitation Act. There being a specific article applicable to such a suit, the residuary art. 120 will not apply. This art. 144 will, therefore, apply to a suit for possession by the purchaser of the undivided interest of a separated member of the family in property, which was kept joint at the time of the partition or when members of the joint family separated from each other.

In this case defendant No. 1 has admitted in his evidence that he and his brothers had separated in 1908. Kashinath sold his share to Lele many years thereafter in 1913. Article 144 and not art. 120 will, therefore, apply to the present suit.

Under art. 144 the period of limitation begins to run when the possession of the defendant becomes adverse to that of the plaintiff. Mr. Kotwal has urged that the rule that possession of one co-owner must be deemed to be the possession of all the co-owners does not apply in the case of a purchaser from a co-owner and that the purchaser of the share of a co-owner must file a suit for possession within twelve years from the date of his purchase and not within twelve years from the date on which his title is actually denied. He has relied on the decision of a single Judge of the Lahore High Court in Udi v. Maru Mal.¹ It was held in that case that a transferee cannot by the mere fact of transfer become a co-owner, if his rights as such are denied by the other co-sharers and a suit by him, therefore, for possession against his transferor's co-sharers must be brought within twelve years from date of transfer. The judgment in that case does not give all the facts, for, it is not clear when the right of the purchaser had been denied. In *Sobah Lal v. Fateh Muhammad*² it has been observed:

"As regards co-owners the law is that there can be no adverse possession by one co-owner unless there has been a denial of title and an ouster to the knowledge of the others; and the same principle applies to the case of a transferee from a co-owner... There can be no difference in principle whether a person is the original co-owner or has become a co-owner by virtue of a transfer."

With respect, we agree with these observations. By his purchase of Kashinath's undivided interest, Lele became a co-owner along with Kashinath's brothers. The possession of the properties by the defendants thereafter was the possession on behalf of all the co-owners, including Lele and subsequently his transferee, the plaintiff. Their possession became adverse when Lele's title was denied by the defendants in the written statement filed by them in Suit No. 304 of 1937.

Mr. Kotwal has also contended that as neither the plaintiff nor Lele had received any part of the income realised from the lands since Lele purchased Kashinath's share, there was an ouster and that consequently the defendants have acquired title to the lands by adverse possession. This argument cannot be accepted. As held in Nargisbai Acidwala v. Jehangir Mody,³ in the case of joint property, mere exclusive possession and enjoyment by one co-owner is not enough to constitute adverse possession against the other co-owners, unless there is a denial of title justifying a presumption of ouster of the latter. In P. Lakshmi Reddy v. L. Lakshmi Reddy,⁴ it has been observed (p. 202):

"...But it is well-settled that in order to establish adverse possession of one co-heir as against another it is not enough to show that one out of them is in sole possession and enjoyment of the profits of the properties. Ouster of the non-possessing co-heir by the co-heir in possession, who claims his possession to be adverse, should be made out. The possession of one co-heir is considered, in law, as possession of all the co-heirs. When one co-heir is found to be in possession of the properties it is presumed to be on the basis of joint title. The co-heir in possession cannot render his possession adverse to the other co-heir not in possession merely by any secret hostile animus on his own part in derogation of the other co-heir's title... It is a settled rule of law that as between co-heirs there must be evidence of open assertion of hostile title, coupled with exclusive possession and enjoyment by one of them to the knowledge of the other so as to constitute ouster."

Mere possession and enjoyment of the profits of the suit lands for a long period by the defendants will not, therefore constitute ouster. There was in this case no denial of the title of Lele until defendants Nos. 2 and 3 filed their written statement in suit No. 304 of 1937. The defendants' adverse possession, therefore, commenced on the date on which this written statement was filed. The suit has been filed within 12 years from this date and is, therefore, in time.

Appeal No. 1490 of 1955, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs.

In the other two appeals, the only point, which has been urged by Mr. Albal on behalf of the appellants, is that a direction may be given that while making a partition of the suit lands, the five pieces of lands Hissa Nos. 1, 3, 7 and 10 of Survey No. 132 and Survey No. 105/1, which had been leased to Jathar and Gurav, may, as far as possible, be allotted to the share of Kokate. Mr. Kotwal, who appears on behalf of the contesting respondents in these appeals, has no objection to such a direction being given. Accordingly, in these appeals we direct that while effecting a partition of the lands in Suit No. 302 of 1949, these five lands should, if possible, be allotted to the share of the plaintiff Mahadev Arjun Kokate in that suit. Subject to this direction, these two appeals are dismissed with costs.

Appeals dismissed.

BALGONDA APPANNA PATIL v. BHIMGONDA APPAYA PATIL.*

Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act (LXXVIII of 1956), Secs. 4, 30, 12—Plaintiff's adoption made in former Kolhapur State before coming into force of Act—Vat Hukum passed by Kolhapur State providing for ex post facto sanction to adoptions—State Government according ex post facto sanction to plaintiff's adoption after coming into force of Act—Competency of State Government to accord such sanction.

The plaintiff's adoption took place in 1900 in the former Kolhapur State. In a Vat Hukum passed by the Kolhapur Government in connection with adoptions there was a provision under which the Kolhapur Darbar could accord ex post facto sanction to adoptions which affected Inam properties and which were made without getting the sanction of the Kolhapur Darbar. The Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act, 1956, came into force on December 21, 1956, and on June 26, 1957, the State Government accorded ex post facto sanction to the plaintiff's adoption. On the question whether the State Government on the date that the sanction was given was competent to accord that sanction by virtue of the provisions of s. 4 of the Act:—

Held, that as the adoption of the plaintiff took place long before the Act came into force, under s. 30 of the Act none of the provisions of the Act could affect that adoption, that under the Kolhapur Vat Hukum the giving of ex post facto sanctions to adoptions was contemplated and such sanctions have been held to be valid sanctions by the High Court, and that the State Government continued to have the power of according ex post facto sanctions to adoptions which had taken place prior to December 21, 1956, and, therefore, the State Government was competent to accord sanction to the plaintiff's adoption.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

*Decided, August 30, 1958. First Appeal No. 118 of 1958, against the decision of D. G.

Rajadhyaksha, Civil Judge, S. D., Kolhapur, in Special Civil Suit No. 325 of 1945-52.

R. G. Samant, for the appellants.

S. B. Bhasme for B. M. Kalagate, for respondent No. 1.

GOKHALE J. In this appeal, Mr. Justice Shah and myself had, on the application of the appellants, heirs of original plaintiff, sent down an issue as to whether the adoption of the plaintiff had been duly sanctioned by a competent authority. The adoption of the plaintiff took place in 1900 and the trial Court has recorded a finding that Government have accorded ex post facto sanction to plaintiff's adoption and the same is valid. Some objections were raised before the trial Court as to the procedure followed in obtaining this sanction from Government. Those objections were negatived and Mr. Bhasme, learned advocate appearing on behalf of respondent No. 1, has not raised these objections before us.

But Mr. Bhasme has raised an interesting point of law as to whether the State Government was competent to accord ex post facto sanction to plaintiff's adoption in view of the provisions of the Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act, 1956. Though this point was not taken before us before we sent down the case for a finding and though the point was also not raised before the trial Court, we have allowed Mr. Bhasme to argue the point as it is a pure point of law. Mr. Bhasme's contention is that the Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act, 1956, which will hereafter be called as the Adoptions Act, came into force on December 21, 1956. The sanction was given by Government on June 26, 1957. But Mr. Bhasme contends that on the date that the sanction was given Government were incompetent to accord that sanction by virtue of the provisions of s. 4 of the Act.

In order to examine Mr. Bhasme's argument, we shall have to refer to the position of adoptions in the former Kolhapur State. Plaintiff's adoption took place in 1900 and the Digest of Hindu Law in the Kolhapur State came into force in 1919, but that part of it which deals with adoptions by Hindus, known as Hindu Dattak Nibandh, came into force on November 11, 1920. Section 2(3) of this Nibandh saved the effect of the Vat Hukums passed by the Kolhapur Government in connection with adoptions. Under Political Agent Judi Niyam of Fasli 1281, published in Volume 2 of the Kolhapur Vat Hukums, at p. 817, there was a provision under which the Kolhapur Darbar could accord sanction to adoptions which affected Inam properties. It appears from this Vat Hukum that the Kolhapur Government had power to accord ex post facto sanction to adoptions which were made without getting such a sanction. Then there is Sarsubhe Vat No. 18 of 1907 which dealt with the procedure which was to be followed in order to get the sanction of the Kolhapur Government in such matters. There are other Vat Hukums also to which Mr. Bhasme drew our attention in this connection, but it is not necessary to refer to them for the purpose of this case. Mr. Bhasme argues that as a result of s. 4 of the Adoptions Act, the Digest of Hindu Law at Kolhapur as well as the Vat Hukums dealing with adoptions were repealed, and Mr. Bhasme contends that, if that be so, the Government had no power to accord ex post facto sanction to the present adoption on June 26, 1957.

Now, s. 4 of the Adoptions Act runs as follows:—

"Save as otherwise expressly provided in this Act,—

(a) any text, rule or interpretation of Hindu Law or any custom or usage as part of that law in force immediately before the commencement of this Act shall cease to have effect with respect to any matter for which provision is made in this Act;

(b) any other law in force immediately before the commencement of this Act shall cease to apply to Hindus in so far as it is inconsistent with any of the provisions contained in this Act."

Mr. Bhasme contends that this section has a wider repealing power than s. 29 of the Adoptions Act which repeals the Hindu Married Women's Right to Separate Residence and Maintenance Act, 1946, (XIX of 1946), and sub-s. (2) of s. 30 of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, (XXX of 1956). Under s. 4(a), according to Mr. Bhasme, all textual law, rules or interpretations of Hindu law or any custom or usage as part of that law which dealt with adoptions stand repealed, and the contention, therefore, is that on the date that Government gave ex post facto sanction on June 26, 1957, the Vat Hukums under which the sanction could be given had no longer any force. Then Mr. Bhasme further contends that even assuming that the relevant Vat Hukums do not fall under s. 4(a), they would fall under s. 4(b) and under that clause in so far as they are inconsistent with any other provisions contained in the Adoptions Act they will cease to apply to Hindus. In this connection, Mr. Bhasme refers us to the provisions of s. 12 of the Act which deals with the effects of adoptions. Under s. 12 an adopted child is to be deemed to be the child of his or her adoptive father or mother for all purposes with effect from the date of the adoption and from such date all the ties of the child in the family of his or her birth shall be deemed to be severed and replaced by those created by the adoption in the adoptive family. Under proviso (c) to this section, the adopted child shall not divest any person of any estate which vested in him or her before the adoption. Mr. Bhasme's argument is that since the ex post facto sanction given by Government would enable plaintiff to divest the defendant of the suit properties which are admittedly Patilki Inam properties, the provisions of the Vat Hukums are inconsistent with proviso (c) to s. 12 of the Adoptions Act and therefore would not have any force. The argument of Mr. Bhasme is undoubtedly ingenious. But, in our opinion, in view of s. 30 of the Adoptions Act, that argument cannot be accepted so far as the present adoption is concerned. Under s. 30,

"Nothing contained in the Act shall affect any adoption made before the commencement of this Act and the validity and effect of any such adoption shall be determined as if this Act had not been passed."

Now, admittedly, the adoption of the plaintiff took place in 1900. The effect of that adoption would have been that plaintiff would be entitled to succeed even to Inam property, provided the requisite sanction of the Government was obtained. Under the Kolhapur Vat Hukums, the giving of ex post facto sanctions to adoptions was contemplated. This Court has in a number of decisions taken the view that sanction accorded ex post facto would be a valid sanction. As the adoption of the plaintiff took place long before this Act came into force, none of the provisions of this Act would affect that adoption and the validity and effect of such an adoption has to be determined as if the Adoptions Act had not been passed. In our view, therefore, Government would continue to have the power of according ex post facto sanction to adoptions which have taken place prior to December 21, 1956. The contention of Mr. Bhasme that ex post facto sanction to the present adoption could not be given after the coming into force of the Act must, therefore, be rejected. In that view of the matter, it is not necessary for us to consider whether the Kolhapur Vat Hukums which deal with according of sanctions to adoptions are in any way inconsistent with this Act and will cease to apply under s. 4 of the Act.

The result is that the finding of the learned trial Judge that the adoption of the plaintiff has been duly sanctioned by a competent authority must be upheld and we must also hold that the sanction given is a valid sanction. As the plaintiff's suit was dismissed by the trial Court on the ground that his adoption was invalid, being without sanction, we must allow this appeal, set aside the decree of the trial Court and award plaintiff possession of the five suit lands from the defendants. There will be an inquiry into future mesne profits from the date of the suit till delivery of possession, under O. XX, r. 12, of the Civil Procedure Code.

As regards plaintiff's prayer in para. (i) of the prayer clause in the plaint regarding substitution of his name in the record-of-rights, the plaintiff will have, of course, to approach the authorities concerned.

The plaintiff will be entitled to his costs throughout.

Order accordingly.

MANILAL DHANJI v. THE COMMISSIONER OF INCOME-TAX, BOMBAY CITY I, BOMBAY.*

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Secs. 16(3)(b), 41—Assessee creating trust-deed setting aside amount, and deed providing for adding interest to corpus and his minor daughter to start receiving interest from such augmented corpus on attaining age of eighteen years in 1959—Income derived from trust fund in assessment year 1954-55 whether could be included in assessee's income under s. 16(3)(b)—Trust-deed requiring trustees to pay certain amount to assessee and by the same deed assessee holding amount for his and his wife's and children's maintenance—Whether such amount received by assessee could be included in his total income.

To attract the provisions of s. 16(3)(b) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, an income or benefit must be received or derived by the wife or the minor in the year of account. What is sought to be taxed under the section is not a non-existent income but an existing income which is received by someone other than the assessee. Therefore, under this section an assessee can only be taxed on the income from a trust-deed created by him for the benefit of the minor provided in the year of account the income is either received by the minor or the benefit is derived by the minor under the trust-deed.

By a trust-deed dated January 12, 1953, the assessee set aside a certain amount, and the deed provided that the interest on that amount should be accumulated and added to the corpus and his minor daughter was to receive the income from the corpus increased by the addition of interest when she attained the age of eighteen years on February 1, 1959. She was then to receive the income during her lifetime, and after her, the corpus was to go to other persons. In computing the total income of the assessee for the assessment year 1954-55 the Income-tax Officer included a sum of Rs. 410 which amount represented the income derived in the year of account from the trust fund. On the question whether the sum of Rs. 410 could be so included in the assessee's total income under s. 16(3)(b) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922:—

Held, that under s. 16(3)(b) of the Act the assessee cannot be assessed to Rs. 410 which amount was not received by his minor daughter and in respect of which his daughter could not claim any benefit in the year of account.

Under a trust-deed created by the assessee's father the trustees were to hold the trust funds upon trust to pay the net interest and income thereof to the assessee for the maintenance of himself and his wife and for the maintenance, education and benefit of all his children till his death. The assessee received a certain amount under the trust-deed and the Income-tax Officer under s. 41(2) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, included this amount in the total income of the assessee for the relevant assessment year. On the question whether this amount could be properly included in the income of the assessee:—

Held, that under the terms of the trust-deed the assessee was not the sole beneficiary and the amount was received by him in the capacity of a trustee, and that the assessee could, therefore, be assessed under s. 41(1) of the Act, and the amount received by him under the trust-deed could not be added to his total income.

On January 12, 1953, one Manilal Dhanji (assessee) made a trust in respect of a sum of Rs. 25,000 and appointed himself and others the trustees of the trust settlement. Clause 3 of this settlement was to the following effect:—

"The Trustees shall hold and stand possessed of the Trust Fund and investments for the time being representing the same and receive the income, dividend, interest and rents thereof and invest the same and the resulting income, dividend, interest and rents thereof so as to accumulate at compound interest to the intent that such accumulations shall be added to the principal Trust Fund until the Settlor's daughter CHANDRIKA shall attain the age of eighteen years which age she will attain on February 1, 1959, and after the expiration of the abovementioned period the Trustees shall deal with and dispose of the Trust Fund as hereafter stated."

*Decided, September 25, 1958. Income-tax Reference No. 3 of 1958.

Clause 4 provided that the trustees

"shall hold and stand possessed of the Trust Fund and the accumulations thereof upon Trust to pay the net interest and income thereof after deducting all outgoings and charges for collection to the said Chandrika for her life for her maintenance."

In computing the total income of the assessee for the assessment year 1954-55, the Income-tax Officer under s. 16(3)(b) and/or s. 16(3)(a)(iv) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, included a sum of Rs. 410, which amount represented the income derived in the year of account from the aforesaid trust fund. The assessee contended that the income of Rs. 410 was not the income of the minor daughter Chandrika in the year of account, that there was a trust for accumulation of income till she attained the age of eighteen on February 1, 1959, and till that date it was the income of the trustees and, therefore, s. 16(3) did not apply to the income of Rs. 410. The Appellate Tribunal held that the income of Rs. 410 fell within s. 16(3)(b). The following question of law was referred to the High Court:—

"1. Whether the sum of Rs. 410 is properly includible in the assessee's total income either in accordance with the provisions of s. 16(3)(b) and/or s. 16(3)(a)(iv) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922?"

On December 1, 1941, the assessee's father, Dhanji Devsi, created a trust for the benefit of his four sons. The trust property consisted of certain shares and cash amount of Rs. 30,000. According to cl. 3 of the trust settlement the income arising from the said corpus was to be accumulated for the benefit of the assessee till December 31, 1947, and thereafter under cl. 7

"The Trustees shall hold and stand possessed of the Trust Fund mentioned in the Second Schedule hereto and the accumulations thereof referred to in cl. 3 hereof upon trust to pay the net interest and income thereof to the Settlor's son MANILAL for the maintenance of himself, his wife and for the maintenance, education and benefit of all his children till his death."

The Income-tax Officer for the relevant assessment year included a sum of Rs. 14,170 which arose from the aforesaid trust in the total income of the assessee. The assessee contended that this amount could not be included in his total income as the beneficiaries under the trust settlement were not only the assessee, but the assessee, his wife and all his children. This contention was rejected by the Tribunal.

The following question of law was referred to the High Court:—

"2. Whether the sum of Rs. 14,170 is properly includible in the total income of the assessee as the sole beneficiary thereof under the trust settlement made on 1-12-1941 by Dhanji Devsi?"

The reference was heard.

N. A. Palkhivala, for the applicant.

G. N. Joshi, for the respondent.

CHAGLA C.J. Two questions arise on this reference. There are hardly any matters under the Income-tax Act which have not been considered by some High Court or other. The first question that we have to consider, however, has not been judicially considered at all and therefore we must decide it on first impression by construing the section and on principle.

The first question is concerned with an amount of Rs. 410 which was included in the total income of Manilal Dhanji, the assessee. This amount he received admittedly as a trustee, but the beneficiary is his minor daughter Chandrika, and the contention of the Department was that the case fell under s. 16(3)(b). Now, the scheme of the trust-deed is that a sum of Rs. 25,000 was set aside by the assessee and it was provided that the interest on that amount should be accumulated and should be added to the corpus and Chandrika, the daughter, was to receive the income from the corpus increased by the addition of interest when she attained the age of 18 years. She was then to receive the income during her lifetime and after her the corpus was to go to persons with whom we are not concerned. Therefore, the significant feature of this trust-deed is that Chandrika was not to receive any income, any interest, any benefit whatsoever from this trust-deed during her minority. When, therefore, the assessee received Rs. 410 as a trustee from the trust fund in the year of account, the minor had no right to this income. She had no beneficial interest in this income and she could not enjoy this income. The assessee received this amount for the specific purpose of adding it on to the corpus of the trust. On these facts the question is whether s. 16(3)(b) is attracted.

Before we look at s. 16(3)(b) we may look at the scheme of s. 16(3) itself as a whole. This sub-section deals with notional income. But as far as cl. (a) is concerned, it is clear that the income is notional in the sense that there is actual income but that actual income is received by the wife or the minor child of the assessee and the law considers that the income received by the wife or the child is the income of the husband or the father. Turning to s. 16(3)(a) it provides:

"(3) In computing the total income of any individual for the purpose of assessment, there shall be included—

(a) so much of the income of a wife or minor child of such individual as arises directly or indirectly—

(i) from the membership of the wife in a firm of which her husband is a partner;" Therefore, here the wife or the minor child must receive the actual income from the partnership.

"(ii) from the admission of the minor to the benefits of partnership in a firm of which such individual is a partner;"

Again, we are dealing with actual income.

"(iii) from assets transferred directly or indirectly to the wife by the husband otherwise than for adequate consideration or in connection with an agreement to live apart;"

Here too it is only the income actually received by the wife from the assets so transferred that would constitute a part of the total income of the husband.

"(iv) from assets transferred directly or indirectly to the minor child, not being a married daughter, by such individual otherwise than for adequate consideration;"

Here again, it is the actual income which the minor child derives from assets so transferred that would constitute a part of the total income of the assessee. Then we come to cl. (b). Having made these provisions in cl. (a) of s. 16(3) the Legislature was at pains to see that these provisions were not defeated by the assessee creating a trust and in order to deal with that mischief cl. (b) was enacted and it is in the following language—and we will only reproduce the material words:

"(b) so much of the income of any association of persons as arises from assets transferred otherwise than for adequate consideration to the association by such individual for the benefit of his wife or a minor child or both."

Analysing this sub-section it means that when you have an assessee, that is, an individual, transferring to trustees, that is, the association of persons, without adequate consideration, assets, and the transfer is for the benefit of the wife or the minor child or both of the assessee, then the income of the trustees will be considered to be the income of the assessee.

Now, the contention of Mr. Joshi is that in this case you have a transfer of assets to trustees, the transfer is admittedly for the benefit of the minor child, and once that condition is satisfied, you have not to look further and the income derived by the trustees from this transfer of assets constitutes part of the total income of the settlor. This raises a very important question. If we were to accept Mr. Joshi's contention, the result would be that however remote the benefit that the minor might derive under the trust-deed, however long his interest may be postponed, as soon as there is a transfer by the settlor under which the minor derives some benefit, the interest received from the trust property must be added on to the total income of the assessee. Mr. Joshi realises that such an extreme position would be untenable and therefore he is prepared to make certain qualifications, and the qualification he is prepared to make is that there must be no intermediary beneficiaries before the minor gets the benefit under the trust-deed. If there are intermediary beneficiaries, then s. 16(3)(b) would not be attracted. He further contends that if you have a trust-deed for the benefit of the minor alone, then there can be no question as to the application of s. 16(3). It is difficult to understand why on principle it is possible to have one limitation on this section and not the other. The limitation suggested by Mr. Joshi is the limitation of other beneficiaries being introduced in the trust-deed before the minor comes in for benefit. The limitation suggested by Mr. Palkhivala is a different type of limitation and that limitation is a limitation as to time, and the contention of Mr. Palkhivala is that the very object of the section and the scheme of the section requires that an assessee can only be taxed on the income from a trust-deed for the benefit of the minor provided in the year of account the income is either received by the minor or the benefit is derived by the minor under the trust-deed. If no income is received, if no benefit is derived, and there is no income at all, then it is difficult to accept the contention that the assessee can be liable to be taxed in respect of that amount.

If we are right in our original assumption that s. 16(3) deals with actual income received by a person other than the assessee, that person being his wife or his minor child, then the proper way to construe and interpret cl. (b) is also to accept the position under that sub-section that an income or benefit must be received or derived by the minor in the year of account. What is sought to be taxed is not a non-existent income. What is sought to be taxed is an existing income which is received by someone other than the assessee. In this case there is no dispute on the facts. It is not suggested and it cannot be suggested that the minor has no right to the sum of Rs. 410. It is not suggested that the assessee has received this amount for the benefit of the minor. The sum of Rs. 410 is impressed with a trust and that trust is that it should be added on to the corpus created under the trust-deed. It is difficult to understand how, therefore, it can be said that the assessee can be assessed to Rs. 410 which was never received by either his wife or his daughter and in respect of which neither his wife nor his daughter can claim any benefit. In our opinion, therefore, on a true construction of s. 16(3)(b) Rs. 410 does not form part of the total income of the assessee.

The second question is concerned with a sum of Rs. 14,170 and that was received by the assessee under the following circumstances. There is a trust-deed created by his father and under the relevant provision the trustees are to hold certain trust funds upon trust to pay the net interest and income thereof to the settlor's son Manilal for the maintenance of himself and his wife and for the maintenance, education and benefit of all his children till his death. The view taken by the Tribunal is that under this provision Manilal is the sole beneficiary and the amount is received by him for his own benefit, that he is not accountable to anyone in respect of this amount, and he can do what he likes with this amount. Before we come to the interesting argument advanced by Mr. Joshi, let us set at rest this particular question on which the decision of the Tribunal is based. It is perfectly clear that when you have a trust created to pay an amount to "X" for the maintenance of himself, his wife and for the maintenance, education and benefit of his children, the amount received by "X" is an amount impressed with a trust. A trust is created in favour of his wife and children and he is accountable for that amount as a trustee. The proposition is clearly stated in Lewin on Trusts at p. 85, 15th edition. Lewin distinguishes between the motive of a gift and a trust, and he points out that when a donor or a settlor gives a particular reason as the motive for making the gift, then the donee takes the gift beneficially and no trust is created. But Lewin points out that when there is a gift in favour of a person not only for his own use and benefit but also for the maintenance and education of his children or the maintenance of his wife, that does not constitute a motive for the gift but it creates a trust, and this is exactly the case here. The language used in the trust-deed might have been almost bodily taken from Lewin on Trusts and therefore we disagree, with respect to the Tribunal, when they took the view that under this provision Manilal was the only beneficiary.

Now, if that be the true position and if Manilal is a trustee, the question is whether the amount received by him under this trust-deed can be added on to his total income, and Mr. Joshi's contention is that under s. 41 it is competent to the Department either to tax trustees of the trust-deed or to tax those on whose behalf the trustees have received any amount, and the argument put forward is that this is a case where the trustees have received on behalf of Manilal the sum of Rs. 14,170. They have paid the amount to Manilal and therefore it is at the option of the Department either to assess the trustees under s. 41(1) or to assess the person who has received the amount under s. 41(2). Mr. Joshi rightly points out that s. 41(1) does not speak of a beneficiary, and according to him even if Manilal is not a beneficiary so long as he is the person on whose behalf the trustees have received the amount, the taxing department can go either against the trustees or against Manilal. Turning to s. 41(1), the words of that section, to the extent that they are material for the purpose of this argument, are:

"In the case of income, profits or gains chargeable under this Act, the trustee appointed under a trust declared by a duly executed instrument in writing, whether testamentary or otherwise, is entitled to receive on behalf of any person, the tax shall be levied upon and recoverable from the trustee in the like manner and to the same amount as it would be leviable upon and recoverable from the person on whose behalf such income, profits or gains are received and all the provisions of this Act shall apply."

Mr. Joshi says that the trustees of the trust-deed are entitled to receive this amount on behalf of Manilal and the tax can be levied upon and recovered from the trustees under this section. But, says Mr. Joshi, under sub-s. (2) the option is given to the Department to recover it from the person on whose behalf the trustees have received the amount and sub-s. (2) provides:

"Nothing contained in sub-section (1) shall prevent either the direct assessment of the person on whose behalf income, profits or gains therein referred to are receivable, or the recovery from such person of the tax payable in respect of such income, profits or gains."

Therefore, Mr. Joshi contends that in this case the Department has preferred to have a direct assessment of the person on whose behalf this amount has been received. The argument sounds very plausible, but when one examines it, it is clear that although it is perfectly competent to the Department to go against Manilal, Manilal in his turn is equally competent to contend that he is a trustee, and if he is to be taxed he can only be taxed as a trustee under s. 41(1). Under the proviso it is provided that where the individual shares of the persons on whose behalf the income is receivable are indeterminate, the tax shall be levied and recoverable at the maximum rate, and says Mr. Manilal, it is quite true that the shares of my wife and children are indeterminate and I am liable to be taxed at the maximum rate, but I can only be taxed as a trustee and not in my individual capacity. The answer given by Mr. Joshi to this contention is that we are not concerned with the second trust; we are only concerned with the first trust. We do not think it is seriously contended that two trusts cannot be created by the same instrument and the real position here is that there is a trust created which requires the trustees to pay a certain amount to Manilal and a second trust is created by which Manilal has to hold that amount in trust for his wife and children. Therefore, Manilal is a trustee within the meaning of s. 41 appointed under a trust declared by a duly executed instrument in writing, and if he is a trustee he has a right to contend that his assessment in respect of the money received by him not as a beneficiary but as a trustee can only be made under the provisions of s. 41. We fail to appreciate the argument of Mr. Joshi that we are not concerned with the second trust. In our opinion, that is the only trust with which we are concerned. If Manilal is sought to be taxed and if his contention is that he is a trustee, we must look at the document in order to find out whether he has been constituted a trustee. If he is constituted a trustee, then it is difficult to understand what provision of the law prevents him from contending that s. 41 applies to him as much as it would apply to the trustees of the first trust. In our opinion, therefore, the Tribunal was in error in coming to the conclusion which it did with regard to this amount basing its decision on the fact that Manilal was the sole beneficiary under the trust.

We should have mentioned that with regard to the amount of Rs. 410 the Tribunal seems to have proceeded on the basis that the daughter had a vested interest in the sum of Rs. 410. We do not accept that proposition at all. The interest does not vest in the daughter. It is contingent on her attaining majority, and it seems clear that even the tribunal has proceeded to decide against the assessee with regard to the sum of Rs. 410 on the supposition that the daughter had some interest in this sum of Rs. 410. As we have already pointed out, the daughter has no present interest whatever in this sum of Rs. 410.

The result is that we must answer question No. 1 in the negative and question No. 2 also in the negative.

RAM KRISHNA DALMIA v. MR. JUSTICE S. R. TENDOLKAR.*

Commissions of Enquiry Act (LX of 1952), Sec. 3—Constitution of India, Art. 14, Seventh Schedule, List I entry 94, List III entry 45—Meaning of expression "any definite matter of public importance" in s. 3(1) of Act—Whether conduct of individual person or company or group of individual persons could call for inquiry under Act—Nature of functions, performance of which contemplated by s. 3—Law with respect to inquiries for purpose of any matter in Lists I, II and III whether can cover any aspect of the matter and be for administrative purposes—Scope of inquiry under law made under entries 95 and 45 of Lists I and III respectively whether limited to future legislative purposes—Principles to be followed by Courts when constitutionality of law attacked as violating art. 14—Basis of permissible classification whether can be gathered from extraneous materials—Whether Court can deny existence of discretionary power conferred on Government on the bare possibility that such power may be misused or abused.

The expression "any definite matter of public importance" in s. 3(1) of the Commissions of Enquiry Act, 1952, does not mean only some matter involving the public benefit or advantage in the abstract, e.g. public health, sanitation or the like or some public evil or prejudice, e.g. floods, famine or pestilence or the like. The conduct of an individual person or company or a group of individual persons or companies may assume such a dangerous proportion and may so prejudicially affect or threaten to affect the public well-being as to make such conduct a definite matter of public importance urgently calling for a full inquiry under the Act.

The functions, the performance of which is contemplated by s. 3 of the Commissions of Enquiry Act, 1952, must be such as are ancillary to and in aid of the inquiry itself and cannot be read as a function independent of or unconnected with such inquiry.

Decided, March 28, 1958. Civil Appeals Nos. 455 to 457 and 656 to 658 of 1957.*

The law to be made by the appropriate Legislature with respect to entry 95 in List I and entry 45 in List III of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution of India may cover inquiries into any aspect of the matters enumerated in any of the lists mentioned therein and is not confined to those matters as mere heads of legislative topic. The law with respect to inquiries for the purpose of any of the matters in the lists may also be for administrative purposes and the scope of the inquiry under such a law will cover all matters which may properly be regarded as ancillary to such inquiries. The words "for the purposes of" in the aforesaid entries indicate that the scope of the inquiry is not necessarily limited to the particular or specific matters enumerated in any of the entries in the list concerned but may extend to inquiries into collateral matters which may be necessary for the purpose, legislative or otherwise, of those particular matters. Therefore the inquiry which may be set up by a law made under these two entries is, in its scope or ambit, not limited to future legislative purposes only.

The words "as and by way of securing redress or punishment" in the latter part of cl. (10) of notification No. S.R.O. 2993 dated December 11, 1958, issued by the Union of India under s. 3 of the Commissions of Enquiry Act, 1952, go outside the scope of the Act and such provision is not covered by the above two legislative entries and must, therefore, be deleted. The efficacy of the notification is in no way affected by the deletion of the offending words mentioned above.

The following principles must be constantly borne in mind by the Court when it is called upon to adjudge the constitutionality of any particular law attacked as discriminatory and violative of the equal protection of the laws:—

(a) that a law may be constitutional even though it relates to a single individual if, on account of some special circumstances or reasons applicable to him and not applicable to others, that single individual may be treated as a class by himself;

(b) that there is always a presumption in favour of the constitutionality of an enactment and the burden is upon him who attacks it to show that there has been a clear transgression of the constitutional principles;

(c) that it must be presumed that the Legislature understands and correctly appreciates the need of its own people, that its laws are directed to problems manifest by experience and that its discriminations are based on adequate grounds;

(d) that the Legislature is free to recognise degrees of harm and may confine its restrictions to those cases where the need is deemed to be clearest;

(e) that in order to sustain the presumption of constitutionality the Court may take into consideration matters of common knowledge, matters of common report, the history of the times and may assume every state of facts which can be conceived existing at the time of legislation; and

(f) that while good faith and knowledge of the existing conditions on the part of the Legislature are to be presumed, if there is nothing on the face of the law or the surrounding circumstances brought to the notice of the Court on which the classification may reasonably be regarded as based, the presumption of constitutionality cannot be carried to the extent of always holding that there must be some undisclosed and unknown reasons for subjecting certain individuals or corporations to hostile or discriminating legislation.

A statute which may come up for consideration on a question of its validity under art. 14 of the Constitution of India, may be placed in one or other of the following five classes:—

(1) A statute may itself indicate the persons or things to whom its provisions are intended to apply and the basis of the classification of such persons or things may appear on the face of the statute or may be gathered from the surrounding circumstances known to or brought to the notice of the Court. In determining the validity or otherwise of such a statute the Court has to examine whether such classification is or can be reasonably regarded as based upon some differentia which distinguishes such persons or things grouped together from those left out of the group and whether such differentia has a reasonable relation to the object sought to be achieved by the statute, no matter whether the provisions of the statute are intended to apply only to a particular person or thing or only to a certain class of persons or things.

Where the Court finds that the classification satisfies the tests, the Court will uphold the validity of the law, as it did in Chitranjilal Chowdhuri v. The Union of India,¹ The State of Bombay v. F. N. Balsara,² Kedar Nath Bajoria v. The State of West Bengal,³ *V. M. Syed Mohammad and Company v. The State of Andhra*⁴ and Budhan Choudhry v. The State of Bihar.⁵

(2) A statute may direct its provisions against one individual person or thing or to several individual persons or things, but no reasonable basis of classification may appear on the face of it or be deducible from the surrounding circumstances, or matters of common knowledge. In such a case the Court will strike down the law as an instance of naked discrimination, as it did in *Ameerunnissa Begum v. Mahboob Begum*⁶ and Ramprasad Narayan Sahi v. The State of Bihar.⁷

(3) A statute may not make any classification of the persons or things for the purpose of applying its provisions but may leave it to the discretion of the Government to select and classify persons or things to whom its provisions are to apply. In determining the question of the validity or otherwise of such a statute the Court will not strike down the law out of hand only because no classification appears on its face or because a discretion is given to the Government to make the selection or classification but will go on to examine and ascertain if the statute has laid down any principle or policy for the guidance of the exercise of discretion by the Government in the matter of selection or classification. After such scrutiny the Court will strike down the statute if it does not lay down any principle or policy for guiding the exercise of discretion by the Government in the matter of selection or classification, on the ground that the statute provides for the delegation of arbitrary and uncontrolled power to the Government so as to enable it to discriminate between persons or things similarly situate and that, therefore, the discrimination is inherent in the statute itself. In such a case the Court will strike down both the law as well as the executive action taken under such law, as it did in The State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali Sarkar,⁸ *Messrs. Dwarka Prasad Laxmi Narain v. The State of Uttar Pradesh*⁹ and Dhirendra Kumar Mandal v. The Superintendent and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs to the Government of West Bengal.¹⁰

(4) A statute may not make a classification of the persons or things for the purpose of applying its provisions and may leave it to the discretion of the Government to select and classify the persons or things to whom its provisions are to apply but may at the same time lay down a policy or principle for the guidance of the exercise of discretion by the Government in the matter of such selection or classification, the Court will uphold the law as constitutional, as it did in Kathi Raning Rawat v. The State of Saurashtra.¹¹

(5) A statute may not make a classification of the persons or things to whom their provisions are intended to apply and leave it to the discretion of the Government to select or classify the persons or things for applying those provisions according to the policy or the principle laid down by the statute itself for guidance of the exercise of discretion by the Government in the matter of such selection or classification. If the Government in making the selection or classification does not proceed on or follow such policy or principle, it has been held by the Supreme Court, e.g. in Kathi Raning Rawat v. The State of Saurashtra, that in such a case the executive action but not the statute should be condemned as unconstitutional.

The basis of permissible classification under art. 14 of the Constitution need not appear on the face of the law itself but may be gathered from any extraneous materials.

The bare possibility that the wide discretionary powers conferred on the Government by a statute may be misused or abused by the Government cannot per se induce the Court to deny the existence of the powers.

Sachin Choudhary, B. J. Joshi, J. B. Dadachanji, Rameshwar Nath and S. N. Andley, for the appellants in C.As. Nos. 456 and 457 of 1957 and respondents in C.As. Nos. 657 and 658 of 1957.

C. K. Daphtary, Solicitor-General for India, G. N. Joshi, K. H. Bhabha and R. H. Dhebar, for respondent No. 4 in C.As. Nos. 455 to 457 of 1957 and appellant in C.As. Nos. 656 to 658 of 1957.

S. R. DAS C.J. These six several appeals are directed against a common judgment and order pronounced on April 29, 1957, by a Division Bench of the Bombay High Court in three several Miscellaneous Applications under art. 226 of the Constitution, namely, No. 48 of 1957 filed by Shri Ramkrishna Dalmia (the appellant in Civil Appeal No. 455 of 1957), No. 49 of 1957 by Shri Shriyans Prasad Jain and Shri Sital Prasad Jain (the appellants in Civil Appeal No. 456 of 1957) and No. 50 of 1957 by Shri Jai Dayal Dalmia and Shri Shanti Prasad Jain (the appellants in Civil Appeal No. 457 of 1957). By those Miscellaneous Applications the petitioners therein prayed for an appropriate direction or order under art. 226 for quashing and setting aside notification No. S.R.O. 2993 dated December 11, 1956, issued by the Union of India in exercise of powers conferred on it by s. 3 of the Commissions of Enquiry Act (LX of 1952) and for other reliefs. Rules were issued and the Union of India appeared and showed cause. By the aforesaid judgment and order the High Court discharged the rules and dismissed the applications and ordered that the said notification was legal and valid except as to the last part of cl. (10) thereof from the words "and the action" to the words "in future cases" and directed the Commission not to proceed with the inquiry to the extent that it related to the aforesaid last part of cl. (10) of the said notification. The Union of India has filed three several appeals, namely, Nos. 656, 657 and 658 of 1957, in the said three Miscellaneous Applications complaining against that part of the said judgment and order of the Bombay High Court which adjudged the last part of cl. (10) to be invalid.

The Commissions of Inquiry Act, 1952, (hereinafter referred to as the Act), received the assent of the President on August 14, 1952, and was thereafter brought into force by a notification issued by the Central Government under s. 1(3) of the Act. As its long title states, the Act is one "to provide for the appointment of Commissions of Inquiry and for vesting such Commissions with certain powers". Sub-section (1) of s. 3, omitting the proviso not material for our present purpose, provides:

"The appropriate Government may, if it is of opinion that it is necessary so to do, and shall, if a resolution in this behalf is passed by the House of People or, as the case may be, the Legislative Assembly of the State, by notification in the Official Gazette, appoint a Commission of Inquiry for the purpose of making an inquiry into any definite matter of public importance and performing such functions and within such time as may be specified in the notification, and the Commission so appointed shall make the Inquiry and perform the functions accordingly."

Under sub-s. (2) of that section the Commission may consist of one or more members and where the Commission consists of more than one member one of them may be appointed as the Chairman thereof. Section 4 vests in the Commission the powers of a civil Court while trying a suit under the Code of Civil Procedure in respect of the several matters specified therein, namely, summoning and enforcing attendance of any person and examining him on oath, requiring discovery and production of any document, receiving evidence on affidavits, requisitioning any public record or copy thereof from any Court or officer, issuing commissions for examination of witnesses or documents and any other matter which may be prescribed. Section 5 empowers the appropriate Government, by a notification in the Official Gazette, to confer on the Commission additional powers as provided in all or any of the sub-ss. (2), (3), (4) and (5) of that section. Section 6 provides that no statement made by a person in the course of giving evidence before the Commission shall subject him to, or be used against him in, any civil or criminal proceeding except a prosecution for giving false evidence by such statement provided that the statement is made in reply to a question which he is required by the Commission to answer or is relevant to the subject-matter of the inquiry. The appropriate Government may under s. 7 issue a notification declaring that the Commission shall cease to exist from such date as may be specified therein. By s. 8 the Commission is empowered, subject to any rules that may be made, to regulate its own procedure including the time and place of its sittings and may act notwithstanding the temporary absence of any member or the existence of any vacancy among its members. Section 9 provides for indemnity to the appropriate Government, the members of the Commission or other persons acting under their directions in respect of anything which is done or intended to be done in good faith in pursuance of the Act. The rest of the sections are not material for the purpose of these appeals.

In exercise of the powers conferred on it by s. 3 of the Act the Central Government published in the Gazette of India dated December 11, 1956, a notification in the following terms:—

MINISTRY OF FINANCE
(Department of Economic Affairs)

ORDER

New Delhi, the 11th December, 1956.

S.R.O. 2993—Whereas it has been made to appear to the Central Government that:

(1) a large number of companies and some firms were promoted and/or controlled by Sarvashri Ramkrishna Dalmia, Jaidayal Dalmia, Shanti Prasad Jain, Sriyans Prasad Jain, Shital Prasad Jain or some one or more of them and by others being either relatives or employees of the said person or persons, closely connected with the said persons;

(2) large amounts were subscribed by the investing public in the shares of some of these companies;

(3) there have been gross irregularities (which may in several respects and materials amount to illegalities) in the management of such companies including manipulation of the accounts and unjustified transfers and use of funds and assets;

(4) the moneys subscribed by the investing public were in a considerable measure used not in the interests of the companies concerned but contrary to their interest and for the ultimate personal benefit of those in control and/or management; and

(5) the investing public have as a result suffered considerable losses.

And Whereas the Central Government is of the opinion that there should be a full inquiry into these matters which are of definite public importance both by reason of the grave consequences which appear to have ensued to the investing public and also to determine such measures as may be deemed necessary in order to prevent a recurrence thereof;

Now, therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred by s. 3 of the Commissions of Inquiry Act (No. 60 of 1952), the Central Government hereby appoints a Commission of Inquiry consisting of the following persons, namely:

Shri Justice S. R. Tendolkar, Judge of the High Court at Bombay, Chairman.

Shri N. R. Modi of Messrs. A. F. Ferguson & Co., Chartered Accountants, Member.

Shri S. C. Chaudhuri, Commissioner of Income-tax, Member.

1. The Commission shall inquire into and report on and in respect of:

(1) The administration of the affairs of the companies specified in the schedule hereto;

(2) The administration of the affairs of such other companies and firms as the Commission may during the course of its enquiry find to be companies or firms connected with the companies referred to in the schedule and whose affairs ought to be investigated and inquired into in connection with or arising out of the inquiry into the affairs of the companies specified in the schedule hereto;

(3) The nature and extent of the control, direct and indirect, exercised over such companies and firms or any of them by the aforesaid Sarvashri Ramkrishna Dalmia, Jaidayal Dalmia, Shanti Prasad Jain, Sriyans Prasad Jain, their relatives, employees and persons connected with them;

(4) The total amount of the subscription obtained from the investing public and the amount subscribed by the aforesaid persons and the extent to which the funds and assets thus obtained or acquired were misused, misapplied or misappropriated;

(5) The extent and nature of the investments by and/or loans to and/or the use of the funds or assets by and transfer of funds between the companies aforesaid;

(6) The consequences or results of such investments, loans, transfers and/or use of funds and assets;

(7) The reasons or motives of such investments, loans, transfers and use and whether there was any justification for the same and whether the same were made bona fide in the interests of the companies concerned;

(8) The extent of the losses suffered by the investing public, how far the losses were avoidable and what steps were taken by those in control and/or management to avoid the losses;

(9) The nature and extent of the personal gains made by any person or persons or any group or groups of persons, whether herein named or not by reason of or through his or their connection with or control over any such company or companies;

(10) Any irregularities, frauds or breaches of trust or action in disregard of honest commercial practices or contravention of any law (except contraventions in respect of which criminal proceedings are pending in a Court of Law) in respect of the companies and firms whose affairs are investigated by the Commission which may come to the knowledge of the Commission and the action which in the opinion of the Commission should be taken as and by way of securing redress or punishment or to act as a preventive in future cases.

(11) The measures which in the opinion of the Commission are necessary in order to ensure in the future the due and proper administration of the funds and assets of companies and firms in the interests of the investing public.

Ordered that the Order be published in the Gazette of India for public information. [No. F. 107 (18-INS/56)].

H. M. PATEL,
Secretary.

It should be noted that the above notification did not specify the time within which the Commission was to complete the inquiry and make its report.

On January 9, 1957, the Central Government issued another notification providing that all the provisions of sub-ss. (2), (3), (4) and (5) of s. 5 should apply to the Commission. As the notification of December 11, 1956, did not specify the time within which the Commission was to make its report, the Central Government on February 11, 1957, issued a third notification specifying two years from that date as the time within which the Commission of Inquiry should exercise the functions conferred on it and make its report. On February 12, 1957, three several Miscellaneous Applications were filed under art. 226 of the Constitution questioning the validity of the Act and the notification dated December 11, 1956, on diverse grounds and praying for a writ or order for quashing the same.

It will be convenient to advert to a few minor objections urged before us on behalf of the petitioners in support of their appeals before we come to deal with their principal and major contentions. The first objection is that the notification has gone beyond the Act. It is pointed out that the Act, by s. 3, empowers the appropriate Government in certain eventualities to appoint a Commission of Inquiry for the purpose of making an inquiry into any definite matter of public importance and for no other purpose. The contention is that the conduct of an individual person or company cannot possibly be a matter of public importance and far less a definite matter of that kind. We are unable to accept this argument as correct. Widespread floods, famine and pestilence may quite easily be a definite matter of public importance urgently calling for an inquiry so as to enable the Government to take appropriate steps to prevent their recurrence in future. The conduct of villagers in cutting the bunds for taking water to their fields during the dry season may cause floods during the rainy season and we can see no reason why such unsocial conduct of villagers of certain villages thus causing floods should not be regarded as a definite matter of public importance. The failure of a big bank resulting in the loss of the life savings of a multitude of men of moderate means is certainly a definite matter of public importance but the conduct of the persons in charge and management of such a bank which brought about its collapse is equally a definite matter of public importance. Widespread dacoities in particular parts of the country is, no doubt, a definite matter of public importance, but we see no reason why the conduct, activities and modus operandi of particular dacoits and thugs notorious for their cruel depredations should not be regarded as definite matters of public importance urgently requiring a sifting inquiry. It is needless to multiply instances. In each case the question is: Is there a definite matter of public importance which calls for an inquiry? We see no warrant for the proposition that a definite matter of public importance must necessarily mean only some matter involving the public benefit or advantage in the abstract, e.g., public health, sanitation or the like or some public evil or prejudice, e.g., floods, famine or pestilence or the like. Quite conceivably the conduct of an individual person or company or a group of individual persons or companies may assume such a dangerous proportion and may so prejudicially affect or threaten to affect the public well-being as to make such conduct a definite matter of public importance urgently calling for a full inquiry. Besides, s. 3 itself authorises the appropriate Government to appoint a Commission of Inquiry not only for the purpose of making an inquiry into a definite matter of public importance but also for the purpose of performing such functions as may be specified in the notification. Therefore, the notification is well within the powers conferred on the appropriate Government by s. 3 of the Act and it cannot be questioned on the ground of its going beyond the provisions of the Act.

Learned counsel for the petitioners immediately replies that in the event of its being held that the notification is within the terms of the Act, the Act itself is ultra vires the Constitution. The validity of the Act is called in question in two ways. In the first place it is said that it was beyond the legislative competency of Parliament to enact a law conferring such a wide sweep of powers. It is pointed out that Parliament enacted the Act in exercise of the legislative powers conferred on it by art. 246 of the Constitution read with entry 94 in List I and entry 45 in List III of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution. The matters enumerated in entry 94 in List I, omitting the words not necessary for our purpose, are "inquiries...for the purpose of any of the matters in this List", and those enumerated in entry 45 in List III, again omitting the unnecessary words, are "inquiries...for the purposes of any of the matters specified in List II or List III." Confining himself to the entries in so far as they relate to "inquiries", learned counsel for the petitioners urges that Parliament may make a law with respect to inquiries but cannot under these entries make a law conferring any power to perform any function other than the power to hold an inquiry. He concedes that, according to the well recognised rule of construction of the provisions of a Constitution, the legislative heads should be construed very liberally and that it must be assumed that the Constitution intended to give to the appropriate Legislature not only the power to legislate with respect to the particular legislative topic but also with respect to all matters ancillary thereto. Indeed, the very use of the words "with respect to" in art. 246 supports this principle of liberal interpretation. He, however, points out that the law, which the appropriate Legislature is empowered to make under these entries must be with respect to inquiries for the purposes of any of the matters in the relevant lists, and it is urged that the words "for the purpose of" make it abundantly clear that the law with respect to inquiries to be made under these two entries must be for the purpose of future legislation with respect to any of the legislative heads in the relevant lists. In other words, the argument is that under these two entries the appropriate Legislature may make a law authorising the constitution of a Board or Commission of Inquiry to inquire into and ascertain facts so as to enable such Legislature to undertake legislation with respect to any of the legislative topics in the relevant lists to secure some public benefit or advantage or to prevent some evil or harm befalling the public and thereby to protect the public from the same. But if an inquiry becomes necessary for, say, administrative purposes, a law with respect to such an inquiry cannot be made under these two entries. And far less can a law be made with respect to an inquiry into any wrongs alleged to have been committed by an individual person or company or a group of them for the purpose of punishing the suspected delinquent. This argument has found favour with the High Court, but we are, with great respect, unable to accept this view. To adopt this view will mean adding words to the two entries so as to read "inquiries...for the purpose of future legislation with respect to any of the matters in..." the List or Lists mentioned therein. The matter, however, does not rest here. A careful perusal of the language used in entry 45 in List III does, in our view, clinch the matter. Entry 45 in List III, which is the Concurrent List, speaks, inter alia, of "inquiries...for the purpose of any of the matters in List II or List III." Under art. 246 read with this entry, Parliament as well as the Legislature of a State may make a law with respect to "inquiries for the purpose of any of the matters in List II." Parliament, under art. 246, has no power to make a law with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List II. Therefore, when Parliament makes a law under art. 246 read with entry 45 in List III with respect to an inquiry for the purposes of any of the matters in List II, such law can never be one for inquiry for the purpose of future legislation by Parliament with respect to any of those matters in List II. Clearly Parliament can make a law for inquiry for the purpose of any of the matters in List II and none the less so though Parliament cannot legislate with respect to such matters and though none of the State Legislatures wants to legislate on such matters. In our opinion, therefore, the law to be made by the appropriate Legislature with respect to the two legislative entries referred to above may cover inquiries into any aspect of the matters enumerated in any of the lists mentioned therein and is not confined to those matters as mere heads of legislative topic. Quite conceivably the law with respect to inquiries for the purpose of any of the matters in the lists may also be for administrative purposes and the scope of the inquiry under such a law will cover all matters which may properly be regarded as ancillary to such inquiries. The words "for the purposes of" indicate that the scope of the inquiry is not necessarily limited to the particular or specific matters enumerated in any of the entries in the list concerned but may extend to inquiries into collateral matters which may be necessary for the purpose, legislative or otherwise, of those particular matters. We are unable, therefore, to hold that the inquiry which may be set up by a law made under these two entries is, in its scope or ambit, limited to future legislative purposes only.

Learned counsel then takes us through the different heads of inquiry enumerated in the notification and urges that the inquiry is neither for any legislative nor for any administrative purpose, but is a clear usurpation of the functions of the judiciary. The argument is that Parliament in authorising the appointment of a Commission and the Government in appointing this Commission have arrogated to themselves judicial powers which do not, in the very nature of things, belong to their respective domains which must be purely legislative and executive respectively. It is contended that Parliament cannot convert itself into a Court except for the rare cases of dealing with breaches of its own privileges for which it may punish the delinquent by committal for contempt or of proceedings by way of impeachment. It cannot, it is urged, undertake to inquire or investigate into alleged individual wrongs or private disputes nor can it bring the supposed culprit to book or gather materials for the purpose of initiating proceedings, civil or criminal, against him, because such inquiry or investigation is clearly not in aid of legislation. It is argued that if a criminal prosecution is to be launched, the preliminary investigation must be held under the Code of Criminal Procedure and it should not be open to any Legislature to start investigation on its own and thereby to deprive the citizen of the normal protection afforded to him by the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure. This line of reasoning also found favour with the High Court which, after considering the provisions of the Act and the eleven heads of inquiry enumerated in the notification, came to the conclusion that the last portion of cl. 10 beginning with the words "and the action" and ending with the words "in future cases" were ultra vires the Act and that the Government was not competent to require the Commission to hold any inquiry or make any report with regard to the matters covered by that portion of cl. 10, for such inquiry or report amounts to a usurpation of the judicial powers of the Union or the State as the case may be.

While we find ourselves in partial agreement with the actual conclusion of the High Court on this point, we are, with great respect, unable to accept the line of reasoning advanced by learned counsel for the petitioners, which has been accepted by the High Court for more reasons than one. In the first place neither Parliament nor the Government has itself undertaken any inquiry at all. Parliament has made a law with respect to inquiry and has left it to the appropriate Government to set up a Commission of Inquiry under certain circumstances referred to in s. 3 of the Act. The Central Government, in its turn, has, in exercise of the powers conferred on it by the Act, set up this Commission. It is, therefore, not correct to say that Parliament or the Government itself has undertaken to hold any inquiry. In the second place the conclusion that the last portion of cl. 10 is bad because it signifies that Parliament or the Government had usurped the functions of the judiciary appears to us, with respect, to be inconsistent with the conclusion arrived at in a later part of the judgment that as the Commission can only make recommendations which are not enforceable proprio vigore there can be no question of usurpation of judicial functions. As has been stated by the High Court itself in the later part of its judgment, the only power that the Commission has is to inquire and make a report and embody therein its recommendations. The Commission has no power of adjudication in the sense of passing an order which can be enforced proprio vigore. A clear distinction must, on the authorities, be drawn between a decision which, by itself, has no force and no penal effect and a decision which becomes enforceable immediately or which may become enforceable by some action being taken. Therefore, as the Commission we are concerned with is merely to investigate and record its findings and recommendations without having any power to enforce them, the inquiry or report cannot be looked upon as a judicial inquiry in the sense of its being an exercise of judicial function properly so called and consequently the question of usurpation by Parliament or the Government of the powers of the judicial organs of the Union of India cannot arise on the facts of this case and the elaborate discussion of the American authorities founded on the categorical separation of powers expressly provided by and under the American Constitution appears to us, with respect, wholly inappropriate and unnecessary and we do not feel called upon, on the present occasion, to express any opinion on the question whether even in the absence of a specific provision for separation of powers in our Constitution, such as there is under the American Constitution, some such division of powers—legislative, executive and judicial—is, nevertheless implicit in our Constitution. In the view we have taken it is also not necessary for us to consider whether, had the Act conferred on the appropriate Government power to set up a Commission of Inquiry with judicial powers, such law could not, subject, of course, to the other provisions of the Constitution, be supported as a law made under some entry in List I or List III authorising the setting up of Courts read with these two entries, for a legislation may well be founded on several entries.

Learned counsel appearing for the petitioners, who are appellants in Civil Appeals Nos. 456 and 457 of 1957, goes as far as to say that while the Commission may find facts on which the Government may take action, legislative or executive, although he does not concede the latter kind of action to be contemplated, the Commission cannot be asked to suggest any measure, legislative or executive, to be taken by the appropriate Government. We are unable to accept the proposition so widely enunciated. An inquiry necessarily involves investigation into facts and necessitates the collection of material facts from the evidence adduced before or brought to the notice of the person or body conducting the inquiry and the recording of its findings on those facts in its report cannot but be regarded as ancillary to the inquiry itself, for the inquiry becomes useless unless the findings of the inquiring body are made available to the Government which set up the inquiry. It is, in our judgment, equally ancillary that the person or body conducting the inquiry should express its own view on the facts found by it for the consideration of the appropriate Government in order to enable it to take such measure as it may think fit to do. The whole purpose of setting up of a Commission of Inquiry consisting of experts will be frustrated and the elaborate process of inquiry will be deprived of its utility if the opinion and the advice of the expert body as to the measures the situation disclosed calls for cannot be placed before the Government for consideration notwithstanding that doing so cannot be to the prejudice of anybody because it has no force of its own. In our view the recommendations of a Commission of Inquiry are of great importance to the Government in order to enable it to make up its mind as to what legislative or administrative measures should be adopted to eradicate the evil found or to implement the beneficial objects it has in view. From this point of view, there can be no objection even to the Commission of Inquiry recommending the imposition of some form of punishment which will, in its opinion, be sufficiently deterrent to delinquents in future. But seeing that the Commission of Inquiry has no judicial powers and its report will purely be recommendatory and not effective proprio vigore and the statement made by any person before the Commission of Inquiry is, under s. 6 of the Act, wholly inadmissible in evidence in any future proceedings, civil or criminal, there can be no point in the Commission of Inquiry making recommendations for taking any action "as and by way of securing redress or punishment" which, in agreement with the High Court, we think, refers, in the context, to wrongs already done or committed, for redress or punishment for such wrongs, if any, has to be imposed by a Court of law properly constituted exercising its own discretion on the facts and circumstances of the case and without being in any way influenced by the view of any person or body, howsoever august or high powered it may be. Having regard to all these considerations it appears to us that only that portion of the last part of cl. 10 which calls upon the Commission of Inquiry to make recommendations about the action to be taken "as and by way of securing redress or punishment", cannot be said to be at all necessary for or ancillary to the purposes of the Commission. In our view the words in the later part of the clause, namely, "as and by way of securing redress or punishment", clearly go outside the scope of the Act and such provision is not covered by the two legislative entries and should, therefore, be deleted. So deleted the later portion of cl. (10) would read—"and the action which in the opinion of the Commission should be taken...to act as a preventive in future cases".

Deletion of the words mentioned above from cl. 10 raises the question of severability. We find ourselves in substantial agreement with the reasons given by the High Court on this point and we hold that the efficacy of the notification is in no way affected by the deletion of the offending words mentioned above and there is no reason to think that the Government would not have issued the notification without those words. Those words do not appear to us to be inextricably wound up with the texture of the entire notification.

The principal ground urged in support of the contention as to the invalidity of the Act and/or the notification is founded on art. 14 of the Constitution. In *Budhan Choudhry v. The State of Bihar*¹ a Constitution Bench of seven Judges of this Court at pages 1048-49 explained the true meaning and scope of art. 14 as follows:—

"The provisions of Article 14 of the Constitution have come up for discussion before this Court in a number of cases, namely, *Chitrattilal Chowdhuri v. The Union of India*², *The State of Bombay v. F. N. Balsara*³, *The State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali Sarkar*⁴, *Kathi Raning Rawat v. The State of Saurashtra*⁵, *Lachmandas Kewalram Ahuja v. The State of Bombay*⁶, *Qasim Razvi v. The State of Hyderabad*⁷ and *Habeesb Mohamad v. The State of Hyderabad*⁸. It is, therefore, not necessary to enter upon any lengthy discussion as to the meaning, scope and effect of the article in question. It is now well-established that while art. 14 forbids class legislation, it does not forbid reasonable classification for the purposes of legislation. In order, however, to pass the test of permissible classification two conditions must be fulfilled, namely, (i) that the classification must be founded on an intelligible differentia which distinguishes persons or things that are grouped together from others left out of the group and (ii) that that differentia must have a rational relation to the object sought to be achieved by the statute in question. The classification may be founded on different bases, namely, geographical, or according to objects or occupations or the like. What is necessary is that there must be a nexus between the basis of classification and the object of the Act under consideration. It is also well established by the decisions of this Court that art. 14 condemns discrimination not only by a substantive law but also by a law of procedure."

The principle enunciated above has been consistently adopted and applied in subsequent cases. The decisions of this Court further establish—

(a) that a law may be constitutional even though it relates to a single individual if, on account of some special circumstances or reasons applicable to him and not applicable to others, that single individual may be treated as a class by himself;

(b) that there is always a presumption in favour of the constitutionality of an enactment and the burden is upon him who attacks it to show that there has been a clear transgression of the constitutional principles;

(c) that it must be presumed that the Legislature understands and, correctly appreciates the need of its own people, that its laws are directed to problems made manifest by experience and that its discriminations are based on adequate grounds;

(d) that the Legislature is free to recognise degrees of harm and may confine its restrictions to those cases where the need is deemed to be the clearest;

1 [1955] 1 S. C. R. 1045.

2 [1950] S. C. R. 869.

3 [1951] S. C. R. 682.

4 [1952] S. C. R. 284.

5 [1952] S. C. R. 435.

6 [1952] S. C. R. 710.

7 [1953] S. C. R. 589.

8 [1953] S. C. R. 661.

(e) that in order to sustain the presumption of constitutionality the Court may take into consideration matters of common knowledge, matters of common report, the history of the times and may assume every state of facts which can be conceived existing at the time of legislation; and

(f) that while good faith and knowledge of the existing conditions on the part of a Legislature are to be presumed, if there is nothing on the face of the law or the surrounding circumstances brought to the notice of the Court on which the classification may reasonably be regarded as based, the presumption of constitutionality cannot be carried to the extent of always holding that there must be some undisclosed and unknown reasons for subjecting certain individuals or corporations to hostile or discriminating legislation.

The above principles will have to be constantly borne in mind by the Court when it is called upon to adjudge the constitutionality of any particular law attacked as discriminatory and violative of the equal protection of the laws.

A close perusal of the decisions of this Court in which the above principles have been enunciated and applied by this Court will also show that a statute which may come up for consideration on a question of its validity under art. 14 of the Constitution, may be placed in one or other of the following five classes:—

(i) A statute may itself indicate the persons or things to whom its provisions are intended to apply and the basis of the classification of such persons or things may appear on the face of the statute or may be gathered from the surrounding circumstances known to or brought to the notice of the Court. In determining the validity or otherwise of such a statute the Court has to examine whether such classification is or can be reasonably regarded as based upon some differentia which distinguishes such persons or things grouped together from those left out of the group and whether such differentia has a reasonable relation to the object sought to be achieved by the statute, no matter whether the provisions of the statute are intended to apply only to a particular person or thing or only to a certain class of persons or things. Where the Court finds that the classification satisfies the tests, the Court will uphold the validity of the law, as it did in Chiranjitlal Chowdhuri v. The Union of India (supra), The State of Bombay v. F. N. Balsara (supra), Kedar Nath Bajoria v. The State of West Bengal,¹ V. M. Syed Mohamad and Company v. The State of Andhra,² and Budhan Choudhry v. The State of Bihar (supra).

(ii) A statute may direct its provisions against one individual person or thing or to several individual persons or things but no reasonable basis of classification may appear on the face of it or be deducible from the surrounding circumstances, or matters of common knowledge. In such a case the Court will strike down the law as an instance of naked discrimination, as it did in *Ameerunnissa Begum v. Mahboob Begum*³ and Ramprasad Narayan Sahu v. The State of Bihar.⁴

(iii) A statute may not make any classification of the persons or things for the purpose of applying its provisions but may leave it to the discretion of the Government to select and classify persons or things to whom its provisions are to apply. In determining the question of the validity or otherwise of such a statute the Court will not strike down the law out of hand only because no classification appears on its face or because a discretion is given to the Government to make the selection or classification but will go on to examine and ascertain if the statute has laid down any principle or policy for the guidance of the exercise of discretion by the Government in the matter of the selection or classification. After such scrutiny the Court will strike down the statute if it does not lay down any principle or policy for guiding the exercise of discretion by the Government in the matter of selection or classification, on the ground that the statute provides for the delegation of arbitrary and uncontrolled power to the Government so as to enable it to discriminate between persons or things similarly situate and that, therefore, the discrimination is inherent in the statute itself. In such a case the Court will strike down both the law as well as the executive action taken under such law, as it did in State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali Sarkar (supra), *Messrs. Dwarka Prasad Laxmi Narain v. The State of Uttar Pradesh*¹ and Dhirendra Kumar Mandal v. The Superintendent and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs to the Government of West Bengal.²

(iv) A statute may not make a classification of the persons or things for the purpose of applying its provisions and may leave it to the discretion of the Government to select and classify the persons or things to whom its provisions are to apply but may at the same time lay down a policy or principle for the guidance of the exercise of discretion by the Government in the matter of such selection or classification, the Court will uphold the law as constitutional, as it did in Kathi Raning Rawat v. The State of Saurashtra (supra).

(v) A statute may not make a classification of the persons or things to whom their provisions are intended to apply and leave it to the discretion of the Government to select or classify the persons or things for applying those provisions according to the policy or the principle laid down by the statute itself for guidance of the exercise of discretion by the Government in the matter of such selection or classification. If the Government in making the selection or classification does not proceed on or follow such policy or principle, it has been held by this Court e.g. in Kathi Raning Rawat v. The State of Saurashtra (supra) that in such a case the executive action but not the statute should be condemned as unconstitutional.

In the light of the foregoing discussions the question at once arises: In what category does the Act or the notification impugned in these appeals fall?

It will be apparent from its long title that the purpose of the Act is to provide for the appointment of Commissions of Inquiry and for vesting such Commissions with certain powers. Section 3 empowers the appropriate Government, in certain circumstances therein mentioned, to appoint a Commission of Inquiry for the purpose of making an inquiry into any definite matter of public importance and performing such functions within such time as may be specified in the notification. It seems clear—and it has not been controverted—that on a proper construction of this section, the functions the performance of which is contemplated must be such as are ancillary to and in aid of the inquiry itself and cannot be read as a function independent of or unconnected with such inquiry. That being the position, as we conceive it to be, the question arises as to the scope and ambit of the power which is conferred by it on the appropriate Government. The answer is furnished by the statute itself, for s. 3 indicates that the appropriate Government can appoint a Commission of Inquiry only for the purpose of making an inquiry into any definite matter of public importance and into no other matter. In other words the subject-matter of the inquiry can only be a definite matter of public importance. The appropriate Government, it follows, is not authorised by this section to appoint a Commission for the purpose of holding an inquiry into any other matter. Learned Solicitor-General, in the premises, submits that the section itself on the face of it, makes a classification so that this statute falls within the first category mentioned above and contends that this classification of things is based on an intelligible differentia which has a reasonable relation to the object sought to be achieved by it, for a definite matter of public importance may well call for an inquiry by a Commission. In the alternative the learned Solicitor-General urges that in any case the section itself quite clearly indicates that the policy of Parliament is to provide for the appointment of Commissions of Inquiry to inquire into any definite matter of public importance and that as there is no knowing when, where or how any such matter may crop up Parliament considers it necessary or expedient to leave it to the appropriate Government to take action as and when the appropriate moment will arrive. In the tempo of the prevailing conditions in modern society events occur which were never foreseen and it is impossible for Parliament or any Legislature to anticipate all events or to provide for all eventualities and, therefore, it must leave the duty of taking the necessary action to the appropriate Government. This delegation of authority, however, is not unguided or uncontrolled, for the discretion given to the appropriate Government to set up a Commission of Inquiry must be guided by the policy laid down, namely, that the executive action of setting up a Commission of Inquiry must conform to the condition of the section, that is to say, that there must exist a definite matter of public importance into which an inquiry is, in the opinion of the appropriate Government, necessary or is required by a resolution in that behalf passed by the House of the People or the Legislative Assembly of the State. If the preambles or the provisions of the statutes classed under the first category mentioned above could be read as making a reasonable classification satisfying the requirements of art. 14 and if the preamble to the statute considered in the case of Kathi Raning Rawat (supra) could be construed as laying down sufficiently clearly a policy or principle for the guidance of the executive, what objection can there be to construing s. 3 of the Act now under our consideration as also making a reasonable classification or at any rate as declaring with sufficient clarity the policy of Parliament and laying down a principle for the guidance of the exercise of the powers conferred on the appropriate Government so as to bring this statute at least in the fourth category, if not also in the first category? On the authorities, as they stand, it cannot be said that an arbitrary and uncontrolled power has been delegated to the appropriate Government and that, therefore, the law itself is bad.

Learned counsel for the petitioners next contends that if the Act is good in the sense that it has declared its policy and laid down some principle for the guidance of the Government in the exercise of the power conferred on it, the appropriate Government has failed to exercise its discretion properly on the basis of a reasonable classification. Article 14 protects all persons from discrimination by the legislative as well as by the executive organ of the State. "State" is defined in art. 12 as including the Government and "law" is defined in art. 13 as including any notification or order. It has to be conceded, therefore, that it is open to the petitioners also to question the constitutionality of the notification. The attack against the notification is that the Government has not properly implemented the policy or followed the principle laid down in the Act and has consequently transgressed the bounds of the authority delegated to it. It is pointed out that in March, 1946, one Shri Tricumdas Dwarkadas, a solicitor of Bombay, had been appointed an officer on Special Duty to indicate the lines on which the Indian Companies Act was to be revised. He made a report which was, however, incomplete in certain particulars. Thereupon the Government appointed Shri Thiruvengkatachari, the Advocate General of Madras, to make further inquiry. The last mentioned gentleman submitted his report and on the basis of that report, it is said, a memorandum containing tentative proposals was prepared and circulated to elicit the opinions of various organisations. On October 28, 1950, a Committee called the Indian Company Law Committee—popularly known as the Bhaba Committee—was appointed. That Committee went round and collected materials and made its comprehensive report on the basis of which the new Indian Companies Act has recently been remodelled. As nothing new has since then happened why, it is asked, should any further inquiry be made? The conclusion is pressed upon us that there can, in the circumstances, be no definite matter of public importance which can possibly call for an inquiry. We find no force in this argument. In the first place the Bhaba Committee at p. 29 of its Report recommended that further inquiries may, in future, have to be made regarding some matters relating to Companies and, therefore, the necessity for fresh inquiry cannot be ruled out. In the next place the appropriate Government is empowered to appoint a Commission of Inquiry if, in its opinion, it is necessary so to do. The preambles to the notification recite that certain matters enumerated under five heads had been made to appear to the Central Government in consequence of which the Central Government had come to the conclusion that there should be a full inquiry into those matters which, in its opinion, were definite matters of public importance both by reason of the grave consequences which appeared to have ensued to the investing public and for determining such measures as might be deemed necessary in order to prevent a recurrence thereof. Parliament in its wisdom has left the matter of the setting up of a Commission of Inquiry to the discretion of the appropriate Government, and if the appropriate Government has formed the opinion that a definite matter of public importance has arisen and calls for an inquiry, the Court will not lightly brush aside the opinion.

Learned counsel for the petitioners argues that granting that the question as to the necessity for constituting a Commission of Inquiry has been left to the subjective determination of the appropriate Government, the actual setting up of a Commission is conditioned by the existence of some definite matter of public importance. If there be no such definite matter of public importance, in existence, then no question of necessity for appointing a Commission can arise. Reference is then made to the first preamble to the notification and it is pointed out that all the matters alleged to have been made to appear to the Central Government relate to some supposed act or conduct of the petitioners. The contention is repeated that the act and conduct of individual persons can never be regarded as definite matters of public importance. We are unable to accept this argument as sound, for as we have already stated, the act or conduct of individuals may assume such dangerous proportions as may well affect the public well-being and thus become a definite matter of public importance. We do not, therefore, agree that the notification should be struck down for the absence of a definite matter of public importance calling for an inquiry.

The point which is next urged in support of these appeals and which has given us considerable anxiety is that the petitioners and their companies have been arbitrarily singled out for the purpose of hostile and discriminatory treatment and subjected to a harassing and oppressive inquiry. The provisions of art. 14, it is contended, protect every person against discrimination by the State, namely, against the law as well as the executive action and this protection extends to State action at all its stages. The petitioners' grievance is that the Government had started discrimination even at the earliest stage when it conceived the idea of issuing the notification. Reference is made to the Memorandum filed by the Bombay Shareholders' Association before the Bhaba Committee showing that the same or similar allegations had been made not only against the petitioners and their companies but against other businessmen and their companies, and that although the petitioners and their companies and those other persons and their companies were thus similarly situate, in that allegations had been made against both, the Government arbitrarily applied the Act to the petitioners and their companies and issued the notification concerning them but left out the others from its operation. It is true that the notification primarily or even solely affects the petitioners and their companies, but it cannot be overlooked that Parliament having left the selective application of the Act to the discretion of the appropriate Government, the latter must of necessity take its decision on the materials available to it and the opinion it forms thereon. The appropriate Government cannot in such matters be expected to sit down and hold a judicial inquiry into the truth of the materials brought before it, and examine the informants on oath in the presence of the parties who are or may be likely to be affected by its decision. In matters of this kind the appropriate Government has of necessity to act upon the information available to it. It is the best judge of the reliability of its source of information, and if it acts in good faith on the materials brought to its notice and honestly comes to the conclusion that the act and conduct of the petitioners and the affairs of their companies constitute a definite matter of public importance calling for an inquiry with a view to devise measures for preventing the recurrence of such evil, this Court, not being in possession of all the facts will, we apprehend, be slow to adjudge the executive action to be bad and illegal. We are not unmindful of the fact that a very wide discretionary power has been conferred on the Government and, indeed, the contemplation that such wide powers in the hands of the executive may in some cases be misused or abused and turned into an engine of oppression has caused considerable anxiety in our mind. Nevertheless, the bare possibility that the powers may be misused or abused cannot per se induce the Court to deny the existence of the powers. It cannot be overlooked that Parliament has confided this discretion, not to any petty official but the appropriate Government itself to take action in conformity with the policy and principle laid down in the Act. As this Court has said in Matajog Dobey v. H. C. Bhari,¹ "a discretionary power is not necessarily a discriminatory power and that abuse of power is not to be easily assumed where the discretion is vested in the Government and not in a minor official." We feel sure, however, that if this law is administered by the Government "with an evil eye and an unequal hand" or for an oblique or unworthy purpose, the arms of this Court will be long enough to reach it and to strike down such abuse with a heavy hand. What, then, we inquire, are the salient facts here? The Central Government appointed investigators to scrutinise the affairs of three of the petitioners' concerns. Those investigators had made their reports to the Central Government. The Central Government had also the Bhaba Committee Report and all the Memoranda filed before that Committee. It may also have had other information available to it and on those materials it formed its opinion that the act and conduct of the petitioners and the affairs of their companies constituted a definite matter of public importance which required a full inquiry. Up to this stage there is no question of legal proof of the allegations against the petitioners as in a Court of law. The only question is: do those allegations, if honestly believed, constitute a definite matter of public importance? We are unable to say that they do not.

Reference is again made to the several matters enumerated in the five clauses set out in the first preamble to the notification and it is urged that those matters do not at all disclose any intelligible differentia on the basis of which the petitioners and their companies can be grouped together as a class. On the part of the Union of India reference is made to the affidavits affirmed by Shri H. M. Patel, the Principal Secretary to the Finance Ministry of the Government of India, purporting to set out in detail as the background thereof, the circumstances which led to the issue of the impugned notification and the matters recited therein and the several reports referred to in the said affidavit. Learned counsel for the petitioners take the objection that reference cannot be made to any extraneous matter and that the basis of classification must appear on the face of the notification itself and reliance is placed on certain observations in the dissenting judgments in Chiranjilal Chowdhury's case (supra) and in item (2) of the summary given by Fazl Ali J., in his judgment in F. N. Balsara's case (supra). In Chiranjilal Chowdhury's case (supra) the majority of the Court read the preamble to the Ordinance which was replaced by the Act which was under consideration there as part of the Act and considered the recitals, reinforced as they were by the presumption of validity of the Act, as prima facie sufficient to constitute an intelligible basis for regarding the company concerned as a class by itself and held that the petitioner there had not discharged the onus that was on him. The dissenting Judges, after pointing out that the petition and the affidavit did not give any indication as to the differentia on the basis of which the company had been singled out, went on to say that the statute also did not on the face of it indicate any basis of classification. This was included in cl. (2) of the summary set out in the judgment in F. N. Balsara's case (supra). Those observations cannot, therefore, be read as meaning that the classification must always appear on the face of the law itself and that reference cannot be made to any extraneous materials. In fact in Chiranjitlal Chowdhury's case (supra) parliamentary proceedings, in so far as they depicted the surrounding circumstances and furnished the background, were referred to. In Kathi Raving Rawat's case (supra) the hearing was adjourned in order to enable the respondent to put in an affidavit setting forth the material circumstances. In Kedamath Bajoria's case (supra) the situation brought about by the war conditions was taken notice of. The same may be said of the cases of *A. Thangal Kunju Musaliar v. M. Venkitachalam Potti*¹ and *Pannalal Binjraj v. Union of India*². In our judgment, therefore, there can be no objection to the matters brought to the notice of the Court by the affidavit of Shri H. M. Patel being taken into consideration along with the matters specified in the notification in order to ascertain whether there was any valid basis for treating the petitioners and their companies as a class by themselves.

Learned counsel for the petitioners next urges that even if the matters referred to in Shri H. M. Patel's affidavits and those appearing on the face of the notification are taken into consideration one cannot deduce therefrom any differentia which may be taken to distinguish the petitioners and their companies from other persons and their companies. The qualities and characteristics imputed to the petitioners and their companies are not at all peculiar or exclusive to them but are to be found equally in other persons and companies, and yet they and their companies have been singled out for hostile and discriminatory treatment leaving out other persons and companies which are similarly situate. There is no force in this argument. Parliament has confided the task of the selective application of the law to the appropriate Government and it is, therefore, for the appropriate Government to exercise its discretion in the matter. It is to be expected—and, until the contrary is proved, it is to be presumed—that the Government, which is responsible to Parliament, will act honestly, properly and in conformity with the policy and principle laid down by Parliament. It may well be that the Central Government thought that even if one or more of the particular qualities and characteristics attributed to the petitioners and their companies may be found in another person or company, the combination of those qualities and characteristics which it thought were present in the petitioners and their companies was of a unique nature and was not present in any other person or company. In its appreciation of the material facts preparatory to the exercise of the discretion left to it by Parliament the Central Government may have thought that the evil was more pronounced in the petitioners and their concerns than in any other person or concern and that the need for an inquiry was more urgent and clear in the case of the petitioners and their companies than in the case of any other person or company. What is the gist and substance of the allegations against the petitioners and their companies? They are that a small group of persons had from before 1946 acquired control over a number of companies including a banking company and an insurance company; that some of these companies were private companies and the others were public companies in which the public had invested considerable moneys by buying shares; that the financial years of some of these companies were different from those of the others; that the funds of the limited companies were utilised in purchasing shares in other companies having large reserve funds with a view to get control over them and to utilise those funds for acquiring shares in other companies or otherwise utilise those funds for the personal benefit of these individuals; that the shares were acquired on blank transfer deeds and were not registered in the names of the companies with whose funds they were purchased so as to permit the same shares to be shown in the balance sheets of the different companies having different financial years; that after 1951 several of these companies were taken into voluntary liquidation or their assets were transferred to another company under some pretended scheme of arrangement or re-organisation; that after getting control of a company they appointed some of themselves as managing director or selling agent on high remuneration and after a while cancelled such appointment on paying fabulous amounts as and by way of compensation; that funds of one company were transferred to another company to cover up the real financial position. It is needless to add other allegations to explain the matter. The question before us is not whether the allegations made on the face of the notification and in the affidavits filed on behalf of the Union of India are true but whether the qualities and characteristics, if honestly believed to be found in the petitioners, are so peculiar or unique as to constitute a good and valid basis on which the petitioners and their companies can be regarded as a class by themselves. We are not of opinion that they do not. It is not for us to say on this application and we do not in fact say or even suggest that the allegations about the petitioners and their concerns are at all well founded. It is sufficient for our present purpose to say that the facts disclosed on the face of the notification itself and the facts which have been brought to our notice by the affidavits afford sufficient support to the presumption of constitutionality of the notification. There being thus a presumption of validity in favour of the Act and the notification, it is for the petitioners to allege and prove beyond doubt that other persons or companies similarly situate have been left out and the petitioners and their companies have been singled out for discriminatory and hostile treatment. The petitioners have, in our opinion, failed to discharge that onus. Indeed nowhere in the petitions is there even an averment that there are other persons or companies similarly situate as the petitioners and their companies. It has to be remembered that the allegations set forth in the memorandum submitted by the Bombay Shareholders' Association to the Bhaba Committee have not been proved by legal evidence. And further that report itself contains matters which may be taken as calculated to lend support to the view that whether regard is had to the combination of a variety of evils or to their degree, the petitioners may quite conceivably be grouped as a class by themselves. In our judgment the plea of the infraction of the equal protection clause of our Constitution cannot be sustained.

The next contention is that the notification is bad, because the action of the Government in issuing it was mala fide and amounted to an abuse of power. Learned counsel appearing for the petitioner, who is the appellant in Civil Appeal No. 455 of 1957, makes it clear that no personal motive or ill-will against the petitioners is imputed to any one, but he points out that the Bhaba Committee had been set up and the Companies Act has been remodelled and, therefore, the present Commission was not set up for any legitimate purpose. The main idea, according to learned counsel, was to obtain information which the Government could not get by following the ordinary procedure under the Code of Criminal Procedure and this ulterior motive clearly makes the governmental action mala fide. This point has been further emphasised by learned counsel appearing for the petitioners, who are appellants in Civil Appeals Nos. 456 and 457 of 1957. He has drawn our attention to the affidavits filed by his clients and contends that it was well-known to the Government that none of them was concerned in promoting or managing any of the companies and their position being thus well-known to the Government, their inclusion in the notification was both outside the power conferred by the Government and also constituted a mala fide exercise of the power conferred on it. No substantial ground in support of this point has been brought before us, and we are not satisfied that the circumstances referred to in the notification and the affidavits filed on behalf of the Union of India, may not, if true, be the basis of a further inquiry into the matter. It will be for the Commission to inquire into the allegations and come to its own findings and make its report containing its recommendations. It is not desirable that we should say anything more on this point. All that we need say is that the charge of mala fides has not been brought home to the Government.

A point was taken that the original notification was defective in that it did not fix the time within which the Commission was to complete its report and that a subsequent notification fixing a time could not cure that defect. We do not think there is any substance in this too. The third notification quoted above amended the original notification by fixing a time. There was nothing to prevent the Government from issuing a fresh notification appointing a Commission and fixing a time. If that could be done, there was no reason why the same result could not be achieved by the combined effect of two notifications.* In any case the amending notification taken together with the original notification may be read as a fresh notification within the meaning of s. 3 of the Act, operative at least from the date of the later notification.

It is feebly argued that the notification is bad as it amounts to a delegation of essential legislative function. Assuming that there is delegation of legislative function, the Act having laid down its policy, such delegation of power, if any, is not vitiated at all, for the legislation by the delegatee will have to conform to the policy so laid down by the Act. Lastly a point is raised that the notification is bad because it violates art. 23 of the Constitution. It is frankly stated by the learned counsel that this point is rather premature at this stage and that he desires to reserve his client's right to raise it in future.

No other point has been urged before us and for reasons stated above the appeals Nos. 455, 456 and 457 of 1957 are dismissed with costs. Appeals Nos. 656, 657 and 658 of 1957 succeed only in part, namely, to the extent that only the words "by way of redress or punishment" occurring in the later portion of cl. 10 will be deleted so that the later portion of cl. 10 will read as: "and the action which in the opinion of the Commission should be taken...to act as a preventive in future cases" as indicated above. We make no order as to the costs of these three appeals.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

[NAGPUR BENCH]

Before Mr. Justice Mudholkar and Mr. Justice Kotwal.

SHIOSINGH DAULATSING RAJPUT v. THE BOMBAY REVENUE TRIBUNAL.*

Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act (XXIV of 1951), Secs. 4, 3, 19(2)—Person holding more than fifty acres of land failing to make selection as required under s. 4(2)—Application by such person under s. 19(2) of Act for reinstatement in possession of other land—Whether such person can be deemed to be a protected lessee of the land in his possession—Maintainability of application.

If at any time the area in possession of a person claiming to be a protected lessee under the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951, exceeds fifty acres, it is incumbent on him to make a selection of an area upto fifty acres and give intimation to the landholder and Revenue Officers as required by s. 4(2) of the Act. If he does not do so, he cannot be deemed to be a protected lessee at all, in respect of any area in his possession.

1 [1958] N. L. J. 269.

2 (1957) Miscellaneous Petition No. 428 of 1956, decided on September 10, 1957.

KOTVAL J. This petition arises out of an application made by the petitioner Shiosingh for his reinstatement in possession of a field under s. 19(2) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951.

The circumstances under which the petitioner preferred that application before the revenue authorities are as follows: On April 26, 1954, respondent No. 4 Bhikanrao purchased the field, survey No. 56, from respondent No. 5, Chandansingh, by a registered sale-deed. Shiosingh is the brother of Chandansingh. Shiosingh filed his application under s. 19(2) of the Act on November 8, 1954, alleging that he had cultivated the field in the year 1953-54; that he was a protected lessee of the said field; that he had been forcibly dispossessed by Bhikanrao; and that, therefore, he should be reinstated in possession.

Respondent No. 4 Bhikanrao pleaded in reply to this application, that he had purchased the field for a sum of Rs. 4,000 from Chandansingh, that the two brothers in collusion were playing a trick on him—one brother selling it to him and the other claiming it back on the ground that he was a protected lessee. In any case, Bhikanrao pleaded that Shiosingh had more than 50 acres of land in his possession as he was cultivating survey Nos. 63, 64/2 B, 3, and 64/3, situate at mouza Wadi, admeasuring in all 55 acres; that he had not made any selection as required by s. 4(2) or s. 4-A of the Act and, therefore, he had no right to claim as a protected lessee.

The Sub-Divisional Officer before whom the application came held that Shiosingh had more than 50 acres and since he had not made a selection, the petitioner was not a protected lessee and, therefore, he was not entitled to ask for any redress under s. 19(2) of the Act. In appeal, however, the Deputy Commissioner, Buldana, held that Shiosingh did not hold more than 50 acres since the perepatrak entries were unreliable. He held that respondent No. 4 had admitted that the petitioner had cultivated Survey No. 56 in the year 1953-54 and was, therefore, deemed to be a protected lessee of that field. In Second Appeal before the Bombay Revenue Tribunal, the decision of the Deputy Commissioner was set aside and the petitioner's original application under s. 19(2) was dismissed. The Tribunal held that the petitioner had failed to prove that he was a protected lessee of the suit land and, therefore, he had no locus standi to make an application under s. 19(2). It also held that since the petitioner was holding more than 50 acres of land, it was incumbent on him to have made a selection as to which 50 acres he desired to continue to hold and since he had failed to make such a selection within the time allowed under s. 4(3) read with sub-s. (2) thereof, he cannot claim to be a protected lessee. Both these conclusions of the Revenue Tribunal are challenged in this petition.

Now, it is not in dispute before us that the petitioner had held more than 50 acres of land prior to the date of his application under s. 19(2). He had held four survey numbers as was found by the Sub-Divisional Officer, viz. Nos. 63, 64/3, 3 and 64/2-B, having a total acreage of 51.24 acres. Therefore, he was even apart from the field in dispute, in possession of more than 50 acres of land.

Section 3 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951, defines who is a protected lessee. It divides protected lessees into three classes: (1) those who had been holding land in the agricultural year 1951-52, (2) those holding leases from landholders after 1951-52, and (3) "Every person who holds land from a landholder on a lease for a term of eight years or more...". The first two classes were "deemed to be" leases for a period of eight years (it was five years before amendment) whatever may be the agreed duration of the lease. All the above three classes viz. those "deemed to be" for eight years and those leases actually for eight years or more are deemed to be protected lessees. Then there follow certain exceptions, in sub-ss. (4) and (5) of s. 3. With these exceptions we are not here concerned.

Having defined who is a protected lessee, s. 4 places what are termed restrictions, on protected lessees. For the purposes of the present case, s. 4, sub-ss.

(1) and (2) are important. They run as follows:—

"4. (1) No person shall, at any time, be deemed to be a protected lessee in respect of any area in excess of fifty acres.

(2) If the area in which a lessee is entitled under s. 3 to be deemed to be a protected lessee at any time together with any other area, if any, held by him as protected lessee, exceeds fifty acres, he shall select so much only of the first mentioned area as would make the total area to be held by him as protected lessee equal to fifty acres, and he shall give an intimation in writing to the landholder or landholders, as the case may be, and to the Revenue Officer and thereupon he shall be deemed to be a protected lessee of the area so selected."

Having regard to the provisions of sub-s. (1) of s. 4, it is clear that no person claiming to be a protected lessee can be in possession of any area in excess of fifty acres, and this rule is by virtue of the words in sub-s. (1) "at any time" clearly applicable whenever the question falls to be determined. In sub-s. (2) a protected lessee who holds land in excess of fifty acres has been given the right to select such area as is equal to fifty acres within a certain time i.e. within two months before the commencement of the agricultural year. The time for the first selection was by the addition of s. 4-A, included by the amending Act of 1953, extended up to February 1, 1954.

Reading these provisions together, it appears to us clear that if at any time the area in the possession of a person claiming to be a protected lessee exceeds fifty acres, it is incumbent on him to make a selection of an area upto 50 acres and give intimation to the landholder and Revenue Officers as required by s. 4(2). If he does not do so, he cannot be deemed to be a protected lessee at all, in respect of any area in his possession. The moment a protected lessee becomes entitled to hold land in excess of 50 acres, he must make a selection; otherwise he ceases to be a protected lessee altogether. That, in our opinion, is the proper construction to be placed on the provisions of s. 4(1).

Mr. R. K. Thakur on behalf of the appellant has urged that if the area already in possession of the protected lessee has once vested in the lessee in the right of a protected lessee prior to 1951-52, then he cannot be divested of that right and cannot cease to be a protected lessee at least in respect of that area. Mr. Thakur derived support for his argument from the decision of a Member (Mr. M. W. Pradhan) of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal in *Narayan v. Bhalchandra*¹.

In the first place, the view expressed by the Member (Mr. M. W. Pradhan) was really an opinion in that case because under the rules of the Tribunal, the operative order was that of the Member designated to try the case (Mr. P. D. Deshmukh) who took a contrary view. The argument, plausible as it may seem, in our opinion, ignores the provisions of sub-s. (1) of s. 4, and particularly the words "at any time". The same words are repeated in sub-s. (2) and, therefore, even if the protected lessee holds land as a protected lessee, if he ever comes to hold more than fifty acres and fails to make a selection required of him under sub-s. (2), sub-s. (1) states that he shall not be deemed to be a protected lessee because he holds an area in excess of fifty acres. We endorse the view expressed by Mr. Deshmukh in Narayan v. Bhalchandra.

In the present case it is also not in dispute that the petitioner, who was already holding more than fifty acres, failed to make at any time the selection required of him under sub-s. (2) of s. 4. No notice was ever given by him as required by s. 4(2) or s. 4-A of the Act. Therefore, he cannot be deemed to be a protected lessee in respect of the area in dispute, because that area, coupled with the area which he already held, was certainly in excess of fifty acres.

The view we have taken above, though not directly taken, was adverted to by us in *Buckingham Court Ltd. v. Narayan Gangaram*², where we held that the failure to give notice within the time prescribed by s. 4A would have this effect that the protected lessee would cease to hold the land as a protected lessee if the area in his possession is in excess of fifty acres. Having heard counsel in the present case, we see no reason to modify the view we had taken in that case.

² [1957] Miscellaneous Petition No. 428 of

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the order impugned before us took the correct view in law of ss. 3 and 4 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act and correctly decided the matter in controversy in the present petition. Upon the view we have taken, we need not decide the other point raised. The petition is dismissed with costs.

Petition dismissed.

THE BOMBAY REVENUE TRIBUNAL.*

Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code (II of 1955)—States Reorganization Act (XXXVII of 1956), Sec. 122, Notification issued under—Order terminating services of Patel passed by Deputy Commissioner under Code after reorganization of States—Whether such order appealable to Bombay Revenue Tribunal—Meaning and connotation of expression "Revenue Cases" in Schedule to notification.

An order passed under the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, 1953, by a Deputy Commissioner terminating the services of a Patel, which order came into effect after the coming into force of the States Reorganization Act, 1956, is by reason of the notification issued by the State Government under s. 122 of the Act, appealable to the Bombay Revenue Tribunal.

The facts appear in the judgment.

B. B. Banade, for respondent No. 4.

N. L. Abhyankar, Special Government Pleader, for the petitioner.

CHAGLA C.J. A rather important question as to the jurisdiction of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal arises in this Full Bench, and the few facts, which have to be stated in order to understand what the contention is, are that certain Patels were appointed under the Berar Land Revenue Code. The relevant Act is the Berar Patels and Patwaris Law of 1900, and the Patels that used to be appointed under this Act were either Patels who had certain Watan rights or Patels who were appointed ad hoc. This was continued under the subsequent Madhya Pradesh Laws till we come to the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code (II of 1955) and that law abolished the system of the appointment of these Patels. When we turn to the Code, s. 214 provides:—

"At the end of one year from the date appointed for the coming into force of this Code or on any earlier date which the State Government may, by notification, specify, the Berar Patels and Patwaris Law, 1900, shall stand repealed and any right or claim to continue or to be appointed as a Patel or Patwari under the said Law shall stand extinguished."

This Code came into force on October 1, 1955, and therefore the Berar Law of 1900 stood repealed on September 30, 1956, and any right which a Patel had to continue as a Patel or to be appointed as a Patel was extinguished. Under s. 237, which is the section dealing with the rule-making power, power is conferred upon the requisite authority to make rules under sub-cl. (xix) for the appointment of Patels under s. 205(1) of the Code, and when we turn to that section we find that the Deputy Commissioner has been given the power to appoint for each village or groups of villages one or more Patels. Therefore, the position that emerges is that the mode of appointment of Patels and the rights which Patels had under the law of 1900 ceased to exist on September 30, 1956, and under the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, from October 1, 1956, the Deputy Commissioner was given the power to appoint Patels and the mode of appointment was to be regulated by the rules to be framed under sub-cl. (xix) of s. 237.

In fact these rules were not framed, but it appears that certain memoranda were issued dealing with the appointment of Patels, and the first is of June 25, 1956, and this memorandum states that on the abolition of the Watan, Patels and Patwaris should be appointed in the resultant vacancies by the Deputy Commissioner under s. 205 of the Code and that the following decisions have been taken by the State Government in this connection—

(a) The Watan of Patels and Patwaris in Berar shall be abolished with effect from 30th September 1956.

(b) Appointment of Patels in Berar should be made by the Deputy Commissioner for one year.

Then the memorandum further states:—

"Detailed rules are being framed. You are requested to take early action for appointment of temporary Patels for one year equal to the present strength so that the new Patel may take over charge of their duties with effect from 1st October 1956."

Then the next memorandum is of July 21, 1956, and that is to the following effect:

"Government have decided that you should select persons fulfilling the conditions laid down below and submit a list to the State Government for approval before appointing them as Patels."

Then comes the list of qualifications. The next relevant memorandum is of September 29, 1956. This is addressed to the Deputy Commissioner by the Revenue Secretary, and it says:

"The list of persons submitted by you for appointment of Patels is being considered by Government. It is possible that some time may be taken in finalising the list. The appointment of new Patels must be made with effect from 1st October, 1956. Government have therefore decided that existing Patels should be appointed by you as Patels under s. 205 of the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code."

Pursuant to this, the Deputy Commissioner on the next day addressed letters to the Sub-Divisional Officers to the effect that until orders are issued by the Government on the proposals and appointments of Patels are made, all the present Patels at present working are hereby appointed temporarily under the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, s. 205. Pursuant to this, the Patels who were functioning on September 30, 1956, continued to function and their services were terminated when new appointments were made from the approved list submitted by the Officers to Government, and the grievance of these Patels was that they were appointed for one year and their services were terminated before the termination of that year. They wanted these grievances to be ventilated before the Bombay Revenue Tribunal. Their case was that the order of termination of their services was passed by the Deputy Commissioner and they had a right of appeal to the Bombay Revenue Tribunal. The Bombay Revenue Tribunal held that it had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, and these Patels, on the various applications which we have before us, have come to us challenging the order of the Revenue Tribunal, and the question that arises for our determination is that when we have an order passed under the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code by a Deputy Commissioner terminating the services of a Patel, is that order appealable, and if it is appealable, is it appealable to the Bombay Revenue Tribunal?

Now, there would have been no difficulty at all but for the fact that the State was reorganized on November 1, 1956. Before that, under the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, it was clear, as we shall presently point out, that an appeal lay to the Board of Revenue. This Board of Revenue was set up under the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code under s. 3 and its jurisdiction was defined under s. 6, and sub-s. (1) of s. 6 provides:—

"The Board shall exercise powers and discharge functions conferred upon it by or under this Code and the functions of the State Government specified in Schedule I and such other functions as have been conferred or may be conferred by or under any Central or Madhya Pradesh Act on the Chief Revenue Authority or the Chief Controlling Revenue Authority."

Then sub-s. (2) provides:

"The State Government may, subject to such conditions as it may deem fit to impose by notification, confer upon, or entrust to the board or any member of the Board additional powers or functions assigned to the State Government by or under any enactment for the time being in force."

We are not concerned with sub-s. (3). Then s. 7 confers administrative functions upon the Board:

"The Board shall, in respect of all matters subject to its appellate jurisdiction, have superintendence over all authorities in so far as such authorities deal with such matters and may call for returns."

The expression used here is "administrative functions" which may also be considered to be revisional functions, functions which a Revisional Court exercises of superintendence over Courts subordinate to it. Section 27 constitutes the Board, while exercising its powers and functions, as a Revenue Court, and s. 41 deals with appeal, revision and review from an order, and cl. (e) of sub-s. (1) provides:

"(e) if such order is passed by a Deputy Commissioner, whether exercising the powers of Deputy Commissioner or Settlement Officer during the currency of the term of settlement—to the Board."

Therefore, there can be no doubt that this order of the Deputy Commissioner under the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code was appealable and the appeal lay to the Board of Revenue. Therefore, if the reorganization had not come about and Madhya Pradesh had continued as it was, these Patels would have had the right to go in appeal to the Board of Revenue.

The question is, what is the proper authority to whom the Patels could go if they were aggrieved by an order which had been made by the Deputy Commissioner? As already pointed out, the order terminating the services came into effect after the reorganization had taken place. Their services were terminated under the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code and under the orders passed by an Officer acting under the provisions of the Land Revenue Code. The scheme of the States Reorganization Act is to set up authorities corresponding to the authorities which existed under the law of that part of the State which joined the Bombay State. Therefore, if there was an authority under the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code which functioned in Nagpur, and Nagpur having merged with the Bombay State, some corresponding authority had to be set up under the States Reorganization Act which should function in its place, and when we turn to the States Reorganization Act, that position is made clear by s. 122. Section 122 provides:

"The Central Government, as respect any Part C State, and the State Government as respects any new State or any transferred territory, may by notification in the Official Gazette, specify the authority, officer or person who, as from the appointed day, shall be competent to exercise such functions exercisable under any law in force on that day as may be mentioned in that notification and such law shall have effect accordingly." This the State Government did by a notification which really calls for interpretation at our hands. The notification states:

"In exercise of the powers conferred by s. 122 of the States Reorganization Act, read with the provisions of laws referred to in columns 1 and 2 of the Schedule hereto annexed, and all other powers enabling it in this behalf, the Government of Bombay hereby specifies in col. 6 of the Schedule the authority, officer or person as the corresponding authority, officer or person who or which in relation to the law mentioned in

col. 1 of the Schedule, shall be competent to exercise functions specified in col. 5 of the Schedule exercisable under that law by the authority, officer, or person mentioned in col. 3 of the Schedule."

When we turn to the Schedule, the relevant entry is that the law is the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, the provision is s. 3, the existing authority is the Board of Revenue, the functions are appellate and revisional powers in Revenue cases, and the corresponding authority is the Bombay Revenue Tribunal, and for all other functions the corresponding authority is the State Government.

Now, the very narrow question that arises for our decision is: Is this a Revenue case? If it is a Revenue case, then the appellate powers were exercised by the Board of Revenue and the corresponding authority which should now exercise those powers is the Bombay Revenue Tribunal. A Full Bench of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal in Abdul Latif v. Mahadeo,¹ has taken the view that this particular case is not a Revenue case and therefore this is not a case in which the Board of Revenue could have exercised appellate authority, and the case would fall under the other functions of the Board of Revenue if at all, and therefore the appeal should go to the State Government. As we understand the judgment, it really comes to this that under the law which applied to Madhya Pradesh before reorganization, if the Patel had been dismissed or his services terminated by the Deputy Commissioner and he was aggrieved by that order, he could have appealed to the Board of Revenue. But, in view of the notification issued by the Government of Bombay, the Bombay Revenue Tribunal cannot hear this appeal. The question is: What meaning and what connotation must be given to the expression "Revenue case"? If we interpret the expression "Revenue case" in its strict etymological sense, then undoubtedly a Revenue case would mean a case dealing with revenue which the State derives. It may also be true that if we were to interpret this expression in the sense in which it was used in the Government of India Act, then also it would mean a case which dealt with the revenues of the State, and it may even be that if we were to interpret it according to the Bombay law, then a Revenue case would be only that case which dealt with revenue. But, in our opinion, it is entirely fallacious to construe this expression from the point of view either of its ordinary dictionary meaning or from the point of view of its being understood in a particular way either by the Government of India or by the Bombay law. The fundamental position which has got to be accepted and appreciated is that this notification was setting up an authority to correspond to an authority which already existed under the law which applied to Nagpur, and what we have to consider is what were the functions of that authority which having ceased to exist another authority was created to take its place? Therefore, the proper approach is to consider in what sense was the expression "Revenue case" understood in Madhya Pradesh, and whether this particular decision of the Deputy Commissioner would have been appealable to the Board of Revenue, because, as we have pointed out, the object of the States Reorganization Act was not to create a vacuum, not to allow a state of affairs where persons would be deprived of their rights or would be deprived of the proper forum before which they could assert their rights, and applying that principle to the present case, the object of the States Reorganization Act was to provide to these Patels, a Tribunal corresponding to the Board of Revenue before which they could go and ventilate their grievances. If that position is appreciated, then it is not difficult to come to a decision as to whether the Bombay Revenue Tribunal was right or wrong in refusing to assume jurisdiction in this case.

Mr. Abhyankar has taken us through various Madhya Pradesh legislations which clearly establish that as far as Madhya Pradesh is concerned a Revenue case was not a case dealing with Government or State revenue, but a Revenue case was a case where an officer functioning under the Land Revenue Code, and may be other laws with which we are not concerned, gave a certain decision after entertaining certain proceedings. So that, what constituted a Revenue case was the decision by a Revenue Officer functioning under the Land Revenue Code. If that be the correct position, then there can be no doubt that as far as Madhya Pradesh was concerned, a decision of the Deputy Commissioner terminating the services of the Patels would constitute a Revenue case. Let us see whether this is the correct position. We first turn to the Hyderabad Assigned Districts Land Revenue Code of 1896. Under s. 178 of that Code r. 278 was enacted and that rule provides:

"It should be borne in mind that only those cases which are taken cognizance of by Revenue Officers as such should be considered Revenue business..." And r. 283 provides:

"A paper which constituted the commencement of a 'Revenue Case' should invariably be registered and given the number of the heading under which it falls and the date on which it was registered before any action is taken on it."

This rule is consequential upon r. 278. So, as far back as 1896, all matters which were taken cognizance of by Revenue Officers were considered as constituting Revenue business and any proceedings arising out of it as Revenue cases. This rule was continued first by the Code of 1928 and ultimately by the Code of 1955. We have also the Berar Revenue Manual and there is at p. 79 of that Manual a circular which says:

"The proceedings of Revenue Officers under the Land Revenue Code and other allied Acts as well as certain proceedings relating to general administration constitute Revenue Cases which are classified under the subject heads given in Appendix I."

Therefore, as far as this position is concerned, there is no doubt that under the Madhya Pradesh law this particular action on the part of the Deputy Commissioner would be a Revenue case. Nor is there any doubt that an appeal would have lain from his decision to the Board of Revenue.

Now, the view taken by the Bombay Revenue Tribunal is that under the Revenue Tribunal Act, under which it is constituted, it would have no jurisdiction to hear this case. That is perfectly correct because, as we have pointed out, the expression "Revenue" is understood in a different sense in Bombay, and we will concede that if this case had arisen in Bombay, the Revenue Tribunal would have no jurisdiction. But, with great respect, the error into which the Revenue Tribunal has fallen is this. It is not considering and it should not consider the jurisdiction it is exercising under the Bombay Revenue Tribunal Act. What has to be considered is the jurisdiction it is exercising under the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code. It is that jurisdiction that is conferred upon it by the States Reorganization Act and by the relevant notification to which we have drawn attention. If we may so put it, it is an additional jurisdiction conferred upon the Bombay Revenue Tribunal and the extent and ambit of that jurisdiction must be judged by the provisions of the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code and not by the provisions of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal Act. Therefore, in our opinion, the Revenue Tribunal was in error in refusing to assume jurisdiction in the case of these appeals preferred by different Patels whose services were terminated under the circumstances we have indicated and whose appeals under the Madhya Pradesh Law would have lain to the Board of Revenue.

We will, therefore, quash the order passed by the Bombay Revenue Tribunal and direct it to deal with the appeals preferred by the Patels according to law. Petitioners to get the costs.

Order accordingly.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

[NAGPUR BENCH]

*Before Mr. Justice Mudholkar and Mr. Justice Kotval.SHANKARRAO BALADAS NIKHARE v. SECOND ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE, NAGPUR.

City of Nagpur Corporation Act (II of 1950), Secs. 9(3), 420(2)(f)—Rules framed under Act, r. 9(2)—Voter entering polling booth before closing hour but not obtaining voting paper before closing hour—Whether such voter could be excluded from voting under r. 9(2).

Under r. 9(2) of the Rules framed under s. 9(3) read with s. 420(2)(f) of the Nagpur Corporation Act, 1948, if a voter has entered the polling booth before the closing hour appointed in this behalf, then, whether he has obtained a voting paper or not, he would be entitled to vote.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

M. N. Phadke, for the petitioner.

M. P. Kelkar, for respondent No. 2.

KOTVAL J. This is a petition by a defeated candidate in a municipal election to the Corporation of the city of Nagpur. The petitioner and respondents Nos. 2, 3 and 4 were candidates for election as councillor from ward No. 29 of the city of Nagpur. The election was held on June 11, 1957, between 8-30 a.m. and 4-30 p.m. Respondents Nos. 5 to 9 had also filed their nomination papers but had withdrawn before the date of election and they are made parties in this petition to obviate any formal objection. Respondent No. 2 was declared elected. He obtained 967 votes while the petitioner got 946 votes. The difference thus was only of 21 votes.

In the election petition filed by the petitioner under s. 428 of the City of Nagpur Corporation Act, the Second Additional District Judge, Nagpur, acting as the District Court declared 16 of these 21 votes invalid. Thus the difference in the votes obtained by respondent No. 2, the elected candidate, and the petitioner was only of 5 votes. The District Court held the election of respondent No. 2 valid.

Among other grounds, Mr. Phadke, appearing on behalf of the petitioner, has raised ground No. 11 in his petition which is to the effect that "The election officers illegally refused the right to vote to forty voters who had presented themselves before the Polling Officer before the closing time and hence by not giving an opportunity to these forty voters to vote the result of the election is materially affected."

On this question the District Court framed issue No. 5(a). It answered the issue in the negative. The District Court referred, among other witnesses, to the evidence of respondent No. 2 and it found that

"These witnesses also stated that all of these voters were standing in the queue since before 4-30 P.M. Even the petitioner admitted that he did not find any voting papers with those persons and that he had only found them standing at booths Nos. 5 and 6 at about 4-30 P.M. and onwards...I therefore hold that about 20 persons who had reached the polling station before 4-30 P.M. could not exercise their right of vote because they could not obtain ballot papers because the voters standing ahead of them had not also done so by that time."

Mr. Phadke accepts this finding, but he urges that on this finding, these 20 voters were illegally excluded from voting. In spite of the District Court's finding that some 20 voters were unable to exercise their franchise because of the rush of voters and because of others standing in a queue ahead of them, it decided the issue in the negative, because it relied on the provisions of r. 9(2) of the Rules framed under s. 9(3) read with s. 420(2)(f).

*Decided, August 7, 1958. Special Civil Application No. 145 of 1958.

Rule 9(2) runs as follows:

"The polling officer shall close the polling station at the hour appointed in this behalf by the Chief Executive Officer under rule 1, so as to prevent the admission thereto of any elector after that hour, but any elector who has been furnished with a voting paper shall be allowed a reasonable opportunity to record his vote."

It is an admitted fact that the closing hour was 4-30 p.m. Now the view which the District Court took was that because 20 voters had not succeeded in obtaining the ballot papers by 4-30 p.m. the polling officer was bound to exclude them. In other words, the District Court read the clause occurring in r. 9(2) "so as to prevent the admission thereto of any elector after that hour" as implying that the polling officer was bound to have the door of the polling booth closed and exclude all voters from voting whether the voters had entered the booth or not, unless they were already given a ballot paper.

Rule 9(2) is in two parts. The first part lays down the duty of the polling officer to close the polling station at the appointed hour i.e. at 4-30 p.m. so as to prevent voters from entering after that time. The second part lays down the duty of the polling officer to allow any elector who has received a voting paper a reasonable opportunity of recording his vote. The latter part presumably applies to all voters whether in or out of the polling booth, but with this part we are not immediately concerned. For the purposes of this petition we would point out that the rule does not say anything about persons who are inside the polling booth at 4-30 when the booth is closed. It also does not say that they shall be excluded from voting after 4-30 p.m.

Counsel for respondent No. 2 urged that that is the necessary implication to be drawn from the first part of the rule. He urged that there would be no sense in ordering the polling officer to close the booth at 4-30 p.m. and in also directing him to continue to permit voting. He also emphasized that the two clauses of the rule are connected by the word 'but' thus showing that they are in opposition to each other.

The first part of the rule itself states the purpose for which it was made viz. "so as to prevent the admission thereto of any elector after that hour". It does not at all deal with the cases of those voters who have already gained admission to the polling booth by 4-30 p.m. The word 'but' which has been used to connect the two clauses was, in our opinion, merely inserted to provide for the exceptional case viz. that even a voter who at 4-30 p.m. is not inside the booth by some fortuitous circumstance should be allowed to vote if he has been furnished with a voting paper.

We think that it is against all principles governing a right of free franchise that in the absence of any specific provision governing his case, a voter who has entered the polling booth before the closing but who has, on account of rush of voters or voters standing before him in a queue, been unable to vote should not be allowed to do so simply because the polling officer is enjoined to prevent further admission after the closing hour.

We are thus unable to accept the interpretation of r. 9(2) which prevailed with the District Court. On the other hand, it seems to us that if a voter had entered the polling booth, then, whether he had obtained a voting paper or not, he would be entitled to vote. Unfortunately, the finding reached by the District Court is not a finding on this precise point, but the District Court accepted the evidence of certain witnesses including that of the petitioner on this point. The petitioner in his evidence stated as follows:

"At about 4-30 P.M. I had gone to booth No. 5. I found that there were 12 voters admitted inside the booth and who had not voted until then."

In para. 14 he further stated:

"I did not find any ballot papers with those 8 to 10 persons."

The witness does not, of course, prove the exact number which had been excluded. That is otherwise proved. But he certainly proves that at least 12 voters were excluded though they were inside the polling booth at 4-30 p.m.

In our opinion, this evidence which was accepted by the District Court can only show that r. 9(2) was not complied with. These persons were, therefore, illegally excluded from exercising their franchise. As we have indicated above, the difference in the votes received by respondent No. 2 and by the petitioner was only five. Therefore, if 12 voters were illegally excluded from the election, the result of the election would be materially affected. For these reasons, we are unable to sustain the finding of the District Court on issue No. 5(a). We set it aside and declare the election of respondent No. 2 June 1956 void.

Rule 15(c) read with r. 16 of the Rules framed under s. 420(3) (xviii) and (xix) of the Act enact that if an election is declared void, as we have done, the Court may either declare that a casual vacancy has been created, or that the applicant or any other candidate has been duly elected. The second alternative cannot be availed of by the petitioner in this case because it is impossible to say for whom the excluded voters would have voted. Therefore, the only proper order to pass in the present case would be that the petition is allowed, the election is declared void and a declaration is made that a casual vacancy has been created in ward No. 29 of the City of Nagpur Corporation. We order accordingly.

In the circumstances there shall be no order as to costs throughout.

Order accordingly.

Even an obiter of the Supreme Court of India deserves the highest respect and it is incumbent upon the High Court to accept even the obiter as correctly laying down the law.

When in a case a particular clause of a section or an article in the Constitution of India calls for interpretation, and in order to interpret it the Supreme Court interprets the whole section or article and lays down the proper canon of construction, that interpretation is binding upon the High Court unless the Supreme Court in any subsequent decision has departed from the interpretation laid down by it in this decision.

ONE Narayanlal Bansilal (petitioner) was the manager and Karta of a joint and undivided Hindu family, consisting of himself and his three sons, and the joint family carried on business in the firm name and style of Messrs. Narayanlal Bansilal. The petitioner as the manager and Karta of the joint family managed and looked after the business of Messrs. Narayanlal Bansilal. Messrs. Narayanlal Bansilal were the Managing Agents of the Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as the company): The company was a public limited company incorporated under the provisions of the Indian Companies Act VII of 1913. The company owned a sugar factory at Harinagar in the State of Bihar and carried on business of manufacturing sugar at the factory and selling such sugar. The petitioner looked after the business and affairs of the company subject to the control and supervision of the directors of the company. The Registrar of Companies by his letter dated February 14, 1954, called upon the company to furnish certain information to the Registrar under s. 137 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913. The company sent a reply on April 30, 1954. The Registrar of Companies on November 15, 1954, addressed a letter to the company, stating that it had been represented to him under s. 137(6) of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, that the business of the company was being carried on "in fraud". He called upon the company to furnish certain information in connection with various matters set out in that letter. At the end of that letter the Registrar stated that he was giving an opportunity to the company under s. 137(6) of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, of being heard and producing such evidence as the company might desire to disprove the allegations contained in the said letter. On April 15, 1955, the Registrar of Companies made a report to the Central Government under s. 137(5) of the Indian Companies Act, 1913. In the course of that report the Registrar observed that the affairs of the company were carried on in fraud of the contributories and that the affairs of the company disclosed an unsatisfactory state of affairs. In the course of his report, the Registrar further observed that the moneys of the company were utilised for the purchase of farms at Harpur and Bhawanipur for and on behalf of the petitioner. He further observed that the farms having been purchased out of the funds of the company, the income thereof should have been included in the company's books of account. He opined that the profits derived from such farms appeared to have been misappropriated. He further stated that there was no doubt that the Managing Agents were utilising the property of the company for their personal gain. He stated that the company had to pay compensation to one Shri Vallabh Ramdeo Pittie in the sums of Rs. 1,83,995 and Rs. 6,35,937 in respect of a contract for the sale of sugar entered into with him, which could not be fulfilled. He observed that the whole transaction appeared to be bogus. He stated that the company must be aware of the fact that the company would not be able to honour the contract and that the management perhaps to benefit by such transaction might have entered into the aforesaid contract, perhaps deliberately to share the compensation. The Registrar stated that the income-tax authorities had also required the reopening of the income-tax assessment of the previous years on the ground of suppression of true income, false debits and suppression of sales which disclosed that the affairs of the company were actually carried on in fraud and that the company had been borrowing moneys ostensibly for the purpose of investing in or financing the other companies in which the petitioner appeared to be interested.

On November 1, 1955, the Central Government issued an order which stated that a report under sub-s. (5) of s. 137 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, had been submitted by the Registrar of Companies on the affairs of the Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd., Bombay, and that the Central Government considered it desirable that an inspector should be appointed under sub-s. (iv) of s. 138 of the said Act to investigate into the affairs of the company and to report thereon. The Central Government, therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred by sub-s. (iv) of s. 138 of the Act appointed one Maneck P. Mistry as an inspector to investigate into the affairs of the company from the date of its incorporation and point out all irregularities and contraventions in respect of the provisions of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, or any other law and report in the manner indicated in a separate communication sent to him. The relevant portions of the communication were as under:—

"While investigating the affairs of companies, inspectors should bear in mind that for a successful prosecution the evidence in support of a charge must be clear, tangible and cogent. They should, therefore, specify in their reports with reference to the evidence, either oral or documentary or both collected during the investigations, on the following among other matters:—

- (a) What the charge in brief is;
- (b) What is the offence committed, quoting as far as possible the section contravened;
- (c) names, designation and addresses of the accused who are alleged to have committed the offence;
- (d) the precise evidence, oral, documentary, or both, which implicates each of the named accused and goes to prove the charge; and
- (e) in case of misappropriation, the amount misappropriated. Charges should be enumerated by successive serial numbers in the report and the evidence available in support of each charge and the inspectors' findings thereon should be discussed and indicated thereunder...

Inspectors should make proper use of the rights available to them under section 140 of the Act including the right to examine a person on oath. Questions should be so put to persons examined on oath as to bring out their admissions with reference to facts, books and accounts and other documents relating to the company."

The communication further stated that the examination of officers of the company made by the inspector should be conducted in private and that the inspector was not entitled to make public the information received by him on examination as aforesaid.

On April 1, 1956, the Indian Companies Act, 1956, came into operation. On April 27, 1956, respondent No. 1 as the inspector appointed by the Central Government addressed a notice to the petitioner, stating that under sub-s. (2) of s. 140 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, he had to examine the petitioner on oath in relation to the business of the company and requested the petitioner to attend his office on May 10, 1956, for that purpose. He further drew the attention of the petitioner to sub-s. (3) of s. 140 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, which provided for a fine of Rs. 50 for each offence if a person refused to answer any question relating to the affairs of the company. On May 8, 1956, the petitioner's attorneys asked for an adjournment until the first week of June 1956. Respondent No. 1 did not grant the adjournment as requested, but gave a fresh appointment fixing May 15, 1956, for examining the petitioner. On the same day he required the petitioner to produce various books and documents and drew the attention of the petitioner to the provisions of s. 240(3) of the new Companies Act, 1956, which deal with the question of contempt of Court for a refusal to produce any books or papers required to be produced by the inspector. Between June 6, 1956, and July 31, 1956, the petitioner was examined by respondent No. 1 on solemn affirmation on or about 14 different occasions. On June 6, 1956, the petitioner had appeared before respondent No. 1 with his attorneys. During the course of his examination the petitioner was asked about the various documents which the petitioner had been called upon to produce. The petitioner expressed his inability to produce the same, stating that he would produce the same, if so advised, by his lawyers. Respondent No. 1 drew the attention of the petitioner in terms to provisions of s. 240 of the new Companies Act and read out the same and explained the import thereof to the petitioner. On June 11, 1956, the petitioner had appeared with his attorneys before the inspector. At the end of the day's proceedings, an application was made on behalf of the petitioner for an adjournment for about 2-3 days in order to enable the petitioner to consult his counsel on the point whether the proceedings before the inspector, which were being carried on under the new Companies Act, were competent in law having regard to the fact that the inspector had been appointed under the old Companies Act, 1913. Respondent No. 1 as such inspector had also issued notices against L. H. Daga and B. Jhalani, two of the other Directors of the said company and Chandmal Choradia, the Chief Accountant of the company for their examination under s. 140(2) of the Indian Companies Act, 1913. Respondent No. 1 examined on solemn affirmation L. H. Daga. B. Jhalani did not appear before him and Choradia made a statement before him without being put on solemn affirmation. Respondent No. 1 made an interim report to the Central Government.

On July 26, 1956, the Central Government in exercise of its powers under sub-s. (2) of s. 239 of the Companies Act, 1956, accorded its approval to respondent No. 1 as an inspector exercising the powers of investigating into and reporting on the affairs of

(ii) Messrs. Narainlal Bansilal, the Managing Agents of Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd;

(iv) Harinagar Cane Farm."

The order referred to the correspondence carried on by the inspector with the Central Government, resting with his letter dated June 2, 1956. It in terms referred to the memorandum of respondent No. 1 regarding the progress of the investigation. On May 9, 1957, respondent No. 1 addressed a notice to the petitioner "by virtue of the provisions contained in s. 240 of the Companies Act, 1956." After reciting that the petitioner was an officer and agent of the company, respondent No. 1 called upon the petitioner to attend the office of respondent No. 1 on May 14, 1957, for the purpose of being examined on oath in relation to the affairs of the company. By this notice he called upon the petitioner to produce several books of account and papers. Among the books of account and papers required to be produced were the personal books of account of the petitioner from the year 1933 to the date of the notice, the books of account of Messrs. Narayanlal Bansilal, the Managing Agents of Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd. from the year 1933 to the date of the notice and the books of account of Harinagar Cane Farm from 1934 to the date of the notice. The petitioner did not appear on the appointed day, but applied for an adjournment. Thereafter on May 16, 1957, another notice in terms similar to the notice dated May 9, 1957, was addressed to the petitioner. The petitioner did not appear in pursuance of that notice and applied for an adjournment on the ground of sudden illness. On May 29, 1957, respondent No. 1 addressed a third notice to the petitioner in terms similar to the notice dated May 9, 1957. As the petitioner again did not attend, a fourth notice was addressed to the petitioner on June 29, 1957, in terms similar to the notice issued to the petitioner on May 9, 1957. On July 5, 1957, the petitioner with his attorneys and counsel appeared before respondent No. 1. At that time counsel for the petitioner submitted that respondent No. 1 was not entitled to proceed with the investigation as his appointment as an inspector as also the proceedings taken by him were ultra vires the Constitution and offended against arts. 14 and 20 of the Constitution. He also submitted that respondent No. 1 had no right in law to summon any witnesses under s. 240 of the new Act and that he was not entitled in law to call upon the witnesses to produce before him books of account, documents etc. Respondent No. 1 adjourned the matter to July 12, 1957.

On July 10, 1957, the petitioner filed the present petition against respondent No. 1 as well as the Union of India (respondent No. 2) for the issue of a writ of certiorari or any other appropriate direction, order or writ under art. 226 of the Constitution of India against respondent No. 1 calling for the records of the case relating to the aforesaid notices, the said examination of the petitioner and L. H. Daga, B. Jhalani and Chandmal Choradia made by respondent No. 1 and the interim report made by respondent No. 1 to the Central Government and for quashing and setting aside the notices, the examination and the interim report. He further prayed for the issue of a writ of prohibition or any other appropriate direction, order or writ under art. 226 of the Constitution of India prohibiting and restraining respondent No. 1 from acting upon or proceeding under the notices and/or from making any investigation under or in pursuance of the notices and/or from exercising any powers of investigation under ss. 239 and/or 240 of the Companies Act, 1956, and/or from investigating into the affairs of any of the persons and concerns mentioned in the petition. The petitioner further prayed for the issue of a writ of mandamus or a writ in the nature of mandamus or any other appropriate direction, order or writ under art. 226 of the Constitution of India directing respondent No. 1 to withdraw and/or cancel the notices and to forbear from acting or proceeding under the notices and/or from making any investigation under or in pursuance of the notices and/or from exercising any powers under ss. 239 and/or 240 of the Companies Act, 1956, and/or from investigating into the affairs of any of the persons and concerns mentioned in the petition.

The petition came up for hearing before K. T. Desai J. who dismissed it on April 8, 1958, observing in his judgment as follows:—

K. T. DESAI J. The principal contention advanced by Mr. Manecksha, the learned counsel for the petitioner, is that s. 240 of the new Companies Act under which respondent No. 1 required the production of documents by the petitioner and under which he examined and desired further to examine the petitioner on solemn affirmation is void and inoperative in law as offending against the provisions of art. 20(3) and art. 14 of the Constitution. He further urges that the provisions contained in s. 239 of the new Act, under which the Central Government accorded its approval to respondent No. 1 exercising the powers of investigating into and reporting on the affairs of "Shiv Narainlal Bansilal (including his personal books of account), Messrs. Narainlal Bansilal, the Managing Agents of Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd., the Shangrila Food Products Limited and the Harinagar Cane Farm", are illegal, void and inoperative in law as being in violation of the fundamental rights guaranteed under the Constitution under art. 20(3) and art. 14 of the Constitution. He further contends that apart from the constitutionality of the provisions contained in ss. 239 and 240 of the new Act, respondent No. 1, being a person appointed under the provisions of s. 138 of the old Companies Act, 1913, had no right to require the production of any documents or to examine any person under the provisions of s. 239 or 240 of the new Act and that the notices issued by respondent No. 1 and the proceedings taken by him since the coming into force of the new Companies Act are without jurisdiction, void and inoperative in law. In para. 11 of the petition the order of the Central Government, dated July 26, 1956, (exh. D) has been challenged on the ground that it violated the provisions of art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution. The said argument, however, has not been urged before me at the hearing. It is further stated that the said order is null and void as the same has been passed without giving a hearing to the petitioner and without giving any opportunity to the petitioner to show cause against the same and that it has been passed contrary to the fundamental principles of natural justice. At the hearing of the petition, the said argument has not been urged before me. In para. 12(a) of the petition it has been stated as under:—

"The said examination was made by the 1st respondent in purported exercise of his powers under section 140 of the Indian Companies Act VII of 1913 as appears clearly from the said notice Exh. "E" hereto. After the commencement of the Companies Act 1956 the 1st respondent was not entitled to exercise any powers under section 140 of the Indian Companies Act VII of 1913 inasmuch as the said section stood repealed on 1st April 1956 on the commencement of the Companies Act, 1956."

It was not contended before me that the examination was held in the exercise of powers conferred under s. 140 of the Indian Companies Act. It was, on the contrary, strongly urged before me that the examination was held under the provisions of s. 240 of the new Companies Act and that it clearly appeared from the notices, exh. E, that respondent No. 1 was purporting to act in exercise of powers conferred under s. 240 of the new Act. The learned counsel for the petitioner did not contend at the hearing that respondent No. 1 was not entitled to exercise any powers under s. 140 of the Indian Companies Act VII of 1913 after the repeal of the said section under the new Companies Act. In the affidavit in reply of respondent No. 1, which has been adopted by respondent No. 2, it is urged that the petitioner has been guilty of gross delay in filing the petition and that the petition is liable to be dismissed on that ground. It is further urged that the petition has not been filed bona fide and it is submitted that the petition is premature, misconceived and not maintainable as the investigation had still to be completed. At the hearing none of the aforesaid contentions has been pressed by the learned Advocate General who appears for the respondents. My attention was drawn to various statements contained in the affidavit of respondent No. 1 in order to show that after the coming into force of the new Companies Act, respondent No. 1 purported to act under the provisions of the new Companies Act. As that statement has not been disputed before me, it is not necessary for me to examine the various documents and the statements made by the parties in connection therewith. The learned Advocate General stated that he desired to meet the constitutional challenge to the provisions of ss. 239 and 240 of the Indian Companies Act, 1956, and did not press any of the preliminary objections.

Article 20 of the Constitution provides as under:—

"20. (1) No person shall be convicted of any offence except for violation of a law in force at the time of the commission of the act charged as an offence, nor be subjected to a penalty greater than that which might have been inflicted under the law in force at the time of the commission of the offence.

(2) No person shall be prosecuted and punished for the same offence more than once.

(3) No person accused of any offence shall be compelled to be a witness against himself."

It is urged that the provisions of ss. 239 and 240 of the new Companies Act offend against the fundamental rights guaranteed under art. 20(3) of the Constitution. It is submitted by the learned counsel for the petitioner that the provisions contained in art. 20(3) should be liberally construed and that the Court should look more to the substance than to the sound. It is urged that the Inspector who has been appointed by the Central Government to investigate into the affairs of the company because of the report of the Registrar of Companies, which contained allegations about the petitioner having carried on the business of the company fraudulently and about the petitioner having committed the offence, among others, of criminal breach of trust, would have to examine the petitioner in connection with the offences which he is alleged to have committed; that under the provisions of s. 240(3) the petitioner is compellable to make a statement on solemn affirmation in connection therewith; that his testimony is liable to be used against him in any criminal proceeding and that he is liable to be prosecuted for offences, which may be discovered to have been committed by him as a result of the investigation by the Inspector. It is urged that in case he has committed any offence he is obliged to confess to a crime or be prosecuted for perjury or for contempt and that this clearly violates the constitutional guarantee given under art. 20(3) of the Constitution. The argument in substance is that if a person has committed an offence, if he was compelled to answer truthfully he would be compelled on solemn affirmation or oath to confess to a crime; that if he answered falsely he was liable to be prosecuted for perjury and that if he refused to answer, he was liable to be committed for contempt.

Mr. Manecksha referred to three judgments of the Supreme Court of the United States of America relating to the construction of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. That amendment inter alia provided as under: "No person... shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." The decision in Counselman v. Hitchcock,¹ lays down that the privilege given by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself extends to a proceeding before a grand jury. In Willis Constitutional Law of the United States, it has been stated at page 543 that the function of a grand jury is to inquire whether or not a crime has been committed. If it finds that a crime has been committed, it then charges a person with the crime and returns its charge to the Court. That charge is the indictment or presentment. That case lays down that the privilege is available not merely in the proceedings before a Court where the trial takes place, but in prior proceedings when the investigation whether a crime has or has not been committed takes place before a grand jury. Mr. Justice Blatchford, who delivered the opinion of the Court, observes in that case as follows (p. 1113):—

"It is broadly contended on the part of the appellee that a witness is not entitled to plead the privilege of silence, except in a criminal case against himself; but such is not the language of the Constitution. Its provision is that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself. This provision must have a broad construction in favour of the right which it was intended to secure. The matter under investigation by the grand jury in this case was a criminal matter, to inquire whether there had been a criminal violation of the Interstate Commerce Act. If Counselman had been guilty of the matters inquired of in the questions which he refused to answer, he himself was liable to criminal prosecution under the Act. The case before the grand jury was, therefore, a criminal case. The reason given by Counselman for his refusal to answer the question was that his answers might tend to criminate him, and showed that his apprehension was that, if he answered the questions truly and fully (as he was bound to do if he should answer them at all), the answers might show that he had committed a crime against the Interstate Commerce Act, for which he might be prosecuted. His answers, therefore, would be testimony against himself, and he would be compelled to give them in a criminal case.

1 (1890) 143 U. S. 547, 35 Law. ed. 1110.

It is impossible that the meaning of the constitutional provision can only be, that a person shall not be compelled to be a witness against himself in a criminal prosecution against himself. It would doubtless cover such cases; but it is not limited to them. The object was to insure that a person should not be compelled, when acting as a witness in any investigation, to give testimony which might tend to show that he himself had committed a crime. The privilege is limited to criminal matters, but it is as broad as the mischief against which it seeks to guard...

It is an ancient principle of the law of evidence, that a witness shall not be compelled, in any proceeding, to make disclosures or to give testimony which will tend to criminate him or subject him to fines, penalties or forfeitures."

The case of *Blau v. United States*¹ lays down that a witness called to testify before a Federal grand jury cannot, over his claim of privilege against self-incrimination under the Fifth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, be compelled to answer questions concerning the Communist Party or his employment by it, where a Federal statute makes it a crime to advocate knowingly the desirability of overthrow of the government by force or violence, to organize or help to organize any society or group which advocates such overthrow or to be or become a member of such a group with knowledge of its purposes, since these provisions make future prosecution of the witness far more than a mere imaginary possibility. Mr. Justice Black, who delivered the opinion of the Court, observes as follows (p. 172):—

"...Answers to the questions asked by the grand jury would have furnished a link in the chain of evidence needed in a prosecution of petitioner for violation of (or conspiracy to violate) the Smith Act. Prior decisions of this Court have clearly established that under such circumstances, the Constitution gives a witness the privilege of remaining silent."

The case of Boyd v. United States,² relied upon by Mr. Manecksha, was a case where the proceedings were in rem to establish a forfeiture of certain goods alleged to have been fraudulently imported without paying the duties thereon, pursuant to the 12th section of the Act to amend the Customs Revenue Laws. It was there held that an order of the Court requiring the claimants of the goods to produce a certain invoice in Court for the inspection of the government attorney, and to be offered in evidence by him, was an unconstitutional exercise of authority and that the inspection of the invoice by the attorney and its admission in evidence were erroneous and unconstitutional proceedings. Mr. Justice Bradley, who delivered the opinion of the Court, observes as follows (p. 751):—

"...Now it is elementary knowledge that one cardinal rule of the court of chancery is never to decree a discovery which might tend to convict the party of a crime, or to forfeit his property. And any compulsory discovery by extorting the party's oath, or compelling the production of his private books and papers, to convict him of crime or to forfeit his property, is contrary to the principles of a free government. It is abhorrent to the instincts of an Englishman; it is abhorrent to the instincts of an American. It may suit the purposes of despotic power; but it cannot abide the pure atmosphere of political liberty and personal freedom."

At p. 752, the learned Judge further observes as under:—

"...The information, though technically a civil proceeding, is in substance and effect a criminal one...As, therefore, suits for penalties and forfeitures, incurred by the commission of offences against the law, are of this quasi criminal nature, we think that they are within the reason of criminal proceedings for all the purposes of the Fourth Amendment of the Constitution, and of that portion of the Fifth Amendment which declares that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, and we are further of opinion that a compulsory production of the private books and papers of the owner of goods sought to be forfeited in such a suit is compelling him to be a witness against himself, within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution;...but illegitimate and unconstitutional practices get their first footing in that way, namely: by silent approaches and slight deviations from legal modes of procedure. This can only be obviated by adhering to the rule that constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed. A close and literal construction deprives them of half their efficacy and leads to gradual depreciation of the right, as if it consisted more in sound than in substance. It is the duty of courts to be watchful for the constitutional rights of the citizen, and against any stealthy encroachments thereon. Their motto should be obsta principiis. We have no doubt that the legislative body is actuated by the same motives; but the vast accumulation of public business brought before it sometimes prevents it, on a first presentation, from noticing objections which become developed by time and the practical application of the objectionable law..."

Mr. Manecksha invites me to follow the principles laid down in these American cases and to hold that the constitutional guarantee given in art. 20(3) renders the provisions of ss. 239 and 240 of the new Companies Act nugatory.

The Supreme Court of America has no doubt given a very extended meaning to the words contained in the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution. The Supreme Court of America has gone so far as to extend the constitutional protection of a witness against self-incrimination to civil proceedings. My attention has been drawn to the case of McCarthy v. Arndstein,¹ where it has been set out that the constitutional protection of a witness against self-incrimination applies in civil proceedings.

The principle of testimonial compulsion against self-incrimination is not a universally accepted principle of jurisprudence. The maxim embodying it is nemo tenetur seipsum prodere which means that no one is bound to criminate himself and to place himself in peril. Wigmore in this connection says (section 2251) as follows:—

"Indirectly and ultimately it works for good—for the good of the innocent accused and of the community at large. But directly and concretely it works for ill, for the protection of the guilty and the consequent derangement of civic order. There ought to be an end of judicial cant towards crime. We have already too much of what a wit has called 'justice tampered with mercy'. The privilege therefore should be kept within limits, the strictest possible."

Some Judges have pronounced against the retention of this privilege stating that it has outlived its usefulness. In Ex-parte Reynolds,² Jessel, M. R. said: "Perhaps our law has gone too far in that direction". Our Supreme Court in the case of M. P. Sharma v. Satish Chandra, District Magistrate, Delhi,³ has observed at pp. 1085 and 1086 as follows:—

"Since the time when the principle of protection against self-incrimination became established in English law and in other systems of law which have followed it, there has been considerable debate as to the utility thereof and serious doubts were held in some quarters that this principle has a tendency to defeat justice. In support of the principle it is claimed that the protection of accused against self-incrimination promotes active investigation from external sources to find out the truth and proof of alleged or suspected crime instead of extortion of confessions on unverified suspicion. (See Wigmore on Evidence, Vol. VIII, page 300). It is also claimed that that privilege in its application to witnesses as regards oral testimony and production of documents affords to them in general a free atmosphere in which they can be persuaded to come forward to furnish evidence in courts and be of substantial help in elucidating truth in a case, with reference to material within their knowledge and in their possession. (See Wigmore on Evidence, Vol. VIII, page 307). On the other hand, the opinion has been strongly held in some quarters that this rule has an undesirable effect on social interests and that in the detection of crime, the State is confronted with overwhelming difficulties as a result of this privilege. It is said this has become a hiding place of crime and has outlived its usefulness and that the rights of accused persons are amply protected without this privilege and that no innocent person is in need of it. (See Wigmore on Evidence, Vol. VIII, pages 314 and 315). Certain passages at pages 441 and 442 of Vol. I of Stephen's History of the Criminal Law of England are also instructive in this context and show a similar divergence of opinion."

In dealing with the constitutional guarantee contained in art. 20(3) of the Constitution, Mr. Justice Jagannadhadas in that case further observes as follows (p. 1086):—

"In view of the above background, there is no inherent reason to construe the ambit of this fundamental right as comprising a very wide range. Nor would it be legitimate to confine it to the barely literal meaning of the words used, since it is a recognised doctrine that when appropriate a constitutional provision has to be liberally construed, so as to advance the intentment thereof and to prevent its circumvention."

There are three important reported judgments of our Supreme Court cited at the bar dealing with art. 20 of the Constitution. The first of such cases is the case of Maqbool Hussain v. The State of Bombay.¹ That was a case under the Sea Customs Act, and the provisions of the Constitution which came up directly for consideration were those contained in art. 20(2) of the Constitution. In that case, proceedings had been taken by the Sea Customs authorities against a person under s. 167 of the Sea Customs Act and an order for confiscation of goods had been passed. Thereafter that person was prosecuted before the Presidency Magistrate for an offence under s. 23 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act in respect of the same act. Mr. Justice Bhagwati, who delivered the judgment of the Court, held that the proceeding before the Sea Customs authorities was not a "prosecution" and the order for confiscation was not a punishment inflicted by a Court or Judicial Tribunal within the meaning of art. 20(2) of the Constitution and that the prosecution before the Presidency Magistrate was not barred. At p. 738 the learned Judge observes as follows:—

"The words 'before a court of law or judicial tribunal' are not to be found in article 20(2). But if regard be had to the whole background indicated above it is clear that in order that the protection of article 20(2) be invoked by a citizen there must have been a prosecution and punishment in respect of the same offence before a court of law or a tribunal, required by law to decide the matters in controversy judicially on evidence on oath which it must be authorised by law to administer and not before a tribunal which entertains a departmental or an administrative enquiry even though set up by a statute but not required to proceed on legal evidence given on oath. The very wording of article 20 and the words used therein:—'convicted', 'commission of the act charged as an offence', 'be subjected to a penalty', 'commission of the offence', 'prosecuted and punished', 'accused of any offence', would indicate that the proceedings therein contemplated are of the nature of criminal proceedings before a court of law or a judicial tribunal and the prosecution in this context would mean an initiation or starting of proceedings of a criminal nature before a court of law or a judicial tribunal in accordance with the procedure prescribed in the statute which creates the offence and regulates the procedure."

The words "commission of the act charged as an offence" and the words "be subjected to a penalty" appear in art. 20(1) of the Constitution. The words "accused of any offence" appear in art. 20(3) of the Constitution. These words have been pressed into service by the learned Judge in order to give the correct meaning to the words used in art. 20(2) of the Constitution. According to the learned Judge, having regard to the subject-matter of art. 20, the words used in art. 20(2) contemplate proceedings of the nature of criminal proceedings before a Court of law or a judicial tribunal. The learned Judge has, after referring to the various provisions of the Sea Customs Act, further observed as follows (p. 743):—

"...All these provisions go to show that far from being authorities bound by any rules of evidence or procedure established by law and invested with power to enforce their own judgments or orders the Sea Customs Authorities are merely constituted administrative machinery for the purpose of adjudging confiscation, increased rates of duty and penalty prescribed in the Act...

We are of the opinion that the Sea Customs Authorities are not a judicial tribunal and the adjudging of confiscation, increased rate of duty or penalty under the provisions of the Sea Customs Act do not constitute a judgment or order of a Court or judicial tribunal necessary for the purpose of supporting a plea of double jeopardy."

The next case on the subject is the case which I have already referred to viz., M. P. Sharma v. Satish Chandra District, Magistrate, Delhi.¹ That was a case of a person against whom a first information report had been lodged with the police, and the District Magistrate had ordered an investigation of the offences and issued warrants for simultaneous searches for discovery of the documents pertaining thereto. The petitioner in that case prayed for quashing the search warrants and asked for the return of documents seized in pursuance thereof. In dealing with art. 20(3) Mr. Justice Jagannadhas, who delivered the judgment of the Court, observes as under (p. 1086):—

"... (1) It is a right pertaining to a person 'accused of an offence'; (2) It is a protection against 'compulsion to be a witness'; and (3) It is a protection against such compulsion resulting in his giving evidence 'against himself'. The cases with which we are concerned have been presented to us on the footing that the persons against whom the search warrants were issued, were all of them persons against whom the First Information Report was lodged and who were included in the category of accused therein and that therefore they are persons 'accused of an offence' within the meaning of article 20(3) and also that the documents for whose search the warrants were issued, being required for investigation into the alleged offences, such searches were for incriminating material...

Broadly stated the guarantee in article 20(3) is against 'testimonial compulsion'. It is suggested that this is confined to the oral evidence of a person standing his trial for an offence when called to the witness-stand. We can see no reason to confine the content of the constitutional guarantee to this barely literal import. So to limit it would be to rob the guarantee of its substantial purpose and to miss the substance for the sound as stated in certain American decisions. The phrase used in Article 20(3) is 'to be a witness'. A person can 'be a witness' not merely by giving oral evidence but also by producing documents or making intelligible gestures as in the case of a dumb witness (see section 119 of the Evidence Act) or the like. 'To be a witness' is nothing more than 'to furnish evidence', and such evidence can be furnished through the lips or by production of a thing or of a document or in other modes... Nor is there any reason to think that the protection in respect of the evidence so procured is confined to what transpires at the trial in the court room. The phrase used in article 20(3) is 'to be a witness' and not to 'appear as a witness'. It follows that the protection afforded to an accused in so far as it is related to the phrase 'to be a witness' is not merely in respect of testimonial compulsion in the court room but may well extend to compelled testimony previously obtained from him. It is available therefore to a person against whom a formal accusation relating to the commission of an offence has been levelled which in the normal course may result in prosecution. Whether it is available to other persons in other situations does not call for decision in this case."

That case clearly lays down that where there is a formal accusation relating to the commission of an offence, the constitutional guarantee under art. 20(3) extends to the stage of investigation before trial in a Court of law. That case has left the question open whether such constitutional guarantee extends to other proceedings in other situations.

The third case is the case of S. A. Venkataraman v. The Union of India.² That was a case under art. 20(2) of the Constitution. In that case the Supreme Court held that an enquiry made and concluded under the Public Servants (Inquiries) Act, 1850, does not amount to prosecution and punishment for an offence as contemplated by art. 20(2) of the Constitution. In that case, Mr. Justice Mukherjea in delivering the judgment of the Court observes at pp. 1153 and 1154 as follows:—

- “The scope and meaning of the guarantee implied in article 20(2) of the Constitution has been indicated with sufficient fullness in the pronouncement of this court in Maqbool Hussain v. The State of Bombay...the ambit and contents of the guarantee, as this Court pointed out in the case referred to above, are much narrower than those of the common law rule in England or the doctrine of ‘double jeopardy’ in the American Constitution. Article 20(2) of our Constitution, it is to be noted, does not contain the principle of ‘autrefois acquit’ at all. It seems that our Constitution makers did not think it necessary to raise one part of the common law rule to the level of a fundamental right and thus make it immune from legislative interference. This has been left to be regulated by the general law of the land.”

In the course of his judgment the learned Judge further observes as follows (p. 1154):—

“It has also been held by this court in Maqbool Hussain’s case that the language of article 20 and the words actually used in it afford a clear indication that the proceedings in connection with the prosecution and punishment of a person must be in the nature of criminal proceeding, before a court of law or judicial tribunal, and not before a tribunal which entertains a departmental or an administrative enquiry even though set up by a statute, but which is not required by law to try a matter judicially and on legal evidence.”

Dealing with the facts of that case, the learned Judge at pp. 1155 and 1156 further observes as under:—

“...The Commissioner (who had been appointed under the Public Servants Inquiries Act, 1850) was a judicial tribunal in the proper sense of the expression. He had to adjudicate on the charges judicially, on evidence, recorded on oath, which he was authorised by law to administer. The prosecution was conducted by a prosecutor appointed under the Act, charges were read out to the accused person and his plea was taken; witnesses on both the sides were examined on oath and they were cross-examined and re-examined. The Commissioner had all the powers of a court; he could summon witnesses, compel production of relevant documents and punish people for contempt. At the close of the enquiry, the Commissioner did record his finding against the petitioner on some of the charges. He had undoubtedly no power to impose any punishment and had only to forward his report to the Government. Under section 22 of the Act, however, the Government was entitled to pass such orders within its authority, as it considered proper and in exercise of this authority the President did impose upon the petitioner the penalty of dismissal...”

It is true that the Commissioner appointed to make an enquiry under Act XXXVII of 1850 is invested with some of the powers of a court, particularly in the matter of summoning witnesses and compelling the production of documents and the report, which he has to make, has to be made on legal evidence adduced under sanction of oath and tested by cross-examination. But from these facts alone the conclusion does not necessarily follow that an enquiry made and concluded under Act XXXVII of 1850 amounts to prosecution and punishment for an offence as contemplated by article 20(2) of the Constitution.”

At p. 1160 it is further observed as follows:—

“...The mere fact that the word ‘prosecution’ has been used, would not make the proceeding before the Commissioner one for prosecution of an offence. As the Commissioner has to form his opinion upon legal evidence, he has been given the power to summon witnesses, administer oath to them and also to compel production of relevant documents. These may be some of the trappings of a judicial tribunal, but they cannot make the proceeding anything more than a mere fact finding enquiry...At the close of the enquiry, the Commissioner has to submit a report to the Government regarding his finding on each one of the charges made. This is a mere expression of opinion and it lacks both finality and authoritativeness which are the essential tests of a judicial pronouncement. The opinion is not even binding on the Government.”

The learned Advocate General urges that some of the observations made in this judgment aptly apply to the facts of this case. He says that an Inspector appointed under the Indian Companies Act is constituted merely a fact finding authority and that his opinion is neither authoritative nor final. He further says that even though the Inspector might administer oath and compel production of documents and may have some of the trappings of a Court, he is neither a Court nor a judicial tribunal. He further says that an Inspector appointed under the said Act is, under no duty to act judicially, that he does not discharge any judicial functions and that the proceedings before him are neither judicial nor quasi judicial. He says that it is open to the Inspector to take evidence behind the back of the person, whose affairs may be investigated and that the person concerned is not entitled as of right to have an opportunity of leading evidence or of cross-examining the witnesses who may give evidence against him.

None of the aforesaid Supreme Court judgments directly deals with the matter that has arisen before me.

It was contended that art. 20(3) does not restrict its operation to any particular proceeding, and that once a person is accused of an offence, the constitutional guarantee would extend in any proceeding of whatsoever nature where the evidence of the person accused is being taken. It was then pointed out that if such was the ambit of the article, the provisions contained in s. 132 of the Evidence Act would have to be considered to be invalid in the case of a person who has been accused of an offence. Section 132 of the Evidence Act provides as under:—

"132. A witness shall not be excused from answering any question as to any matter relevant to the matter in issue in any suit or in any civil or criminal proceeding, upon the ground that the answer to such question will criminate, or may tend directly or indirectly to criminate, such witness, or that it will expose, or tend directly or indirectly to expose, such witness to a penalty or forfeiture of any kind:

Provided that no such answer, which a witness shall be compelled to give, shall subject him to any arrest or prosecution, or be proved against him in any criminal proceeding, except a prosecution for giving false evidence by such answer."

Under s. 132 of the Evidence Act, a witness is compelled to give an answer in any suit or in any civil or criminal proceeding which might incriminate him. The only safeguard, which is provided is that such answer, which he is compelled to give, would not subject him to any arrest or prosecution or be proved against him in any criminal proceeding, except a prosecution for giving false evidence by such answer. If under the constitutional guarantee he was not compellable to give such answer, then by merely providing a safeguard the constitutional guarantee is not prevented from being violated. Under s. 132, he is compellable to give answers which tend directly or indirectly to incriminate him and he is liable to be prosecuted for giving false evidence even under such compulsion.

At the stage of his final reply Mr. Manecksha, the learned counsel for the petitioner, however, made his submissions on art. 20(3) as follows:—

"Where a person is accused of an offence and pursuant to or in view of such accusation an enquiry is held by a person legally authorised to take evidence, the constitutional guarantee embodied in Art. 20(3) would apply irrespective of the nature or character of the inquiry held."

The words used in art. 20(3) require that the person claiming the protection must be accused of an offence. The accusation referred to in that article is not a bare allegation made by one person against another. It must be an allegation of an offence made with a view to secure the prosecution of the person for that offence before an authority entitled to investigate into it for the purpose of taking proceedings for punishment of that person for the said offence before a criminal Court or a judicial tribunal entitled to inflict punishment for such offence. The proceeding in which a person is not to be compelled to be a witness against himself must be a proceeding before a criminal Court or judicial tribunal before whom the prosecution has been launched for that offence with the object of having the accused punished by that Court or tribunal for that offence, or a proceeding preliminary thereto in the course of investigation into that offence after such person is accused of the offence and the machinery of the criminal law has been set in motion. This construction is borne out by the context in which sub-cl. (3) of art. 20 is set out. Article 20(1) deals with the conviction of a person of any offence and the penalty therefor. Article 20(2) deals with prosecution and punishment for the same offence and art. 20(3) deals with a person accused of an offence. The whole art. 20 deals with proceedings starting from the accusation of a person of any offence and ending with his conviction. Sub-clause (3) of the said article in that context refers to compulsion of a person to be a witness after he is accused of an offence and the machinery of the criminal law has been set in motion in the course of the investigation into such offence and the prosecution of such person. It refers to criminal proceedings which commence with the accusation of an offence and which end in the conviction of the person so accused in the event of his being found guilty. Article 20(3) does not refer to any evidence that may be given in the course of any fact finding investigation or inquiry which may result in the discovery of material which would show that the witness is guilty of any offence. It does not refer to proceedings which are not criminal proceedings.

The investigation in the present case is taking place under the provisions of the Companies Act. Section 235 of the Companies Act, 1956, provides that the Central Government may appoint one or more competent persons as inspectors to investigate the affairs of any company and to report thereon in such manner as the Central Government may direct. The key words of the section are "to investigate the affairs of any company". The object of appointing inspectors is to investigate the affairs of a company. Section 235 thereafter provides for the persons on whose application such an appointment may be made. Section 236 provides for safeguards against an improper application being made, s. 237 provides for investigation of a company's affairs in other cases. It runs as follows:—

"237. Without prejudice to its powers under section 235, the Central Government—

(a) shall appoint one or more competent persons as inspectors to investigate the affairs of a company and to report thereon in such manner as the Central Government may direct, if—

(i) the company, by special resolution; or

(ii) the Court, by order, declares that the affairs of the company ought to be investigated by an inspector appointed by the Central Government; and

(b) may do so if, in the opinion of the Central Government, there are circumstances suggesting—

(i) that the business of the company is being conducted with intent to defraud its creditors, members or any other persons or otherwise for a fraudulent or unlawful purpose or in a manner oppressive of any of its members, or that the company was formed for any fraudulent or unlawful purpose;

(ii) that persons concerned in the formation of the company or the management of its affairs have in connection therewith been guilty of fraud, misfeasance or other misconduct towards the company or towards any of its members; or

(iii) that the members of that company have not been given all the information with respect to its affairs which they might reasonably expect, including information relating to the calculation of the commission payable to a managing or other director, the managing agent, the secretaries and treasurers, or the manager of the company."

Section 239 of the Companies Act, 1956, provides as under:—

"239. (1) If an inspector appointed under section 235 or 237 to investigate the affairs of a company thinks it necessary for the purposes of his investigation to investigate also the affairs of—

(a) any other body corporate which is, or has at any relevant time been, the company's subsidiary or holding company, or a subsidiary of its holding company, or a holding company of its subsidiary;

(b) any other body corporate which is, or has at any relevant time been, managed

(i) by any person as managing agent or as secretaries and treasurers who is, or was at the relevant time, either the managing agent or the secretaries and treasurers of the company;

(ii) by any person who is, or was at the relevant time, an associate of the managing agent or secretaries and treasurers of the company; or

(iii) by any person of whom the managing agent or secretaries and treasurers of the company is, or was at the relevant time, an associate;

(c) any other body corporate which is, or has at any relevant time been, managed by the company; or

(d) any person who is, or has at any relevant time been, the company's managing agent or secretaries and treasurers or an associate of such managing agent or secretaries and treasurers, the inspector shall, subject to the provisions of sub-section (2) have power so to do, and shall report on the affairs of the other body corporate or of the managing agent, secretaries and treasurers or associate of the managing agent or secretaries and treasurers, so far as he thinks the results of his investigation thereof are relevant to the investigation of the affairs of the first-mentioned company.

(2) In the case of any body corporate or person referred to in clause (b)(ii), (b)(iii), (c) or (d) of sub-section (1), the inspector shall not exercise his power of investigating into and reporting on, its or his affairs without first having obtained the prior approval of the Central Government thereto."

"240. (1) It shall be the duty of all officers and agents of the company, and where the company is or was managed by a managing agent or secretaries and treasurers, of all officers, and agents of the managing agent or secretaries and treasurers, and where the affairs of any other body corporate, or of a managing agent or secretaries and treasurers, or of an associate of a managing agent, or secretaries and treasurers, are investigated by virtue of section 239, of all officers and agents of such body corporate, managing agent, secretaries and treasurers or associate, and where such managing agent, secretaries and treasurers or associate is or was a firm, of all partners in the firm—

(a) to produce to an inspector all books and papers of, or relating to the company or, as the case may be, of or relating to the other body corporate, managing agent, secretaries and treasurers or associate, which are in their custody or power; and

(b) otherwise to give to the inspector all assistance in connection with the investigation which they are reasonably able to give.

(2) An inspector may examine on oath any of the persons referred to in sub-section (1) in relation to the affairs of the company, other body corporate, managing agent, secretaries and treasurers or associate as the case may be; and may administer an oath accordingly.

(3) If any such person refuses—

(a) to produce to an inspector any book or paper which it is his duty under sub-section (1) to produce; or

(b) to answer any question which is put to him by an inspector in pursuance of sub-section (2),

the inspector may certify the refusal under his hand to the Court; and the Court may thereupon inquire into the case; and after hearing any witnesses who may be produced against or on behalf of the alleged offender and after hearing any statement which may be offered in defence, punish the offender as if he had been guilty of contempt of the Court.

(4) If an inspector thinks it necessary for the purpose of his investigation that a person whom he has no power to examine on oath should be so examined, he may apply to the Court and the Court may, if it sees fit, order that person to attend and be examined on oath before it on any matter relevant to the investigation, and on any such examination—

(a) the inspector may take part therein either personally or by a legal practitioner;

(b) the Court may put such questions to the person examined as the Court thinks fit;

- (c) the person examined shall answer all such questions as the Court may put or allow to be put to him, but may at his own cost employ a legal practitioner, who shall be at liberty to put to such person such questions as the Court may deem just for the purpose of enabling him to explain or qualify any answers given by him:

Provided that notwithstanding anything in clause (c), the Court may allow the person examined such costs as in its discretion it may think fit, and any costs so allowed shall be treated as part of the expenses of the investigation.

(5) Notes of any examination under sub-section (2) or (4) shall be taken down in writing and shall be read over to or by, and signed by the person examined, and may thereafter be used in evidence against him.

(6) In this section—

(a) the expression "officers" in relation to any company or body corporate, includes any trustee for the debenture holders of such company or body corporate;

(b) the expression "agent" in relation to any company, body corporate or person, means any one acting or purporting to act for or on behalf of such company, body corporate or person and includes the bankers and legal advisers of, and persons employed as auditors by such company, body corporate or persons; and

(c) any reference to officers, agents or partners shall be construed as a reference to past as well as present officers, agents or partners, as the case may be."

Sections 242, 243 and 244 of the said Act run as under:—

"242. (1) If, from any report made under section 241, it appears to the Central Government that any person has, in relation to the company or in relation to any other body corporate, managing agent, secretaries and treasurers, or associate of a managing agent or secretaries and treasurers, whose affairs have been investigated by virtue of section 239, been guilty of any offence for which he is criminally liable, the Central Government may, after taking such legal advice as it thinks fit, prosecute such person for the offence; and it shall be the duty of all officers and agents of the company, body corporate, managing agent, secretaries and treasurers, or associate, as the case may be (other than the accused in the proceedings), to give the Central Government all assistance in connection with the prosecution which they are reasonably able to give.

(2) Sub-section (6) of section 240 shall apply for the purposes of this section, as it applies for the purposes of that section.

243. If any such company or other body corporate, or any such managing agent, secretaries and treasurers or associate, being a body corporate, is liable to be wound up under this Act and it appears to the Central Government from any such report as aforesaid that it is expedient so to do by reason of any such circumstances as are referred to in sub-clause (i) or (ii) or clause (b) of section 237, the Central Government may, unless the company, body corporate, managing agent, secretaries and treasurers or associate is already being wound up by the Court, cause to be presented to the Court by any person authorised by the Central Government in this behalf—

(a) a petition for the winding up of the company, body corporate, managing agent, secretaries and treasurers, or associate, on the ground that it is just and equitable that it should be wound up;

(b) an application for an order under section 397 or 398; or

(c) both a petition and an application as aforesaid.

244. (1) If from any such report as aforesaid, it appears to the Central Government that proceedings ought, in the public interest, to be brought by the company or any body corporate whose affairs have been investigated in pursuance of clause (a), (b) or (c) of section 239,

(a) for the recovery of damages in respect of any fraud, misfeasance or other misconduct in connection with the promotion or formation, or the management of the affairs, of such company or body corporate; or

(b) for the recovery of any property of such company, or body corporate, which has been misapplied or wrongfully retained;

the Central Government may itself bring proceedings for that purpose in the name of such company or body corporate.

(2) The Central Government shall indemnify such company or body corporate against any costs or expenses incurred by it in, or in connection with, any proceedings brought by virtue of sub-section (1)."

From these provisions it is clear that the primary object of the appointment of inspectors is to investigate into the affairs of companies. It is a fact finding enquiry. It is intended to bring to light all the malpractices adopted by those in charge of the management of the company and the offences, if any, committed by them. One of the consequences which may follow no doubt is the launching of prosecutions, if as a result of such inquiry it is found that any offence or offences have been committed. The mere allegation by the Registrar or by persons referred to in s. 235 that any person has committed any offence cannot be said to result in such person being "accused of an offence" within the meaning of art. 20(3) of the Constitution. The inquiry before an inspector is not a proceeding of the nature contemplated in art. 20(3) of the Constitution.

Even in England the inquiry contemplated under the provisions of the English Companies Act is merely a fact finding inquiry. This conclusion is supported by the remarks made by Lord Esher M. R. in the case of Re. Grosvenor and West-end Railway Terminus Hotel Company Limited.¹ In that case an examination into the affairs of a joint stock company was being held by an inspector appointed by the Board of Trade under s. 56 of the Companies Act, 1862, corresponding to the provisions contained in s. 138 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913. Lord Esher, in the course of his judgment, observes as under:—

"What is the nature of that inquiry? The object of the inquiry which the Board of Trade has authority to order under s. 56 is to examine into and ascertain facts to enable the inspector to make a report of the opinion to the Board of Trade. That is all... The report will not be evidence in a Court of Justice of the existence of any fact mentioned in it; it binds no one and has no effect upon any one or any company.... The report itself is not evidence of anything contained in it, and can only be given in evidence as showing the opinion of the inspector in relation to any matter contained in it... The beginning and the end of the duty of an inspector appointed under s. 56 is to examine and report. He does not occupy a quasi-judicial position."

In the case of Hearts of Oak Assurance Co. v. Attorney General,² it has been held that the object of the examination by an inspector appointed under the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, was merely to recover information as to the companies affairs and that it was in no sense a judicial proceeding for the purpose of trial of an offence.

There are proceedings under other Acts whereunder, in England, a person may be compelled to give testimony which might incriminate him. In William's Law and Practice in Bankruptcy, 16th edn., at p. 92 it has been stated as under:—

"A debtor who is in custody or under remand on a criminal charge is bound at his public examination to answer all such questions as to 'his conduct, dealings and property' as the Court may put or allow to be put to him even though the answers may criminate him, since the examination is for the protection of the public and not merely for the sake of the creditors. The scope of the inquiry is not limited to offences under s. 11 of the Debtors Act, 1869..."

In *Atherton In re*³ it is observed that the usual practice of not pressing such questions in relation to the alleged offence while the criminal charge is hanging over the debtor, but of adjourning the public examination until after the trial, is only a rule of convenience. The fact that a debtor cannot refuse to answer questions which incriminate him when he is examined in his public examination in bankruptcy appears also from a judgment in the case of Paget In re: Official Receiver, Ex parte,⁴ and the case of Re. Jawett.⁵ The provision is the same so far as Indian Courts are concerned. See in this connection Sir Dinshaw Mulla's Law of Insolvency, Second edn., p. 281.

Mr. Maneeksha has strongly urged that there is a clear allegation of criminal misappropriation made against the petitioner in the report of the Registrar of Companies and that the petitioner has been accused of an offence. In my view, the statements made by the Registrar in the report even though they amount to an allegation of the petitioner having committed an offence, do not result in the petitioner being "a person accused of any offence" within the meaning of art. 20(3) of the Constitution. In determining whether the provisions of s. 240 of the Companies Act infringe the fundamental rights guaranteed under art. 20(3) of the Constitution, the question that I have really to consider is not what has in fact been actually done in the present case, but what may be done under the provisions of that section. The provisions of s. 237, sub-cl. (c), contemplate the existence of circumstances suggesting that the business of a company is being conducted with intent to defraud its creditors, members or any other persons, or otherwise for a fraudulent or unlawful purpose. The said provisions as well as the provisions contained in s. 242 envisage the existence of circumstances which may amount to the commission of an offence by an individual in relation to the affairs of the company. The existence of such circumstances is contemplated whilst appointing an inspector for investigating into the affairs of a company, and the possibility of a prosecution being launched as a result of such investigation is also envisaged. But that is not sufficient to render the enactment of s. 240 invalid as offending against art. 20(3) of the Constitution.

Mr. Maneeksha has strongly relied on the judgment in the case Calcutta M. & Co. v. Collector of Customs.¹ Sinha J. in that case held that the provision of s. 171-A of the Sea Customs Act, in so far as it enabled the authorities to compel a person accused of an offence to give evidence against himself and/or to produce documents for that purpose, offended against art. 20(3) of the Constitution and was bad. In the course of his judgment, when his attention was drawn to the decision in M. P. Sharma v. Satish Chandra, District Magistrate, Delhi,² the learned Judge remarked that a formal accusation need not depend upon a first information report being filed and that it depended on the facts of each case. Dealing with the provisions of the said s. 171-A, the learned Judge observes at p. 257 as follows:—

"But the proceedings under S. 171A, are of a different nature altogether. Here, he is compelled to give evidence and to depose truthfully. He is also compelled to produce any document. In either case, he might incriminate himself. Although such a proceeding is not in course of a criminal trial, it is obvious that it is preliminary to it."

When it was pointed out to the learned Judge that in the case of M. P. Sharma v. Satish Chandra there was actually a first information report, he observed that in his opinion that was not a fatal objection. According to the learned Judge the question was whether an accusation had been made that an offence had been committed and whether the investigation might lead to a prosecution for the alleged offence. The learned Judge has in that judgment extended the constitutional guarantee to cases where there is no first information report filed and where the object of the inquiry was proceedings under the Sea Customs Act. The learned Judge in that case has made no reference at all to the process of reasoning whereby Mr. Justice Bhagwati in *Maqbool Hussain v. The State of Bombay*³ came to the conclusion that the proceedings contemplated under art. 20(2) were proceedings of a criminal nature before a Court or a judicial tribunal. The learned Judge's attention does not seem to have been drawn to the distinction drawn by Mr. Justice Mukherjea in S. A. Venkataraman v. The Union of India,⁴ between a fact finding inquiry and an investigation into an offence. With respect to the learned Judge, I am unable to agree with his reasoning on the scope and object of art. 20(3) of the Constitution.

The petitioner challenges the investigation only on the ground of unconstitutionality of the provisions contained in s. 240 of the Companies Act. He has not come before me with an allegation that even though the provisions of s. 240 may be good in law and do not offend against the provisions of art. 20(3), in the exercise of the authority given under s. 240, there is a violation of the fundamental rights of the petitioner and that the petitioner is entitled to claim relief by reason thereof. Mr. Manecksha has frankly conceded that he has not claimed any such relief and that he is not, on the present petition, claiming any such relief.

On the same reasoning which applies to the provisions of s. 240, I hold that s. 239 also does not in any way infringe the provisions of art. 20(3) of the Constitution.

It is next urged by Mr. Manecksha, the learned counsel for the petitioner, that the provisions of ss. 239 and 240 of the Companies Act, 1956, offend against the provisions of art. 14 of the Constitution. That article provides that the State shall not deny to any person equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws within the territory of India. Mr. Manecksha contends that there is no reasonable classification for depriving a company and its management of the protection afforded by the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code and the Indian Evidence Act. He strongly relies upon the protection afforded by s. 132 of the Evidence Act and the protection afforded by ss. 161(2) and 162(1) of the Criminal Procedure Code. He says that s. 239 confers an arbitrary and unfettered power to discriminate. The provisions of the Indian Evidence Act only apply to all judicial proceedings in or before any Court. It is in terms stated in s. 1 of that Act that they are not to apply to proceedings before an arbitrator. The term 'Court' for the purpose of the Evidence Act has been defined to include all persons except arbitrators, legally authorised to take evidence. The provisions of the Evidence Act do not extend to proceedings other than judicial proceedings. The provisions contained in s. 132 of the Evidence Act have not been accorded the status of a fundamental right and it cannot be said that the provisions of art. 14 have been violated by non-application of the provisions of the Evidence Act to proceedings other than judicial proceedings. The proceedings before an inspector are in no sense judicial proceedings and by the non-application of the provisions of the Evidence Act it cannot be said that any fundamental right has been violated.

So far as the provisions contained in ss. 161(2) and 162(1) of the Criminal Procedure Code are concerned, an investigation before a police officer stands entirely on a different footing from an investigation before an inspector. The provisions of art. 14 came up for consideration before the Supreme Court in the case of Budhan Choudhary v. The State of Bihar.¹ Mr. Justice Das, as he then was, who delivered the judgment of the Court, observes as follows (p. 1049):—

"...It is now well-established that while art. 14 forbids class legislation, it does not forbid reasonable classification for the purposes of legislation. In order, however, to pass the test of permissible classification two conditions must be fulfilled, namely, (i) that the classification must be founded on an intelligible differentia which distinguishes persons or things that are grouped together from others left out of the group and (ii) that differentia must have a rational relation to the object sought to be achieved by the statute in question.... What is necessary is that there must be a nexus between the basis of classification and the object of the Act under consideration."

The learned Judge further observes that art. 14 condemns discrimination not only by a substantive law but also by a law of procedure. So far as the impugned provisions are concerned, the classification is founded on an intelligible differentia and that differentia bears a rational relation to the object sought to be achieved by the Companies Act. A company is the creature of statute. The object of the Companies Act, as observed by Palmer in Palmer's Company Law, 19th edn., at p. 8, was to throw open to all the coveted privilege of carrying on business with limited liability. It is in the nature of things that the business of the company has to be carried on through human agency and it is but natural that those who are specially placed in a position to carry on the business of the company should be made to exercise their powers in the name of the company for the benefit of the company and that protection should be afforded to members and to creditors and other persons dealing with the company. A person can protect his own interest. A company's interest may need protection when those in charge of the affairs of the company act prejudicially to its interest. Privileges are conferred under the Companies Act. Those privileges are liable to be withdrawn when abused. The object of an inquiry before an inspector appointed under the Companies Act is different from the object of an inquiry before a police officer investigating into an offence. The object of the appointment of an inspector is "to investigate the affairs of any company". There are various safeguards provided before an investigation is launched. The object of the inquiry is to see that the salutary provisions of the Companies Act, subject to which privileges are granted to companies, are carried out and that damages suffered by reason of the fraud, misfeasance or misconduct of any person in connection with the promotion, formation or management of the affairs of the company are recovered and that any property which has been misapplied or wrongfully retained may be recovered. As a result of the investigation a prosecution is liable to be launched in respect of an offence committed in relation to a company. The object of an investigation by an inspector appointed under the Companies Act is totally different from the object of an investigation conducted under the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code. In this case, if there is any discrimination it is with reason and it is with a view to carry out the object of the Legislature as envisaged in the Act itself. The classification can in no sense be considered to be arbitrary or without any substantial basis or not founded upon any rational and substantial distinction bearing a reasonable or just relation to the object sought to be achieved. The provisions of s. 239 are necessary in order to have an effective investigation into the affairs of the company. The section itself provides that if an inspector appointed under s. 235 or 237 to investigate the affairs of a company thinks it necessary for the purpose of his investigation to investigate also the affairs of other bodies therein set out, he would have a right to do so subject to the provisions contained in sub-s. (2) of that section. It cannot be said that the provisions of s. 239 confer an arbitrary or unfettered power to discriminate. Safeguards are provided by sub-s. (2). In my view, ss. 239 and 240 do not offend against art. 14 of the Constitution.

The learned Advocate General desired to refer to several cases in which it has been held that where there has been a discrimination in the course of the exercise of its powers by an authority, the discrimination may be bad, but the power may be good. It is not necessary for the purpose of this case to refer to any of those authorities as it is not the case of the petitioner that he has been singled out or discriminated against in any particular manner in the course of the exercise of a lawful power and that he is, therefore, entitled to the protection of the Court.

It has been strongly urged by Mr. Manecksha that as respondent No. 1 has been appointed under the provisions of s. 138 of the Old Companies Act, 1913, he cannot exercise any of the powers conferred under ss. 239 and 240 of the new Companies Act, 1956, and that the Central Government had no right or authority to extend its approval to the exercise by respondent No. 1 of any powers under s. 239 of the new Act. The opening words of s. 239(1) are as follows:—

"239. (1) If an inspector appointed under section 235 or 237 to investigate the affairs of a company thinks it necessary for the purposes of his investigation to investigate also the affairs of..."

Mr. Manecksha urges that the powers conferred under s. 239 could only be exercised by an inspector appointed under s. 235 or 237 of the new Companies Act. He says that an inspector appointed under s. 138 of the Companies Act, 1913, is not an inspector appointed under s. 235 or 237 of the new Companies Act and that the provisions of s. 239 are inapplicable to him. The Advocate General in answer points out that under the provisions of the new Companies Act an inspector appointed under s. 138 of the old Companies Act, 1913, is deemed to have been appointed under the new Companies Act, 1956, and that he is entitled to exercise the powers referred to in s. 239 of the new Act. Mr. Manecksha urges that there is no scope for such argument as s. 239 speaks of a person "appointed under section 235 or 237" and that it does not speak of a person deemed to have been appointed under s. 235. In my view, this argument of Mr. Manecksha is not sound. If in law a person could be deemed to be appointed under s. 235, then he would be entitled to exercise all the powers and authorities exercisable by a person appointed under s. 235. The words "appointed under section 235 or 237" have been used by the Legislature not with a view to distinguish persons appointed under s. 235 or 237 from persons who might be deemed to have been so appointed, but to distinguish them from inspectors who may be appointed under the other provisions of the Companies Act. Section 247 of the Companies Act, 1956, provides that where it appears to the Central Government that there is good reason so to do, it may appoint one or more inspectors to investigate and report on the membership of any company and other matters relating to the company, for the purpose of determining the true persons who are or have been financially interested in the success or failure, whether real or apparent, of the company, or who are or have been able to control or materially to influence the policy of the company. Section 249 of the Companies Act provides that where any question arises as to whether any body corporate, firm or individual is or is not, or was or was not, an associate of the managing agent or secretaries and treasurers of a company and it appears to the Central Government that there is good reason to investigate such question, it may appoint an inspector for the purpose of making the investigation. In view of the various provisions of the Act relating to the appointment of inspectors, the Legislature has thought it fit to restrict the powers mentioned in s. 239 to those persons appointed under s. 235 or s. 237. In my view, these powers are equally exercisable under the circumstances mentioned in s. 239 by inspectors deemed to have been appointed under s. 235 or 237 of the new Companies Act, 1956.

Mr. Manecksha then urges that if a person is appointed as an inspector under the old Companies Act, 1913, he cannot be deemed to be an inspector appointed under the new Companies Act, 1956. He says that by s. 644 of the new Act the old Companies Act, 1913, has been repealed. According to him, the only sections which save the appointment of an inspector made under the old Companies Act are ss. 646 and 658 of the new Companies Act. The Advocate General, on the other hand, contends that the real sections which are applicable to such appointments are ss. 645 and 652 of the Companies Act, 1956. In order to appreciate the rival contentions, it is necessary to set out the relevant provisions of the new Companies Act, 1956, relating to repeals and savings. They run as under:—

"645. Nothing in this Act shall affect any order, rule, regulation, appointment, conveyance, mortgage, deed, document or agreement made, fee directed, resolution passed, direction given, proceeding taken, instrument executed or issued, or thing done, under or in pursuance of any previous companies law; but any such order, rule, regulation, appointment, conveyance, mortgage, deed, document, agreement, fee, resolution, direction, proceeding, instrument or thing shall, if in force at the commencement of this Act, continue to be in force, and so far as it could have been made, directed, passed, given, taken, executed, issued or done under or in pursuance of this Act shall have effect as if made, directed, passed, given, taken, executed, issued or done under or in pursuance of this Act.

646. Nothing in this Act shall affect the operation of section 138 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913 (VII of 1913) as respects inspectors, or as respects the continuation of an inspection begun by inspectors, appointed before the commencement of this Act; and the provisions of this Act shall apply to or in relation to a report of inspectors appointed under the said section 138 as they apply to or in relation to a report of inspectors appointed under section 235 or 237 of this Act.

652. Any person appointed to any office under or by virtue of any previous companies law shall be deemed to have been appointed to that office under or by virtue of this Act.

658. The mention of particular matters in sections 645 to 657 or in any other provision of this Act shall not prejudice the general application of section 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1897 (X of 1897), with respect to the effect of repeal."

The Advocate General urges that s. 645 in terms provides that nothing in the new Companies Act, 1956, would affect any order issued, appointment made or proceeding taken under or in pursuance of any previous companies law, viz. under or in pursuance of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, and that if such order, appointment or proceeding was in force at the commencement of the Act, it would continue to be in force, and so far as it could have been made, issued or taken under or in pursuance of the new Companies Act shall have effect as if made, issued or taken under or in pursuance of the new Companies Act and that by reason of the aforesaid provisions respondent No. 1's appointment under the old Act is to have effect as if made under the new Act. The Advocate General further contends that by virtue of s. 652 any person appointed to any office under or by virtue of any previous companies law shall be deemed to have been appointed to that office under or by virtue of the new Companies Act, 1956. He says that the appointment of an inspector by the Central Government is an appointment to an office and that respondent No. 1 being an inspector appointed under or by virtue of the old Act should be deemed to be an inspector appointed under or by virtue of the new Companies Act. Mr. Manecksha frankly conceded that the ambit of s. 645 is wide enough to include what the Advocate General says it includes, but he says that so far as appointments of inspectors are concerned, there is a specific provision contained in s. 646 of the new Companies Act and it is that provision which must operate. He urges that whenever a special provision has been made in relation to a specific matter, it is that provision which would prevail and not the general provision. In my view, a special provision may prevail over a general one where there is a conflict between the two. Where a special provision does not deal with all the circumstances and situations that may arise in respect of the subject-matter dealt with under the special provision, recourse can be had to the general provisions contained in other sections of the Act.

Section 646 in its earlier part sets out that nothing contained in the new Companies Act shall affect the operation of s. 138 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, as respects inspectors, or as respects the continuation of an inspection begun by inspectors appointed under the old Act. Section 138 of the old Act provides that the Central Government may appoint one or more competent inspectors to investigate the affairs of any company and report thereon in such manner as the Central Government may direct in the circumstances therein mentioned. Even though by s. 644 the old Companies Act, 1913, is repealed, by s. 646 the operation of s. 138 is saved. That has been done with a view to avoid the possibility of a contention that on the repeal of a provision empowering a person to appoint, the authority of the person already appointed would cease. The later part of s. 646 provides that the provisions of the new Act would apply to or in relation to a report of inspectors appointed under s. 138 of the old Act as they apply to or in relation to a report of inspectors appointed under s. 235 or 237 of the new Companies Act. By reason of this provision efficacy is given to the report of inspectors as if it had been made under the new Act so that the same can be used for the purpose of proceedings that may be taken under the provisions of the new Companies Act. The powers of inspectors appointed under the old Act are contained in s. 140 of the old Companies Act. The operation of that section has not been saved. This clearly shows that s. 646 is not intended to deal exhaustively with the question relating to inspectors appointed under the old Companies Act. When the special provisions contained in s. 646 do not exhaustively deal with the matter, there is no reason why the general provisions contained in s. 645 should not be operative. Mr. Manecksha, however, states that recourse should be had to s. 658 and not to s. 645. By s. 658 the general application of s. 6 of the General Clauses Act has been preserved. Section 6(e) of the General Clauses Act provides that the repeal shall not affect any investigation, legal proceeding or remedy in respect of any right, privilege, obligation, liability, penalty, forfeiture or punishment acquired, accrued or incurred under any enactment so repealed and that any such investigation, legal proceeding or remedy may be instituted, continued or enforced and any such penalty, forfeiture or punishment may be imposed as if the repealing Act or Regulation had not been passed. In view of this provision, the powers conferred under s. 140 of the old Companies Act would be preserved.

Section 658 says in terms that the mention of particular matters in ss. 645 to 657 or in any other provision of the Act shall not prejudice the general application of s. 6 of the General Clauses Act. It cannot be said that the intention of the Legislature in enacting ss. 646 and 658 was to exclude the operation either of s. 645 or s. 652 in relation to inspectors. If s. 646 is silent as regards the powers to be exercised by an inspector appointed under the old Act, there is no reason why the provisions of s. 645 should not be looked at and given effect to in that connection.

It is a little interesting to examine the corresponding provisions of the English Companies Act, 1948, which have been taken as a model by the draftsmen of the Companies Act, 1956. Section 135(1) of the English Companies Act, 1929, corresponded to s. 138 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913. The powers conferred under the Indian enactment on the Central Government were conferred on the Board of Trade under the English enactment. Section 135(2) of the English Companies Act, 1929, corresponded to s. 139 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913. Section 135, (3), (4) and (5) of the English Companies Act, 1929, corresponded to the provisions contained in s. 140 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, and s. 135(6) of the English Companies Act, 1929, corresponded to s. 141(1) and (2) of the Indian Companies Act, 1913. Section 137 of the English Companies Act, 1929, which corresponded to s. 142 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, provided that a company may by special resolution appoint inspectors to investigate its affairs and that the inspectors so appointed shall have the same powers and duties as inspectors appointed by the Board of Trade, except that instead of reporting to the Board, they shall report in such manner and to such persons as the company in general meeting may direct. It was further provided that if any officer or agent of the company refused to produce to the inspectors any book or document, which it was his duty under that section so to produce, or refused to answer any question which was put to him by the inspectors with respect to the affairs of the company, he would be liable to be proceeded against in the same manner as if the inspectors had been inspectors appointed by the Board of Trade. In s. 142 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, similar provisions appear, with the exception that instead of the Board of Trade the Central Government has been substituted. When the Parliament in England enacted the English Companies Act, 1948, it repealed the provisions contained in the English Companies Act, 1929. Sub-section (2) of s. 459 of the English Companies Act, 1948, corresponds to s. 645 of the Indian Companies Act, 1956. It is by virtue of s. 459(2) of the Act that the orders passed, appointments made and proceedings taken under the old English Companies Act, 1929, have been continued and so far as the same could have been made, passed or taken under or in pursuance of the new English Companies Act, 1948, have effect as if made, passed or taken under or in pursuance of the new English Companies Act, 1948. Section 646 of the Indian Companies Act, 1956, corresponds to s. 459(6) of the English Companies Act with very material variations. Section 459(6) of the English Companies Act, 1948, runs as follows:—

- “459. (6) Nothing in this Act shall affect the operation of section one hundred and thirty-seven of the Companies Act, 1929, as respects inspectors appointed before, or to continue an inspection begun by inspectors appointed before the commencement of this Act, and section one hundred and seventy-one of this Act shall apply to a report of inspectors appointed under the said section one hundred and thirty-seven as it applies to a report of inspectors appointed under section one hundred and sixty-four of this Act.”

Under the aforesaid provision what has been saved is the operation of s. 137 of the English Companies Act, 1929, which provided for appointment of Inspectors by Companies and not of s. 135 of that Act which provided for appointment of inspectors by the Board of Trade. Section 158 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, the operation of which is saved by s. 646 of the new Companies Act, 1956, refers to the appointment of inspectors by the Central Government under the Act of 1913 and not to the appointment of inspectors by the company under the provisions of s. 142, with the curious result that what is sought to be saved by s. 646 is that which is already saved under the provisions of s. 645. There is no provision in the Indian enactment saving the operation of s. 142 of the old Indian Companies Act, 1913. It is not for the Court to consider why the Legislature should have made a reference to s. 138. In interpreting the provisions of an enactment, the Court has to consider what in fact has been enacted irrespective of the provisions of any other statute passed by the Legislature of a different country even though such legislation might have furnished a model to the draftsmen. In England by s. 459(2) of the English Companies Act, 1948, orders, appointments and proceedings under the old English Act of 1929 have been saved and effect has been given thereto as if the same had been issued, made or taken under the new English Act of 1948. A similar effect should be given to the corresponding provisions of s. 645 of the Indian Companies Act, 1956. In my view, in respect of matters not specifically dealt with in s. 646, recourse must be had to s. 645 and s. 652 before turning to the residuary s. 658. In my view, the appointment of an inspector made under s. 138 of the old Companies Act, 1913, is liable to be deemed to have been made under the Companies Act, 1956, since the day it came into force and must have effect as if the appointment had been made under the new Companies Act of 1956. I hold that respondent No. 1 as such inspector is entitled to exercise all the powers conferred under s. 239 or s. 240 of the new Companies Act, 1956, and the order of the Central Government according its approval under s. 239(2) of the new Companies Act, 1956, to the exercise by respondent No. 1 of the powers conferred under s. 239 is valid.

In view of what I have stated above, the notices issued by respondent No. 1, the examination held by respondent No. 1 and the interim report made by respondent No. 1 are valid in law and are not liable to be set aside.

The petitioner appealed.

M. L. Maneksha, with P. N. Bhagwati and A. B. Diwan, for the appellant.

H. M. Seervai, Advocate General, with J. M. Thakore, for the respondents.

CHAGLA C.J. This appeal raises several important questions concerning the provisions of the new Companies Act of 1956. The facts which are necessary to state are very few. The appellant, who is also the petitioner, is the managing agent of a limited company called the Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd. On November 15, 1954, the Registrar of Companies called for an explanation from the Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd., and the Registrar stated in his letter that it had been represented to him under s. 137(6) of the Indian Companies Act that the business of the company was carried on in fraud and he had, therefore, to call upon the company to furnish the information which he required which was set out in the latter part of the letter. On April 15, 1955, the Registrar made a report to the Central Government. This report was made under s. 187(5) of the old Companies Act, and the report was that the affairs of the company were carried out in fraud of contributories and he was of the opinion that the affairs of the company disclosed an unsatisfactory state of affairs. He pointed out that the appellant as the managing agent of the company was also the promoter of the company. He stated in his report that, under a fictitious name of Bansilal Uchant Account, the company was advancing money to the several farms owned by the appellant but ostensibly purchased from the company's funds. He also recorded that between the years ending September 1942 and 1951 about Rs. 19,200 were paid for Harpur Farm and Rs. 39,300 were paid for Bhawanipur Farm, which showed that Uchant Account was mainly operated for purchasing such lands out of the funds of the company but for and on behalf of the appellant. The Registrar also further stated in this report that the managing agents were interested in Harinagar Cane Farm which is the principal property of the appellant, and there was no doubt that the managing agents were utilising the property of the company for their personal gain. On this report the Central Government passed an order on November 1, 1955, appointing respondent No. 1 as an Inspector to investigate into the affairs of the company under s. 188(iv). In the operative part of this order it is stated that the Central Government, in exercise of the powers conferred by sub-s. (iv) of s. 188 of the said Act, is hereby pleased to appoint Shri Maneck P. Mistry (i.e. respondent No. 1), F.S.A.A., F.C.A., Chartered Accountant, Bombay, as an Inspector to investigate into the affairs of the company from the date of incorporation and point out all irregularities and contraventions in respect of the provisions of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, or any other law and report in the manner indicated in a separate communication sent to him. This separate communication dealt with the mode of inquiry and the memorandum states:

"As provided by section 141A if on an examination of the report the Central Government find that any person has been guilty of any offence in relation to the company for which he is criminally liable, Government will refer the matter to the Advocate-General or the Public Prosecutor."

Then comes a direction to the Inspectors that they should bear in mind that for a successful prosecution the evidence in support of a charge must be clear, tangible and cogent. Inspectors were further asked that they should specify in their reports with reference to the evidence, either oral or documentary or both, collected during investigations on the following amongst other matters; and the material matters to which reference might be made are: What is the offence committed, quoting as far as possible the section contravened; the precise evidence, oral, documentary or both, which implicates each of the named accused and goes to prove the charge; and in case of misappropriation, the amount misappropriated. There is a further direction to the Inspectors that they should make proper use of their rights available to them under s. 140 of the Act including the right to examine a person on oath. Questions should be so put to persons examined on oath as to bring out their admissions with reference to facts. Now, this memorandum was annexed to the order because this memorandum contains directions issued to all Inspectors appointed under the provisions of the Companies Act, and a copy of it was sent to respondent No. 1 for his guidance in the investigations which he was called upon to undertake pursuant to this order. Pursuant to the powers conferred upon him under this order, respondent No. 1 wrote to the appellant a letter intimating to him that under sub-s. (2) of s. 140 of the Indian Companies Act he will examine him on oath in relation to the business of the company. On July 26, 1956, the Central Government accorded its approval under s. 239(2) of the new Companies Act (I of 1956) to respondent No. 1 exercising the powers of investigation into and reporting on the affairs of the appellant including his personal books and accounts and Messrs. Narainlal Bansilal, the managing agents of Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd. It may be stated that the appellant is the proprietor of the firm of Narainlal Bansilal. After approval was accorded, respondent No. 1 served upon the appellant four notices dated May 9, 1957, May 16, 1957, May 29, 1957 and June 29, 1957. The four notices are substantially identical and it is sufficient to refer to the first one of them. The notice of May 9, 1957, states:

"NOW THEREFORE by virtue of the provisions contained in s. 240 of the Companies Act, 1956, I hereby call upon you to attend my office on 14th May 1957 at 3 P.M. at the offices of Messrs. Kalyaniwalla & Mistry, 32, Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay, for the purpose of being examined on oath in relation to the affairs of the said company and I also hereby call upon you to produce to me all the books of account and papers relating to the said company as mentioned below. Please take further notice that in default of compliance with the requisition aforesaid necessary legal steps will be taken without further reference to you."

Then comes a list of books and papers to be produced, and among them are the personal books of account of the appellant for the year 1933 up-to-date, books of account of Messrs. Narayanlal Bansilal, the managing agents of Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd., for the years 1933 up-to-date, and books of account of Harinagar Cane Farm from 1934 up-to-date. The petition which the appellant filed, and out of which this appeal arises, challenged these four notices as being bad in law, and the challenge was based on three grounds which were urged before the Court below and which have been very effectively and strongly urged by Mr. Manecksha before us. The three grounds which were urged were that respondent No. 1 having been appointed under the old Act had no jurisdiction to exercise powers under the relevant provisions of the new Act. The second contention was that certain portions of s. 240 of the Companies Act, to which we will make reference at the proper time, offend against the provisions of art. 20(3) of the Constitution, and it was also urged that certain portions of ss. 239 and 240 offend against the provisions of art. 14 of the Constitution. The learned Judge rejected all the three contentions raised by the appellant and dismissed the petition. Hence this appeal.

Turning to the first point which deals with the powers of the appellant, it is necessary in the first place to look at the relevant provisions of the old Act of 1913 and the new Act of 1956. Under the old Act, under s. 137 power was conferred upon the Registrar to call for information or explanation from a company in respect of the affairs of the company, and sub-s. (5) of that section provided that on the receipt of the necessary information if it disclosed an unsatisfactory state of affairs as far as the company was concerned, it was made incumbent upon the Registrar to report the circumstances of the case to the Central Government. Then s. 138 conferred upon the Central Government the power to appoint one or more competent Inspectors to investigate the affairs of any company, and the case with which we are concerned is sub-cl. (iv)—

"(iv) in the case of any company, on a report by the Registrar under section 137(5)."

It was under this section that the Central Government appointed an Inspector on a report made by the Registrar under s. 137(5). Section 140 deals with inspection of books and examination of officers and it provides:

"(1) It shall be the duty of all persons who are or have been officers of the company to produce to the inspectors all books and documents in their custody or power relating to the company.

(2) An inspector may examine on oath any such person in relation to its business, and may administer an oath accordingly."

And it is made penal by sub-s. (3) to refuse to produce any book or to answer any question put by the Inspector relating to the affairs of the company. It will be noticed that s. 140 confers rather wide powers upon the Inspector, but the power was confined to investigation relating to the affairs of the company, and the power to administer oath and obtain documents was also confined to matters relating to the business of the company under investigation. There was no power in the Inspector to investigate into the affairs of any other body or any other person. Section 141 dealt with results of the examination held under s. 140, and sub-s. (1) made it incumbent upon the Inspector to report his opinion to the Central Government. Section 141A dealt with the institution of prosecutions and these prosecutions were to be launched by reason of the facts disclosed in the report of the Inspector. But before a prosecution could be launched, the matter had to be referred by the Central Government to the Advocate General or the Public Prosecutor. But it was left to the subjective determination of the Central Government whether to refer the matter to the Advocate General or the Public Prosecutor because sub-s. (1) expressly provided:

"If from any report made under s. 138 it appears to the Central Government that any person has been guilty of any offence in relation to the company for which he is criminally liable..."

Sub-section (2) dealt with the case where the matter was referred to the Advocate General or the Public Prosecutor, and if either of them came to the conclusion that the case was one in which a prosecution ought to be instituted, he had to institute the proceedings and it was made obligatory upon all officers and agents of the company, past and present, to give him all assistance in connection with the prosecution which they were reasonably able to give. But it is material to note that the accused in the proceedings was exempted from this duty; in other words, it was not obligatory upon him to render any assistance to the law officer of the State. Section 142 gave the power to the company to appoint Inspectors in contradistinction to the power conferred upon the Central Government under s. 138. Under this section the company could appoint an Inspector by a special resolution, and the report was to be made to the company instead of to the Central Government. Section 143 provided that the report of the Inspector shall be admissible in any legal proceeding as evidence of the opinion of the Inspector in relation to any matters contained in the report. Therefore, this was the scheme under the old Act with regard to investigation into the affairs of a company which the Registrar found was not managed as it should be managed, and it will be noticed that the scope and purpose of the investigation was to investigate the affairs of the company and all powers which were conferred upon the Inspector were germane to the main purpose of the investigation which was to find out how the affairs of the company were being managed.

Turning to the new Act of 1956, certain important alterations were made in the provisions with regard to inspection and we will now proceed to point out what the main alterations were. Section 234 substantially corresponded to s. 137. Section 235 also substantially corresponded to s. 138. Then we have s. 237 which confers power upon the Central Government to appoint Inspectors in cases other than those covered by s. 235 and without prejudice to the powers of the Central Government under that section, and it is made incumbent upon the Government to appoint Inspectors to investigate the affairs of the company if the company by special resolution or the Court by order declares that the affairs of the company ought to be investigated by an Inspector appointed by the Central Government. So that the power that was given under the old Act to the company under s. 142 to appoint Inspectors who were to report to the company itself was taken away, and instead of that s. 237 made it obligatory upon the Government to appoint Inspectors if the company itself by special resolution declared that the affairs of the company should be investigated, and an important power was conferred upon the Court that the Court could also direct the Government to appoint an Inspector or Inspectors. Then we come to s. 239 and this provision considerably enlarges the power of the Inspector with regard to inspection. It will be remembered that s. 140 confined the power of the Inspector with regard to investigation within certain definite bounds. Section 239 extended the power of the Inspector not only to investigate into the affairs of the company concerned, but also into the affairs of related companies or of managing agents or associates as defined by the Companies Act. It is under this section that respondent No. 1 is purporting, under the notices issued and which are impugned, to call upon the appellant to submit to an investigation of his affairs both as managing agents and also of his individual business. But while conferring this very extensive power upon the Inspector, the Legislature was careful to provide that this examination was to be held if an Inspector appointed under s. 235 or s. 237 to investigate the affairs of the company thinks it necessary for the purposes of this investigation. So that it was not as if the Inspector was at large and he could call upon a managing agent to disclose his private books of account or the books of account of his private business or to indulge in a roving inquiry. The Inspector had to be satisfied that such inspection of books or such inquiry was necessary for the main purpose for which he was appointed an Inspector and for which the inquiry was ordered and that was to investigate into the affairs of the company. In other words, what the Inspector had constantly to keep in mind was that his primary function and duty was to investigate the affairs of the company. It is in order to discharge that primary function that he was empowered to go further on what he could do under s. 140 and to examine the managing agent and also examine his personal books of account and the books of account of his own personal business. Sub-section (2) of s. 239 provides:

"In the case of any body corporate or person referred to in clause (b)(ii), (b)(iii), (c), or (d) of sub-section (1), the inspector shall not exercise his power of investigating into, and reporting on, its or his affairs without first having obtained the prior approval of the Central Government thereto."

As will be remembered, respondent No. 1 only sought to exercise his power under s. 239 after he had obtained the prior approval of the Central Government. Therefore, by this sub-section the Central Government kept control over the Inspector and would permit him to exercise his extensive powers under s. 239 with regard to investigation of persons and bodies other than the company concerned, provided the Central Government gave its approval to such investigation. Then s. 240 casts an obligation upon all officers and agents of the company and all companies and persons referred to in s. 239, whose affairs are being investigated through the approval of Government, to produce all documents and evidence in their possession. Sub-section (2) of that section empowers the Inspectors to examine any person on oath, and sub-s. (3) provides that if such a person refuses to produce before an Inspector any relevant book or paper or answer any question put to him by the Inspector, he may certify the refusal to a competent Court and the Court may punish such person for contempt. Then sub-s. (4) empowers the Inspector to apply to the Court for the purposes of investigation to examine on oath a person whom he has no power to examine pursuant to the power conferred upon him, and the Court may, if it thinks fit, order such a person to attend and be examined on oath. This examination is to be held by the Court itself. There is an obligation upon the person examined to answer all questions. Then comes the important provision in sub-s. (5) that the notes of examination, whether of evidence taken by the Inspector under sub-s. (2) of s. 240 or taken by the Court under sub-s. (4), shall be taken down in writing and shall be read over to or by, and signed by, the person examined, and may thereafter be used in evidence against him. Section 241 deals with the Inspector's report which has got to be forwarded to the Central Government, and s. 242 deals with prosecution which substantially is the same as s. 141A but it emphasises the discretion conferred upon the Central Government in regard to launching of prosecution because it says that the Central Government may, after taking such legal advice as it thinks fit, prosecute such person for the offence.

The first question that arises for our consideration is this. Respondent No. 1 was appointed an Inspector under s. 138 of the old Companies Act and, as already pointed out, if that Act had continued to be the law of the land, admittedly he could not have issued the impugned notices. He has issued these impugned notices because he has received the prior approval of the Central Government under s. 239(2), and the contention of the Union of India is that notwithstanding the fact that respondent No. 1 was appointed under the Act of 1913, notwithstanding the fact that under that Act he had no power or no authority to issue these notices, once the Act of 1956 was placed on the statute book and he received the approval of the Central Government, he was authorised to exercise the powers conferred upon him under s. 239, and what he has done by issuing these notices is to exercise powers which he has a right to exercise under s. 239. What is urged by Mr. Manecksha on this head of his argument is that respondent No. 1 has not been appointed an Inspector under s. 235 of the Act of 1956 or under s. 237 of the Act, and according to him it is only an Inspector appointed under s. 235 or s. 237, as s. 239 expressly states, who can exercise the extended powers conferred under s. 239. So the question which we have to decide lies in a very narrow compass. Is it necessary under the law that respondent No. 1 should have been appointed an Inspector by the Central Government under s. 235 before he could exercise the powers under s. 239? Or are there provisions in the Act of 1956 which permit respondent No. 1, although appointed under the Act of 1913, to exercise the powers under s. 239 with the prior approval of the Central Government without a fresh appointment under s. 235? The sections which throw light on this question are sections which we find at the end of the new Companies Act and which are grouped together under the heading "Repeals and savings".

The first section to which reference might be made is s. 645, and to the extent that it is relevant it provides that nothing in this Act shall affect any appointment made or thing done under or in pursuance of any previous companies law, but any such appointment or thing shall, if in force at the commencement of this Act, continue to be in force, and so far as it could have been made or done under or in pursuance of this Act shall have effect as if made or done under or in pursuance of this Act. Now, if this section stood by itself, the question that we have to decide will present no difficulty because looking to the plain language of this section what it provides is that an appointment made or a thing done under the old Act is continued not under the provisions of the old Act but as if it was made or done under the provisions of the new Act. This is a provision contrary to the provision of s. 6 of the General Clauses Act which, as is well known, provides for the continuance of any appointment made or any thing done under the repealed statute as if the repealing statute had not been passed. Section 645 on the contrary provides that the thing which was set in motion, as it were, under the old law was to continue, but not under the provisions of the old law but under the provisions of the new law. Therefore, applying this section to the facts of the present case, we have an Inspector appointed under s. 138 of the Act of 1913. He had carried on part of his investigation under s. 140. By reason of this section his appointment is to continue in force, and if his appointment could have been made under the Act of 1956, it shall have effect as if it was made under this Act. Now, undoubtedly, under this Act an Inspector could have been appointed under s. 235, and therefore what s. 645 does is by a legal fiction to equate the appointment of the Inspector under s. 138 with his appointment under s. 235. Therefore, we must look upon the Inspector as being appointed under s. 235 if the legal fiction is to have full effect. Then, obviously, it is not necessary to make a fresh appointment. If it was necessary to make a fresh appointment, there was no need for the legal fiction. Therefore, the law looks upon the Inspector, respondent No. 1, as being appointed under s. 235 after the Act of 1956 came into force, and if he is appointed under s. 235, then with the prior approval of Government under s. 239(2) he can exercise the powers under s. 239.

But the difficulty is caused by s. 646 which follows upon s. 645, and that section provides:

"Nothing in this Act shall affect the operation of section 138 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, as respects inspectors, or as respects the continuation of an inspection begun

- by inspectors, appointed before the commencement of this Act; and the provisions of this Act shall apply to or in relation to a report of inspectors appointed under the said section 138 as they apply to or in relation to a report of inspectors appointed under section 235 or 237 of this Act."

Briefly put, Mr. Manecksha's argument is that s. 646 must be looked upon as a proviso to s. 645. Section 646 in terms says: "Nothing in this Act shall affect. . ." which would include obviously the provisions of s. 645. So according to Mr. Manecksha it was in s. 646 that the Legislature was specifically legislating with regard to the operation of s. 138. We must look only at s. 646 in order to decide what the effect of this provision incorporated in the Act by the Legislature is. According to Mr. Manecksha, what s. 646 does is to continue the operation of s. 138 and s. 138 only deals with the appointment of the Inspector. It does not deal with the powers of the Inspector. Under the old Act it was s. 140 that dealt with his powers. Therefore, says Mr. Manecksha, what is saved by s. 646 is the appointment of respondent No. 1 under s. 138 of the old Companies Act because as the operation of that section is not affected by anything in the Act, s. 138 continues to be in operation. Further, s. 646 also saves the inspection already begun by the Inspector appointed under s. 138, and having saved both the appointment and the inspection under the old Act, s. 646 goes on to provide that the provisions of the new Act shall only apply to or in relation to a report to be made by Inspectors and the provisions of the new Act shall apply to this report as if the Inspector had been appointed under s. 235 or 237 of the new Act. Therefore, what Mr. Manecksha contends is that there is nothing in s. 646 which confers upon the Inspector appointed under s. 138 the extended powers conferred by the new Act under s. 239. Not only is there nothing in s. 646 conferring these powers, but on the contrary s. 646 limits the application of the Act of 1956 to the specific provisions mentioned in s. 646 itself. According to Mr. Manecksha, it is not permissible to the Court to extend the scope of s. 646 and to hold that not only the provisions of the Act of 1956 with regard to the report apply to the Inspector, but also the provisions with regard to investigation contained in s. 235. The other two sections to which reference might be made with reference to this argument are s. 653 which provides:

"The offices existing at the commencement of this Act for the registration of companies shall be continued as if they had been established under this Act," and s. 658 which provides:

"The mention of particular matters in sections 645 to 637 or in any other provision of this Act shall not prejudice the general application of section 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, with respect to the effect of repeals."

Now, the argument advanced by Mr. Manecksha undoubtedly looks very impressive, but a three-fold answer has been given by the Advocate General and we must proceed to examine this answer. Any one of the three arguments, if accepted, would constitute an effective reply to the difficulties raised by Mr. Manecksha with regard to the exercise of the power under s. 239 by respondent No. 1. The first answer given by the Advocate General is that s. 646 is a saving provision, and it is settled law that if the Legislature saves and deals with a particular provision of the law, when in the earlier sections it has dealt generally and saved other provisions of the law, it does not follow that by reason of the specific mention of a particular provision of the law the other provisions dealing with the same subject are not saved and do not fall within the general provisions contained in the earlier sections. As was said by Lord Macnaghton in *Commissioner for Special Purposes of Income Tax v. Pemsel*¹ (p. 589):

"...It is not so very uncommon in an Act of Parliament to find special exemptions which are already covered by a general exemption. Nor is surplusage or even tautology wholly unknown in the language of the Legislature."

Therefore, the whole of Mr. Manecksha's argument really comes to this that because a special exemption is made in connection with the operation of s. 138 and the report of the Inspector under s. 646, therefore the general exemption contained in s. 645 cannot apply to the continuance of the appointment of the Inspector under the Act of 1956. This argument is undoubtedly based upon the normal and natural canon of construction which requires that we must not attribute to the Legislature either redundancy or tautology. But as Lord Macnaghton points out—and what he points out is true not only in the history of English legislation—legislators have been known for the sake of caution to indulge in surplusage or in tautology, and it would indeed be extraordinary that the Legislature should have exempted the Inspectors appointed under s. 138 of the old Act from the operation of s. 645. No possible reason can be suggested why the Legislature did not intend that the Inspectors appointed under s. 138 of the old Act should continue and be deemed to be Inspectors appointed under s. 235 of the new Act. Therefore, in our opinion, s. 646 does not furnish any answer to the plain interpretation of s. 645 which, as already pointed out, does cover the case of an Inspector appointed under s. 138 of the old Act. We refuse to read s. 646 as being an exception to the provision made in s. 645 that all appointments made under the old Act should be deemed to be appointments made under the new Act.

We have been taken through the provisions of the English Act of 1948 and our attention has been drawn to the difference in drafting between the English Act and the Indian Act. There can be no doubt that our Act of 1956 is based upon the English Act of 1948. Indeed, there is a great deal of ill-informed criticism in our country that the Legislature has passed a company law which is sweeping in its effect and which is draconic in consequences. But this ill-informed criticism forgets that our Act is substantially based on the English Act with this important amendment that many sections of our Act are devoted to managing agencies and managing agents, an institution which fortunately or unfortunately for the British people does not flourish on the English soil. We may just in passing refer to what the provision of the English Act of 1948 was with regard to the saving clause corresponding to s. 646. The English section is s. 459(6):

"Nothing in this Act shall affect the operation of section 137 of the Companies Act, 1929, as respects inspectors appointed before, or to continue an inspection begun by inspectors appointed before, the commencement of this Act, and section 171 of this Act shall apply to a report of inspectors appointed under the said section 137 as it applies to a report of inspectors appointed under section 284 of this Act."

Now, really, this section to our mind is in entirely a different context because s. 137 of the English Act dealt with the power of the company to appoint Inspectors corresponding to the provision of s. 142 of the old Act, and s. 137 was not reproduced in the English Act of 1948 just as it was not reproduced in our Act of 1956. This section purported to save the operation of s. 137 to the extent that Inspectors had been appointed by companies and inspection had been begun by those Inspectors, and this section applies only s. 171 of the new Act to the report made by the Inspectors and put that report on the same footing as a report made under the provisions of s. 164 of the new Act. Section 171 of the new Act only deals with the report of the Inspector to be evidence, corresponding to an identical provision in our old Act. When we turn to s. 646, it deals with the operation of s. 138 which deals with the appointment of an Inspector by the Central Government and not by the company and, as has been rightly pointed out by the Advocate General, the latter part of s. 646 applies not only to the case of an Inspector appointed under s. 138 the provision of any particular section, but it applies all the provisions of the Act to or in relation to a report of Inspectors appointed under s. 138 as they applied to or in relation to a report of Inspectors appointed under s. 235 or 237. So that s. 646 equates the report of the Inspector under s. 235 or 237 to an Inspector appointed under s. 138 with this important addition that not merely the report is equated but the provisions of the new Act are made applicable to this report or in relation to this report, and this brings us to the second answer given by the Advocate General.

The second answer is that even if Mr. Manecksha's argument were to be accepted and s. 646 was to be construed as an exception to s. 645, the language of s. 646 makes it clear that all the provisions of the new Act including the provisions contained in s. 239 were to apply to an Inspector appointed under s. 138. What is argued is that it is not merely the provisions of the Act which are to apply to a report, but they are to apply in relation to a report, and the Advocate General says that the expression "in relation to" is an expression of very wide import and the provisions of the Act which deal with the powers of the Inspector antecedent to the making of the report and all that has to be done in connection with the report after it has been made, are all covered by the expression "in relation to". It is pointed out that the first part of s. 138 only deals with the appointment of the Inspector. Indeed, it is nothing more than a reproduction in substance of s. 6 of the General Clauses Act. Having continued that appointment, according to the Advocate General, the latter part of s. 646 deals with the powers of the Inspector, and in dealing with that, it uses language wide enough to include the powers conferred upon the Inspector under the new Act under s. 239. In view of what we have held with regard to the effect of s. 646, it is unnecessary to decide whether the expression "in relation to" is of such wide import as to cover the conferment of power upon an Inspector under s. 239.

The third answer suggested by the Advocate General is that if s. 646 deals only with the power of the Central Government to appoint an Inspector and does not deal with the power of the Inspector himself, then that power falls within the ambit of s. 645 and is not affected by s. 646. What is said is that s. 646 deals with, according to the argument of Mr. Manecksha, the limited subject-matter expressly set out in that section. Well, says the Advocate General, let s. 646 apply to that limited subject-matter; with regard to all matters that are outside that subject-matter we should look to s. 645 for its application. It is again unnecessary for us to express any opinion on this argument as the first answer given by the Advocate General is sufficient to dispose of the first contention of the appellant.

The second contention urged by Mr. Manecksha is of very great importance and it affects certain important rights conferred by the Constitution upon the citizens of our country. Article 20(3) of the Constitution, which provides that no person accused of any offence shall be compelled to be a witness against himself, is based upon, as we shall presently point out, the well-known principles of English law and also upon a specific article in the American Constitution. As has been pointed out, the abuses of the Star Chamber where confessions were extracted from those who appeared before that Chamber led to a revulsion of feeling in England against self-accusation and the feeling assumed such strong proportions that the principle became incorporated in the English Common law that a person cannot be compelled to testify against himself. The principle was known as testimonial compulsion, the basic features of which were that it is wrong to compel a man to give an answer or to give evidence and to use that answer or that evidence against him. He has given the answer because he is not a free agent. He does not do it voluntarily; he does it under compulsion, and then to make use of that answer obtained under compulsion against himself in order to convict him or to hold him liable for any omission or default is contrary to basic principles of justice. Now, this principle of English Common law was so well established that when the American founding fathers drafted their Constitution it was incorporated in that Constitution, not at the first stage, but later on by means of an amendment, and the form that the amendment took in the American Constitution is in the Amendment Art. V, and the relevant portion of that amendment for the purpose of this discussion is that "no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." Reference may also be made to the Amendment Art. IV which deals with unreasonable searches and seizures and provides:

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

So that the Fourth Amendment safeguarded the privacy of the home and made it unconstitutional for the issue of searches and seizures unless they were on reasonable grounds. The Fifth Amendment dealt with what is known as testimonial compulsion.

Now, our Constitution makers in art. 20(3) did not deal with the Fourth Amendment but, as the authorities have made it clear, only dealt with testimonial compulsion leaving searches and seizures to be dealt with under the general law, unless, as we shall point out, searches or seizures constitute a contravention of art. 20(3) as being testimonial compulsion for the production of documentary evidence. The difference between the language used in art. 20(3) and the Fifth Amendment will become immediately apparent. The American Constitution limits the right of immunity from compulsory testimonial to a criminal case. In art. 20(3), as Mr. Manekshaw has rightly pointed out, that limitation does not appear. The protection against this compulsion under our Constitution is general. It is not confined to any particular criminal case as would appear if art. 20(3) were to be read by itself. But in construing art. 20(3) we must adopt certain canons of construction. The first and the obvious one is to read the article as a whole and not to divorce cl. (3) of that article from the rest of it. The second is that we must not overlook the fact that the Constitution makers in India had knowledge not only of the American Constitution but also the principles of English Common law and also the exceptions engrafted upon those principles. Finally, we must give to this article an interpretation which is for the greatest good of the people. We are not dealing with an ordinary statute or with an ordinary piece of legislation. We are dealing with the Constitution of India and in interpreting any provision of the Constitution we must not overlook the fact that the Constitution was enacted for the purposes set out in the preamble to the Constitution. Therefore, any interpretation which advances the good of the people must be preferred to an interpretation which would retard the interest of the people of our country. Fortunately, in this case the interpretation of art. 20(3) is not a matter of first impression. We have assistance, and more than assistance, from the decisions of the Supreme Court to which reference will be made, and these decisions, as we shall presently point out, make it clear that art. 20(3) should be read in the context of the two clauses which precede it and this article should not be read in the light of the American Constitution or the American decisions but more in the light of our own legislative provisions, our own legislative history, the background of English law, and the Constitution looked upon as an organic whole.

Turning first to the article itself, the marginal note is "Protection in respect of conviction for offences", and cl. (1) provides:

"(1) No person shall be convicted of any offence except for violation of law in force at the time of the commission of the act charged as an offence, nor be subjected to a penalty greater than that which might have been inflicted under the law in force at the time of the commission of the offence."

Clause (2) provides:

"(2) No person shall be prosecuted and punished for the same offence more than once."

Then we come to the clause in question:

"(3) No person accused of any offence shall be compelled to be a witness against himself."

Looking at the language used and the expressions, it seems clear that what the

- Constitution makers were contemplating was various privileges conferred upon persons either in the conduct of a criminal proceeding itself or in respect of a criminal proceeding. The expressions in cl. (1) "convicted of any offence, commission of the act charged as an offence, subjected to penalty;" in cl. (2) "prosecuted and punished"; and in cl. (3) "accused of any offence", inevitably leads one to that conclusion. Although the marginal note does not clearly apply to all provisions of art. 20, the emphasis placed on the marginal note is "conviction for offences."

Turning next to the decisions of the Supreme Court, there are three decisions which are of importance and which have got to be taken into consideration in interpreting this article. The first and the earliest is Magbool Hussain v. The State of Bombay.² In that case the Supreme Court undoubtedly was dealing with the provisions of cl. (2) of art. 20 and the question that arose for the decision of their Lordships was whether, where a person against whom proceedings had been taken by the Sea Customs Authorities under s. 167 of the Sea Customs Act and an order for confiscation of goods had been passed was subsequently prosecuted before the Presidency Magistrate for an offence under s. 23 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act in respect of the same act, it could be said that that constituted a contravention of cl. (2) of art. 20 and whether he was prosecuted and punished for the same offence more than once, and the Court came to the conclusion that cl. (2) of art. 20 had not been contravened. Mr. Maneksha is right when he contends that this is not a direct decision on the particular provision of art. 20 which we are considering, but there are important and weighty observations in the judgment of Mr. Justice Bhagwati at p. 738 which observations are not confined to cl. (2) of art. 20 but which are pertinent to the construction of the article as a whole, and this is what the learned Judge says:

"The words 'before a court of law or judicial tribunal' are not to be found in article 20(2). But if regard be had to the whole background indicated above it is clear that in order that the protection of article 20(2) be invoked by a citizen there must have been a prosecution and punishment in respect of the same offence before a court of law or a tribunal, required by law to decide the matters in controversy judicially on evidence on oath which it must be authorised by law to administer and not before a tribunal which entertains a departmental or an administrative enquiry even though set up by a statute but not required to proceed on legal evidence given on oath. The very wording of article 20 and the words used therein:—'convicted', 'commission of the act charged as an offence', 'be subjected to a penalty', 'commission of the offence', 'prosecuted and punished', 'accused of any offence', would indicate that the proceedings therein contemplated are of the nature of criminal proceedings before a court of law or a judicial tribunal and the prosecution in this context would mean an initiation or starting of proceedings of a criminal nature before a court of law or a judicial tribunal in accordance with the procedure prescribed in the statute which creates the offence and regulates the procedure."

Therefore, it is clear that Mr. Justice Bhagwati in this decision, construing art. 20 as a whole, took the view and the clear view that the proceedings contemplated in art. 20, not in cl. (2) only but in the article as a whole, were criminal proceedings, and dealing particularly with cl. (2) the learned Judge took the view that the prosecution in that context would mean an initiation or starting of proceedings of a criminal nature before a Court of law or a judicial tribunal. Mr. Maneksha again rightly contends that in cl. (2) of art. 20 we are concerned with accusation and not with prosecution and he submits that accusation must be antecedent to prosecution, and according to him the proper construction of cl. (2) of art. 20, notwithstanding these remarks of Mr. Justice Bhagwati, is that if there is an allegation of an offence having been committed before a tribunal or an authority competent to investigate into that allegation, then a person is accused of an offence within the meaning of this clause and he cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself.

Therefore, really, the question before us narrows itself down to this. What is the meaning we must give to the expression "accused of an offence". In this case there is no doubt that the compulsion against which art. 20(3) affords protection is present because, as we have pointed out when we were looking at the scheme of the Act, under s. 240(5) there is provision for an obligation on the part of any person examined by an Inspector or by the Court to answer questions put to him and the possibility of those answers being used in evidence against him and it is also clear that those answers could be used in evidence against him although the answers may be of an incriminating nature. Therefore, if we may pose the question which we have to consider and decide, the question is this. Is the expression "accused of any offence" used in a general sense or is it used in a technical sense? Is the accusation referred to in this clause an accusation without any reference to any criminal proceeding or is it an accusation with reference to a criminal proceeding? Mr. Manecksha concedes, and rightly concedes, that the investigation held by the Inspector is not a judicial proceeding, and in our opinion it cannot be seriously urged that it is a criminal proceeding. But according to Mr. Manecksha that is an irrelevant fact. The appellant is accused of having committed an offence under the Company Law and under other laws. In respect of that accusation investigation is being held by the Inspector and in the course of the investigation there is a compulsion upon the appellant to answer such questions as might be put to him. Those answers may be incriminating and they may be used against him, and therefore Mr. Manecksha says that the Constitutional safeguard given to every person in India has been violated. Now, if we had to accept the observations of Mr. Justice Bhagwati as correctly laying down the interpretation of art. 20, then it is clear that Mr. Manecksha's contentions must be rejected, because the passage just referred to leaves no doubt that in the opinion of the learned Judge the construction of art. 20 required that the proceedings in respect of the various protections given by art. 20 are criminal proceedings. But Mr. Manecksha says that this decision was a decision on art. 20(2), that the observations with regard to the interpretation of art. 20 are obiter, and that the real decision of the Supreme Court on art. 20(3) is Sharma's case to which we shall presently come. But before we come to that decision, we must point out, as we have said in this Court before, that even an obiter of the Supreme Court deserves the highest respect and it is incumbent upon this Court to accept even the obiter as correctly laying down the law. When in a case a particular clause of a section or an article calls for interpretation and in order to interpret it the Supreme Court interprets the whole section or article and lays down the proper canon of construction, it is impossible to contend that that interpretation is not binding upon this Court, unless of course the Supreme Court in any subsequent decision has departed from the interpretation laid down by it in this decision, and, as has been pointed out by the Advocate General, far from the Supreme Court departing from it, what it has laid down in this case as to the proper interpretation of art. 20 is reiterated and re-emphasised by it in a subsequent decision in Venkataraman's case.

Turning to M. P. Sharma v. Satish Chandra, District Magistrate, Delhi,³ on which Mr. Manecksha has rightly placed strongest reliance, it is true that this is the only case of the Supreme Court where the question of the construction of art. 20(3) directly arose for consideration and decision. The facts are a little important. The Registrar of the Joint Stock Companies, Delhi State, lodged information with the Inspector-General, Delhi Special Police Establishment, that Messrs. Dalmia Jain Airways Ltd. had committed various offences. This was recorded by the Special Police as the first information report. On the basis of that report an application was made to the District Magistrate, Delhi, under s. 96 of the Criminal Procedure Code for the issue of warrants for the search of certain documents. Permission to investigate in respect of some of the non-cognizable offences mentioned in the first information report was also asked for by this application and the District Magistrate ordered investigation of the offences and issued warrants for simultaneous searches at various places. The searches were made pursuant to this order and the petition was filed in the Supreme Court praying that the search warrants may be quashed as being illegal. What was argued before the Supreme Court was that this was testimonial compulsion and violated the provisions of art. 20(3). It was argued before the Supreme Court that the expression "compelled to be a witness against himself" only applied to the actual evidence given in a Court of law and that when documents were being seized which may be used against an accused person art. 20(3) had no application. That argument was rejected by the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court held that the safeguard afforded by art. 20(3) was not restricted to testimony in Court itself, but it also applied to documentary evidence, and it also applied to compulsion which may be used against a person to be a witness against himself in a proceeding antecedent to the trial itself. But the particular application was dismissed on the ground that in the American Constitution search warrants were dealt with by the Fourth Amendment, the Constitution makers had not chosen fit to incorporate that provision in the Constitution, and therefore the search warrants were to be governed by the ordinary law of the land and art. 20(3) did not apply to search warrants. Now, there is a passage at p. 1086 on which strong emphasis has been placed by Mr. Maneksha.

"In view of the above background, there is no inherent reason to construe the ambit of this fundamental right as comprising a very wide range. Nor would it be legitimate to confine it to the barely literal meaning of the words used, since it is a recognised doctrine that when appropriate a constitutional provision has to be liberally construed, so as to advance the intentment thereof and to prevent its circumvention. Analysing the terms in which this right has been declared in our Constitution, it may be said to consist of the following components. (1) It is a right pertaining to a person 'accused of an offence'; (2) It is a protection against 'compulsion to be a witness'; and (3) It is a protection against such compulsion resulting in his giving evidence 'against himself'."

Therefore, Mr. Maneksha says that the attempt of the Advocate General to persuade us to give a limited and restricted meaning to this provision in the Constitution should be repelled by us in view of this emphatic observation by the Supreme Court.

Now, this observation must be understood and appreciated in its own context. The Supreme Court refused to confine the protection afforded by art. 20(3) to the narrow ambit of oral evidence given in the Court itself. To that extent a wider signification must be given to that article and to that extent it will be wrong to construe this article literally. But the question still remains whether, within the larger ambit as envisaged by the Supreme Court, it should be confined to criminal proceedings or it should be further extended to cases like this where an inquiry is being held which is not a criminal proceeding in which allegations have been undoubtedly made against the appellant which are allegations of having committed an offence, and whether it could be said that in such a proceeding any provision of law by which the person against whom the inquiry is being held may be compelled to answer incriminating questions should be held to be a contravention of the constitutional safeguard. Fortunately, this very case throws considerable light on the manner in which art. 20(3) should be construed because at p. 1088 Mr. Justice Jagannadhas J. in the judgment of the Supreme Court says:

"...Indeed, every positive volitional act which furnishes evidence is testimony, and testimonial compulsion connotes coercion which procures the positive volitional evidentiary acts of the person, as opposed to the negative attitude of silence or submission on his part. Nor is there any reason to think that the protection in respect of the evidence so procured is confined to what transpires at the trial in the Court room. The phrase used in Article 20(3) is 'to be a witness' and not to 'appear as a witness': It follows that the protection afforded to an accused in so far as it is related to the phrase 'to be a witness' is not merely in respect of testimonial compulsion in the Court room but may well extend to compelled testimony previously obtained from him. It is available therefore to a person against whom a formal accusation relating to the commission of an offence has been levelled which in the normal course may result in prosecution. Whether it is available to other persons in other situations does not call for decision in this case."

Therefore, the test laid down by the Supreme Court is that this protection is available when there is a formal accusation against a person, and the second test is that that formal accusation must in the normal course result in prosecution. Now, can it be said that in this case the accusation levelled against the appellant is a formal accusation, and can it be said that in the normal course the accusation would result in prosecution? Mr. Manecksha says that in this very case there was no formal accusation. All that had happened was that a first information was given to the police and on the strength of that information an application was made for a search warrant. Therefore, the Supreme Court obviously took the view that an allegation made to the police of Messrs. Dalmia Jain Airways Ltd. having committed an offence was an accusation which came within the ambit of art. 20(3). Mr. Manecksha further says that this is certainly not a case where a formal accusation is made in a criminal Court or before a tribunal holding criminal proceedings.

Now, it is true, as Mr. Manecksha has pointed out to us, that the Supreme Court has taken the view that a mere application for a search warrant by the police does not result in the Magistrate, to whom the application is made, taking cognizance of the case. "Cognizance" as understood in the Criminal Procedure Code is a very technical expression and it may be that when the Magistrate granted the application for search warrant he had not taken cognizance within the meaning of s. 191 of the Criminal Procedure Code. See in this connection *Legal Remembrancer v. Abani Kumar*⁴ and *R. R. Chari v. State of U.P.*⁵ But whether cognizance was taken or not, it was certainly, to use the language of Mr. Justice Bhagwati, initiation or starting of proceedings before a Court of law and the initiation was done by the filing of the first information report before the police authorities. It may also be said that if there was not a formal accusation before a Court, it was certainly a formal accusation with reference to a criminal proceeding, and it can also be said that in this particular case the accusation would have normally resulted in a prosecution. Now, are these elements present in the case before us? It is true as pointed out by Mr. Manecksha in the various documents to which reference has already been made, that the appellant was charged with having misappropriated the funds of the company and having committed an offence under the Companies Act and also under the Indian Penal Code. In the sense that there was an allegation that he had done or omitted to do something which was against the law, undoubtedly he was accused of an offence. But it would be stretching the language too far to suggest that there was any formal accusation against the appellant. Nor would it be true to say that the accusation was either before a criminal Court or tribunal or was with reference to a criminal proceeding. Nor would it be true to suggest, looking to the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code, that this accusation in the normal course would result in prosecution. It is fallacious to suggest that the only object of the inquiry and the only purpose of the report was to launch a prosecution under s. 242 of the Companies Act. It was left to the discretion of the Central Government under s. 242 to launch or not to launch a prosecution, and, as we shall point out in another context, the report of the Inspector and the inquiry held by him serve under the Companies Act many more important purposes than the mere prosecution of a defaulting managing agent or a defaulting director.

We then come to the third Supreme Court case which is S. A. Venkataraman v. The Union of India.⁶ That case decided that an inquiry made and concluded under Public Servants (Inquiries) Act, 1850, (Act XXXVII of 1850) did not amount to prosecution and punishment for an offence as contemplated by art. 20(2) of the Constitution. It is true that this decision again is not on art. 20(3) but art. 20(2). But here too we have very weighty observations of the Supreme Court which have a direct bearing on the interpretation of art. 20(3). The Advocate General has taken us through the provisions of the Public Servants (Inquiries) Act, 1850, and that Act does suggest from the language used in the various sections with regard to the framing of the charge and the person against whom the inquiry is being held as being described as an accused, that the inquiry was more or less similar to a criminal proceeding. It is also true that we do not find any provision in that Act which makes the accused a compellable witness, and therefore the element of compulsory testimonial which we find in the Companies Act is absent and to that extent no question with regard to art. 20(3) would arise when an inquiry is being held against a public servant. But the point of the decision is not that. The point of the decision is two-fold. One is that the Supreme Court confirmed the decision in Maqbool Hussain's case with regard to the interpretation of art. 20 and it will be noticed that Venkatraman's case is subsequent to Sharma's case, and the other point is that in construing art. 20(2) the Supreme Court laid down certain tests which may be equally applicable in construing art. 20(3). At p. 1154 Mr. Justice Mukherjee says:

"It has also been held by this court in Maqbool Hussain's case that the language of article 20 and the words actually used in it afford a clear indication that the proceedings in connection with the prosecution and punishment of a person must be in the nature of a criminal proceeding, before a court of law or judicial tribunal, and not before a tribunal which entertains a departmental or an administrative enquiry even though set up by a statute, but which is not required by law to try a matter judicially and on legal evidence."

So once more the Supreme Court emphasises what according to it is the correct approach, and the only approach, to art. 20 as a whole. At p. 1160 the Court observes referring to the inquiry under the Public Servants (Inquiries) Act:

"...At the close of the enquiry, the Commissioner has to submit a report to the Government regarding his finding on each one of the charges made. This is a mere expression of opinion and it lacks both finality and authoritativeness which are the essential tests of a judicial pronouncement."

Now, these observations apply fully to the report to be made by the Inspector investigating under the Companies Act. The report is nothing more than an expression of his opinion and there is neither finality nor authoritativeness about it. That finality and authoritativeness can only be given by the Central Government if the Central Government decides to launch a prosecution accepting the opinion given by the Inspector. At p. 1161 the Supreme Court considers the analogous case of a member of the Bar whose name is struck off the rolls on grounds of professional misconduct in exercise of the disciplinary jurisdiction by the proper authority, and what the Supreme Court says is that primarily the inquiry is into the professional misconduct of the member of the Bar and not into an offence committed by him or an investigation into that offence. Attention might also be drawn to another observation of Mr. Justice Mukherjee at p. 1156:

"...In order to arrive at a proper decision on this point, it is necessary to examine the entire background of the provisions relating to enquiry into the conduct of public servants and to ascertain the exact scope and purpose of the enquiry as is contemplated by Act XXXVII of 1850 and the ultimate result that flows from it."

Mr. Manekshaw also referred to a judgment of a single Judge of the Calcutta High Court in Calcutta M. & C. Co. v. Collector of Customs,⁷ where the learned Judge has applied the ratio of Sharma's case and has come to the conclusion that art. 20(3) was not merely applicable to a criminal trial in Court, it applied to proceedings which may lead to such a trial, and that in proceedings under s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act the party is compelled to give evidence and to depose truthfully and produce any document, in such a case he might incriminate himself, and although such a proceeding is not in the course of a criminal trial it is obvious that it is preliminary to it, and hence the provisions of s. 171A in so far as it enables the authorities to compel a person to give evidence against himself and to produce documents for that purpose offends against art. 20(3) of the Constitution and is bad. Of course, we are not considering the provisions of the Sea Customs Act. But with very great respect, the reasoning which commended itself to the learned Judge is not acceptable to us. In our view, the learned Judge has not attached sufficient importance to the observations of the Supreme Court in Magbool Hussain's case and Venkataraman's case, because, if he had done so, we are sure he would not have come to the conclusion which he did.

Now, following the advice given by the Supreme Court, it would only be proper if we try to consider the real scope and nature of the inquiry under the Company's Act. What the scope and nature of the inquiry is, is made clear by the words used by the Legislature in s. 235 and those words are "to investigate the affairs of any company and to report thereon." Therefore, the main and primary function of this investigation is to look into the affairs of the company from the point of view of the provisions of the Companies Act, to consider its working, to see whether it is worked in the interest of the shareholders, and to find out whether the privilege of incorporation has or has not been abused. We may briefly look at what the consequences of the report made by the Inspector may be. It may result in an application for a winding up under s. 243, it may lead to proceedings for recovery of damages or property under s. 244, it may lead to an application for relief in case of oppression under s. 397, and it may lead to an application for relief in case of mismanagement under s. 398. As pointed out by the Advocate General, these impugned provisions under the head of "Investigation" appear in Part VI which deals with management and administration of the company. These provisions with regard to inspection came up for consideration by the House of Lords in the case of *Hearts of Oak Assurance Co. v. Attorney-General*⁸, and the House of Lords was dealing with the Industrial Assurance Act, 1923, the provisions of which with regard to inspection were in pari materia with the provisions of the Companies Act, and Lord Thankerton at p. 396 says:

"It appears to me to be clear that the object of the examination is merely to recover information as to the company's affairs and that it is in no sense a judicial proceeding for the purpose of trial of an offence; it is enough to point out that there are no parties before the inspector, that he alone conducts the inquiry, and that the power to examine on oath is confined to the officers, members, agents and servants of the company."

Of course, this last observation now will no longer be correct in view of the extension brought about in the provisions of the law both in India and in England. At p. 401 Lord Macmillan says:

"...Then it will be noticed that the Commissioner may either himself conduct the inspection or entrust it to an inspector appointed by him for the purpose. The object manifestly is that the Commissioner may either by himself directly or through the medium of a delegate obtain the information necessary to enable him to decide what action, if any, he should take. The cardinal words of the section are those which empower the Commissioner or his inspector 'to examine into and report on the affairs of the society'."

If those were the cardinal words in the case before the House of Lords, as far as we are concerned the cardinal words, as pointed out, which are used in s. 235 are "to investigate the affairs of the company."

Therefore, it is clear on an examination of the provisions of the Companies Act that the scope and nature of the inquiry is not investigation into an offence. The scope and nature of the inquiry is investigation into the affairs of the company. It is equally clear that the report is not made for the purpose of a prosecution being launched by the Central Government and that the function of the Inspector is to express an opinion on the way the affairs of the company are conducted in order that appropriate action may be taken which action may take different forms like applications under the different sections of the Companies Act to which reference has been made or a prosecution under s. 242 of the Companies Act.

Mr. Manecksha has cited before us several American decisions which undoubtedly have given to this Constitutional safeguard a much wider content than what we have suggested is the right one, and Mr. Manecksha says that these American decisions correctly interpret the important Constitutional safeguard, that they emphasise the importance and value of that safeguard to the citizen, and it will be wrong for the Court to whittle down that safeguard in any manner whatsoever. Our attention was drawn to the observations in Boyd v. United States.⁹ Mr. Justice Bradley observes at p. 751:

"...Now it is elementary knowledge that one cardinal rule of the court of chancery is never to decree a discovery which might tend to convict the party of a crime, or to forfeit his property. And any compulsory discovery by extorting the party's oath, or compelling the production of his private books and papers, to convict him of crime or to forfeit his property, is contrary to the principles of a free government. It is abhorrent to the instincts of an Englishman; it is abhorrent to the instincts of an American. It may suit the purposes of despotic power; but it cannot abide the pure atmosphere of political liberty and personal freedom."

It is difficult to imagine stronger words than these which could have been possibly used by any Judge from the Bench. Now, in construing the article as we propose to do, if we are doing anything to help despotic power or to contaminate the atmosphere of political liberty and personal freedom or doing something which is abhorrent to the instincts of an Englishman or an American, we will certainly pause and ponder before we come to that conclusion. But, as we shall presently point out, with great respect, Mr. Justice Bradley has used the language of exaggeration because in certain matters an exception has been made to the doctrine of safeguard against self-incrimination, and it is incorrect to say that those exceptions can ever be looked upon by an Englishman as abhorrent to his instincts or contrary to principles of free government. But before we come to these exceptions, let us look at the American cases on which Mr. Manecksha relies.

The first is Counselman v. Hitchcock,¹⁰ and the second is Blau v. United States.¹¹ Both were cases dealing with proceedings before a Grand Jury and undoubtedly the observations in both these cases give a much wider import and connotation to art. 20(3) than what in our opinion the Supreme Court has suggested as the right one. In Counselman v. Hitchcock the investigation by the Grand Jury was in respect of alleged violations of a certain Act of Congress to regulate commerce. At p. 1118 Mr. Justice Blatchford says:

"It is broadly contended on the part of the appellee that a witness is not entitled to plead the privilege of silence, except in a criminal case against himself; but such is not the language of the Constitution. Its provision is that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself. This provision must have a broad construction in favour of the right which it was intended to secure."

And at p. 1121:

"But, as the manifest purpose of the constitutional provisions, both of the states and of the United States, is to prohibit the compelling of testimony of a self-criminating kind from a party or a witness, the liberal construction which must be placed upon constitutional provisions for the protection of personal rights would seem to require that the constitutional guarantees however differently worded, should have as far as possible the same interpretation;..."

⁹ (1885) 116 U. S. 616, 618, 29 Law. ed. 746.

¹⁰ (1890) 142 U. S. 547, 35 Law. ed. 1110.

¹¹ (1850) 340 U. S. 189, 95 Law. ed. 170.

Therefore, the emphasis is placed in this case that the constitutional provision in order to be valid must afford absolute immunity against future prosecution for the offence to which the question relates, and at p. 1114 Mr. Justice Blatchford went to the length of stating:

"...It could not, and would not, prevent the use of his testimony to search out other testimony to be used in evidence against him or his property, in a criminal proceeding in such Court. It could not prevent the obtaining and the use of witnesses and evidence which should be attributable directly to the testimony he might give under compulsion, and on which he might be convicted, when otherwise, and if he had refused to answer, he could not possibly have been convicted."

Therefore, the American Supreme Court took the view that absolute immunity against prosecution required that the person in whose affairs inquiry was being held should be given absolute immunity against future prosecution. The next case is Blau v. United States, and there the American Supreme Court laid down that it was sufficient if the person being compelled to give evidence reasonably feared that criminal charges may be brought against him if he testified. In McCarthy v. Arndstein,¹² notwithstanding the language of the American Amendment, the Court took the view that that immunity applied both to civil and criminal proceedings.

Now, the Advocate General has very fairly conceded that if we were to interpret art. 20(3) in the light of these American decisions, he would have no answer to the petition presented by the appellant and that the appellant was entitled to succeed. But his contention is, apart from the decisions of the Supreme Court on which reliance has been placed, that our legislative history, which is based upon English law and not American law, further supports and strengthens his argument that a narrower connotation should be given to art. 20(3). Now, in England, as Mr. Justice Bradley says, however abhorrent testimonial compulsion may be to the instincts of an Englishman, an exception has always been made in the department of Company law and Insolvency law. Before we turn to the legislative provisions, we must first look at the principle of it. In Insolvency, law is administered partly for the benefit of the creditors, but primarily in public interest. The same is true of Company law. It is administered undoubtedly for the benefit of the shareholders, but again primarily it is administered in public interest. Company law permits incorporation with limited liability and the public has got to be safeguarded against that privilege being abused, and the English law has always taken the view that when you are investigating into the affairs of a bankrupt or into the affairs of a company, the doctrine of self-incrimination cannot defeat or should not be permitted to defeat the interest of the public, and it is rightly pointed out that our law has taken the same view and has enacted the same privileges. Now, this legislative history was before our Constitution makers and it is impossible to take the view that by enacting art. 20(3) our Constitution makers wanted to make a violent departure from the principles it had followed and observed for years past to make many laws ultra vires and to adopt the American system in preference to the English system. In English law under s. 15 of the Bankruptcy Act, in the public examination of the debtor the answers given by him have to be taken down in writing, to be signed by him, and could be used in evidence against him, and there is compulsion upon the debtor to answer all questions as the Court may put or allow to be put to him. This question of compulsory testimonial under English Bankruptcy Law came up for consideration in two English cases, in Atherton, In re,¹³ where it was held that a bankrupt was bound to answer questions in his public examination even if they be incriminating, and again in Paget, In re: Official Receiver, Ex parte,¹⁴ it was pointed out by the Court at p. 92 that in matters of bankruptcy it is not merely the creditors who have their rights, but it is also the public themselves whose interests have to be safeguarded.

¹³ [1912] 2 K. B. 251.

Turning to Company Law, apart from the impugned provisions, let us consider the provisions with regard to misfeasance summonses. First turning to the English Act, under s. 270 the person who is being examined is bound to answer questions put to him, and it is clear law as pointed out by Buckley at p. 566 that a person examined cannot refuse to answer relevant questions on the ground that by doing so he may incriminate himself. Our own Companies Act had similar provisions. The Act of 1913 under s. 196(7) which deals with the power to order public examination of promoters, directors, etc. provided:

"Notes of the examination shall be taken down in writing, and shall be read over to or by, and signed by, the person examined, and may thereafter be used in evidence against him in civil proceedings, and shall be open to the inspection of any creditor or contributory at all reasonable times."

So here the use of this evidence was confined to civil proceedings. But now by the new Act under s. 478 this evidence can be used in all proceedings, thus bringing our provisions in line with the English law, and with regard to the impugned provision of our Company's Act, s. 167 of the English Act on which our Act is based provides also for evidence given in the course of investigation being used against the person giving the testimony. The only difference between the English Act and our Act is that under the English Act this provision could only be used when the person is examined by Court. In our Act the provision applies whether the person is examined by the Inspector or by the Court. Therefore, wider power was taken by the Legislature under our law, and the view of Buckley, to which respect must be paid, is that this provision is similar to the provision with regard to the Bankruptcy Act and apparently the person who is under examination cannot refuse to answer questions on the ground that the answer may incriminate himself.

We must not fail to notice one argument which was advanced by Mr. Manecksha which has a bearing both on this aspect of the case and on the next aspect which we will presently consider, that the present provisions are so stringent and according to him so barbarous that they put his client in a worse position than if the police were actually investigating into an offence committed by him. He says that if there was a police investigation, any statements made by him in the course of investigation would not be evidence. He further says that if there was a judicial proceeding, then under s. 132, although he was compelled to answer, protection was given by the provisions of the Act. Now, the answer to that complaint is two-fold. The first is, as we have already stated, that this is not an investigation into an offence, in which case the rights of the accused are safeguarded by the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code, and, as the Advocate General pointed out, in our opinion under the Companies Act when we come to actual prosecution the Legislature is at pains to provide that assistance should be given by everyone concerned for the purpose of the prosecution except the accused in the proceedings. Therefore, when we reach that stage, the safeguards rightly afforded by our Criminal Procedure Code are given to the person concerned. With regard to the Evidence Act, in terms the Act applies to judicial proceedings. It does not apply to a proceeding which is not judicial. It is an adjectival law which can be qualified and modified by the substantive law of the country. It undoubtedly happens that in a non-judicial proceeding a person who is being examined cannot claim the privilege of the benefit of s. 132. But even in a judicial proceeding it would be open to the Legislature to provide that the adjectival law should be altered if it can be done undoubtedly consistent with the provisions of art. 20(3) of the Constitution.

Having taken all the circumstances into consideration we have come to the conclusion that art. 20(3) has no application to the facts of this case. There is no accusation in the sense in which we have construed that expression, viz., a formal accusation, and inasmuch as there is no accusation, the compulsion introduced by the provisions of the Companies Act which is impugned is not a compulsion which can be struck down by this provision of the Constitution.

We may also add that in giving this restricted meaning to the constitutional safeguard, we have carefully weighed the rights of the individual against the interest of the public and of the State. In our opinion, it is the duty of the Court, to the extent that it can legitimately do without doing violence to the language used by the Constitution makers, to arrive at a solution which, while maintaining the rights of the individual as far as possible, does not overlook the rights which the public and the State are entitled to claim.

Turning to the third head of Mr. Manecksha's argument, it can be very briefly disposed of. The argument is based on art. 14. Now, there are very few articles of the Constitution which have received so much attention by the different Courts as art. 14 and it is unnecessary to repeat what has been laid down as the basis of classification which will prevent the application of that article. What is urged in this case is that there is no equality before the law because a person who is being examined under the provision of the Companies Act does not get the protection which another person is entitled to under s. 132 of the Evidence Act, and it is also said that this particular company or this particular managing agent has been picked out for special treatment and thereby there has been discrimination. The latter part of the argument, as Mr. Manecksha fairly conceded, is now conclusively answered in *Ram Krishna Dalmia v. Tendolkar J.*¹⁵ by the Supreme Court. That, Mr. Manecksha says, is true as far as the challenge to s. 239 is concerned, but he says that the challenge to s. 240(5) still remains and that has not been considered by the Supreme Court. In our opinion, it is impossible to urge that there is discrimination and that there is no proper classification on a rational basis, when an important system of law as the English system recognises these exceptions as pointed out both in Insolvency law and Company law. Therefore, if our law makes a distinction between the rights of persons who are examined under the provisions of the Company Law and the rights of persons under other laws, it cannot be said that that classification is without a rational basis.

The result, therefore, is that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs. Two counsel certified.

Liberty to the respondents' attorneys to withdraw the sum of Rs. 500 deposited in Court.

Leave to appeal to the Supreme Court under arts. 132(1) and 133(1)(c) on the appellant undertaking to file a proper petition within a fortnight. The Advocate General agrees not to proceed with the inquiry for six weeks from today to enable the appellant to get the necessary order of stay from the Supreme Court.

Appeal dismissed.

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL CIVIL.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. M. C. Chagla, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice S. T. Desai.

THE STATE OF BOMBAY v. KULSUMBAI JAFFERALI G. PADAMSEE.*

Bombay Land Requisition Act (Bom. XXXIII of 1948), Secs. 4(3), 6(4)(a), 6(1), 2(1) & (2)†—Bombay Land Requisition Ordinance, 1947, Sec. 4(1)—Premises let out prior to January 1947 but thereafter till November 1955 used as lodging house—Order of requisition made in October 1957—Landlord alleging that premises occupied by licensees on date of order—Whether premises intended to be let within s. 4(3) and therefore premises liable to be requisitioned—Notification under s. 6(1) whether necessary before s. 6 can apply to scheduled areas mentioned in s. 2(1).

Certain rooms in a building situated in the city of Bombay were let out by the landlord before January 1, 1947. From January 1, 1947, to November 1955 these rooms were used as a lodging house. After November 1955 they were occupied by certain persons and it was alleged by the landlord that the occupation by these persons was as licensees and not as tenants. On October 10, 1957, an order for requisitioning these rooms was made under s. 6(4)(a) of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948. The order was challenged by the landlord inter alia on the ground that the rooms did not constitute premises within the meaning of the Act as these were not intended to be let, because they had never been in fact let after the Bombay Land Requisition Ordinance, 1947, came into force on December 4, 1947, or the Act came into force on April 11, 1948. On the question whether it could be said of the premises, assuming that these were given to licensees on October 10, 1957, that they were intended to be let as defined in s. 4(3) of the Act and were, therefore, premises which were liable to be requisitioned under the Act:—

Held, that as the landlord had expressed his volition by letting out the rooms prior to January 1, 1947, he could be said to have intended the rooms to be let within s. 4(3) of the Act, although these were not let when the Act came into force, and that, therefore, the rooms were premises within the meaning of the Act and the Government could exercise its power under s. 6 of the Act in respect of the premises.

State of Bombay v. Virendra Motabhai,¹ applied.

The Notification referred to in s. 6(1) of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, is an entirely different notification to the notification mentioned in s. 2(2) of the Act.

Section 6(1) of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, provides that even in the scheduled areas mentioned in s. 2(1) of the Act the provisions of s. 6 are not auto-

*Decided, September 4, 1958. O. C. J. Appeal No. 35 of 1958: Miscellaneous Application No. 336 of 1957.

†The relevant sections run thus:

4. In this Act, unless there is anything repugnant to the subject or context—...

(3) "premises" means any building or part of a building let or intended to be let separately including—...

6. (1) If any premises situate in an area specified by the State Government by notification in the Official Gazette, are vacant on the date of such notification and wherever any such premises are vacant or become vacant after such date by reason of the landlord, the tenant, or the sub-tenant, as the case may be ceasing to occupy the premises or by reason of the release of the premises from requisition or by reason of the premises being newly erected or reconstructed or for any other reason the landlord of such premises shall give intimation thereof in the prescribed form to an officer authorised in this behalf by the State Government.

(4) Whether or not an intimation under sub-section (1) is given and notwithstanding anything contained in section 5, the State

Government may by order in writing—

(a) requisition the premises for the purpose of the State or any other public purpose and may use or deal with the premises for any such purpose in such manner as may appear to it to be expedient; or

Provided that where an order is to be made under clause (a) requisitioning the premises in respect of which no intimation is given by the landlord, the State Government shall make such inquiry as it deems fit and make a declaration in the order that the premises were vacant or had become vacant, on or after the date referred to in sub-section (1) and such declaration shall be conclusive evidence that the premises were or had so become vacant:

2. (1) This Act shall extend to the areas specified in the Schedule hereto annexed and shall continue to extend to any such area notwithstanding that the area ceases to be of the description therein specified.

(2) The State Government may, by notification in Official Gazette, extend any or all of the provisions of this Act to any other area and on such date as may be specified in the notification.

matically to apply. A notification by Government issued under s. 6(1) is necessary before the provisions of s. 6 can apply to a scheduled area as a whole or any part of it.

The observation made in State of Bombay v. Virendra Motabhai to the effect that there was a drafting error in s. 6(1) of the Act because it refers to premises situated in the areas specified by the Provincial Government by a notification in the Official Gazette and it does not refer to areas specified by the Act itself under s. 2(1), is not justified by the language used in the Act.

ONE Kulsumbai (petitioner) was the owner of a building known as "Chhotu Terrace" situate at 105, Colaba Road, Bombay-5. This building was composed of various independent rooms and on the fifth floor of the building there were three such rooms bearing Nos. F1, F2 and F3. From January 1947 till November 1955 the petitioner used the whole of the building for the purpose of a lodging house known as the Chhotu Terrace Lodging House. In November 1955 the lodging house was closed. In December 1955 the petitioner entered into an agreement with one Hamid Sayani, her son-in-law, in connection with the aforesaid three rooms on the fifth floor of the building. Under that agreement the petitioner purported to grant her leave and licence to Hamid Sayani to use and occupy the said three rooms. On November 1, 1956, a fresh agreement was entered into with Hamid Sayani and the period of the licence mentioned in the agreement was eleven months. Before the expiration of this period Hamid Sayani left the rooms, and on March 5, 1957, the petitioner entered into an agreement with M. R. Shetty and B. T. Shenova purporting to grant her leave and licence to M. R. Shetty and B. T. Shenova for the occupation of the rooms. On October 10, 1957, Government passed an order requisitioning the premises consisting of the three rooms. That order was as under:—

"Whereas, on inquiry it is found that the premises specified below had become vacant in the month of March 1957.

Now, therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred by clause (a) of sub-section (4) of section 6 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948 (Bom. XXXIII of 1948), the Government of Bombay is pleased to declare that the said premises had become vacant after the 4th December 1947 and to requisition the said premises for a public purpose, namely, for housing a Bombay State Government servant."

The petitioner challenged the validity of this order on various grounds and prayed for the issue of a writ of mandamus or a writ in the nature of mandamus or a direction, order and/or appropriate writ under art. 226 of the Constitution of India ordering the State of Bombay to forbear from enforcing the requisition order dated October 10, 1957, and/or from taking any steps or proceedings in the enforcement of the said order and further ordering the State of Bombay to withdraw and cancel the said order. The petition was heard by K. T. Desai J. who held that the order of requisition was bad in law and directed that a writ of mandamus do issue, delivering the following judgment on February 10/11, 1958:—

K. T. Desai J. [His Lordship after stating the facts, proceeded:] Mr. Bhabha, the learned counsel for the petitioner, has urged that before any premises can be requisitioned under s. 6 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, the premises must be situate in an area specified by the State Government by notification in the Official Gazette. He says that the premises in question are not situate in any such area and that the Government had no authority to requisition the said premises. The material portion of the said s. 6 runs as under:—

"6(1). If any premises situate in an area specified by the State Government by notification in the Official Gazette, are vacant on the date of such notification and wherever any such premises are vacant or become vacant after such date by reason of the landlord, the tenant or the sub-tenant, as the case may be, ceasing to occupy the premises or by reason of the release of the premises from requisition or by reason of the premises being newly erected or reconstructed or for any other reason the landlord of such premises shall give intimation thereof in the prescribed form to an officer authorised in this behalf by the State Government."

Mr. Bhabha contends that s. 6 is only applicable to those premises which have been notified by the State Government under the provisions of s. 2(2) of the Act. In order to appreciate this contention, it is necessary to set out the provisions of s. 2 of the Act. That section runs as under:—

"2. (1) This Act shall extend to the areas specified in the Schedule hereto annexed and shall continue to extend to any such area notwithstanding that the area ceases to be of the description therein specified.

(2) The State Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, extend any or all of the provisions of this Act to any other area and on such date as may be specified in the notification.

(3) The State Government may, at any time by like notification, direct that any or all of the provisions of this Act shall cease to extend to any area and on such date as may be specified in the notification; and on that date the said provisions shall cease to be in force in such area."

The said Schedule specifies (1) City of Bombay, (2) Bombay Suburban District, (3) Thana District, (4) Ahmedabad District, (5) Surat District, (6) Nasik District, (7) Poona District, (8) Sholapur District, (9) Ahmednagar District, (10) Belgaum District and (11) Dharwar District, with the result that under the provisions of s. 2(1), the Act is operative in the aforesaid areas. In order that the Act may extend to any area outside the areas specified in the Schedule, it would be necessary for the State Government to issue a notification in exercise of the powers conferred under s. 2(2) of the Act. Mr. Bhabha argues that the notification contemplated under s. 6(1) of the Act is the notification referred to in s. 2(2) of the Act. According to his submission, s. 6 could under no conceivable circumstances apply to any of the areas specified in the Schedule to the Act i.e. amongst other areas to the city of Bombay, because they are the areas to which the Act extends by virtue of the provisions of s. 2(1). In my view, Mr. Bhabha has completely misread the provisions contained in s. 6(1). The notification in the Official Gazette referred to in s. 6 is not the notification whereby the operation of the Act is extended by the State Government under the provisions of s. 2(2). It is a notification independent of the notification referred to in s. 2(2). Even though the Act may be extended to any area outside the areas mentioned in the Schedule in exercise of the powers given to the State Government under s. 2(2), it would be necessary for the State Government to issue a notification under s. 6 in order to attract the provisions of that section. In order to make the provisions of s. 6 applicable, a notification under s. 6 is necessary in all cases whether the premises are situate in any area mentioned in the Schedule to which the Act extends by virtue of the provisions of s. 2(1) or are situate in any area outside it to which the provisions of the Act may be extended under s. 2(2). Section 6 provides for an intimation of a vacancy being given to an officer authorised in this behalf by the State Government within the time therein mentioned. It further provides that a landlord shall not be entitled without permission of the State Government, to let, occupy or permit to be occupied such premises before giving the intimation and for a period of one month from the date on which the intimation is received. It is further provided that any landlord who fails to give such intimation within the period specified in sub-s. (2) shall, on conviction, be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months or with fine or with both and that any landlord who lets, occupies or permits to be occupied the premises in contravention of the provisions of sub-s. (3), shall, on conviction, be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year and with fine. The areas specified in the Schedule are vast areas. They include numerous villages. They include even undeveloped areas within the State of Bombay. It was not the intention of the Legislature that the power of requisition given under s. 6 should be exercised in respect of premises in all the areas covered by the Schedule. It, therefore, by s. 6 provided that the power of requisition under that section was to be exercised by the State Government only in respect of premises situate in an area which the State Government may by notification specify. If Mr. Bhabha's contention were to be accepted, it would to a large extent frustrate the very object of the legislation. If there are any areas to which the provisions of s. 6 could fittingly be extended, they are some of the areas specified in the Schedule. Some of them are the most developed areas within the State of Bombay and it could not possibly be the object of the Legislature to exclude those areas from the ambit of the provisions of s. 6 and to confine the operation of s. 6 to the areas to which the Legislature did not in the first instance extend even the operation of the Act.

Mr. Bhabha has drawn my attention to the decision in State of Bombay v. Virendra Motabhai.¹ In that case in dealing with the scheme of the Act, the learned Chief Justice has, at page 633, observed as follows:—

"...Then we come to s. 6 which is a material section and that section deals with requisition of vacant premises. I may point out that there is a drafting error in s. 6(1) because it refers to premises situated in the area specified by the Provincial Government by notification in the Official Gazette, and it does not refer to the areas specified by the Act itself under s. 2(1). But it is clear that the object of the Act was to apply s. 6 both to areas covered by s. 2(1) and areas covered by s. 2(2). The error arises because this Act took the place of an earlier Ordinance and under that Ordinance the Ordinance could only be applied to the areas specified in the Official Gazette, whereas the scheme of s. 2 of the Act is different."

These observations of the learned Chief Justice about a drafting error in s. 6(1) to some extent support Mr. Bhabha's argument. The learned Chief Justice himself, however, observes that it was clear that the object of the Act was to apply s. 6 to areas covered by s. 2(1). If Mr. Bhabha's argument was accepted, the provisions of s. 6 could not extend at all to the areas covered by s. 2(1). Such a contention is clearly negatived by the aforesaid decision.

When one refers to the provisions of the Bombay Land Requisition Ordinance of 1947, which was repealed by the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, the intention of the Legislature as therein expressed appears to be clear beyond any doubt. By s. 1(2) of the Ordinance, the Ordinance was extended to the whole of the Province of Bombay. By s. 4 it was provided that if any premises situate in an area specified by the Provincial Government by notification in the Official Gazette were vacant on the date of such notification and whenever any such premises became vacant after such date either by the landlord ceasing to occupy the premises, or by the termination of a tenancy, or by the eviction of a tenant, or by the release of the premises from requisition or otherwise, the landlord of such premises shall give intimation thereof in the prescribed form to an officer authorised in that behalf by the Provincial Government. That section clearly contemplated the issue of a notification specifying the area in which the premises should be situate before the provisions of that section could apply. When the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, was enacted, the Act was not extended to the whole of the Province of Bombay. It was extended only to certain areas specified in the Schedule. As regards the rest it was provided that the Act would extend to such further areas as may be specified by the State Government by notification in the Official Gazette under s. 2(2). The notification referred to in s. 2(2) of the Act for extending the operation of the Act is different from the notification referred to in s. 6(1) of the Act specifying the area in which the premises must be situate before the provisions of s. 6 would apply.

Mr. Bhabha next argues that no notification at all has been issued under s. 6 of the Act and that the provisions of s. 6 are not applicable in respect of the rooms which have been requisitioned in the present case at all. Mr. Bhabha is right when he says that no express notification has been issued after the Act came into force. The notification relied upon by the State is a notification dated December 4, 1947, issued by the Government in exercise of the powers conferred by sub-s. (1) of s. 4 of the Bombay Land Requisition Ordinance, 1947. By that notification Government has notified the city of Bombay as the area for the purpose of sub-s. (1) of s. 4 of that Ordinance with the result that the provisions of s. 4(1) of the Ordinance have been made applicable to premises situate within the city of Bombay. This Ordinance has been repealed by the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948. Section 20 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, provides as under:—

"20. (1) The Bombay Land Requisition Ordinance, 1947, is hereby repealed and it is hereby declared that the provisions of sections 7 and 25 of the Bombay General Clauses Act, 1904, shall apply to the repeal as if that Ordinance were an enactment..."

Section 25 of the Bombay General Clauses Act, 1904, referred to above, runs as follows:—

"Where any enactment is, after the commencement of this Act, repealed and re-enacted by a Bombay Act with or without modification, then, unless it is otherwise expressly provided, any appointment, notification, order, scheme, rule, bye-law or form made or issued under the repealed enactment shall, so far as it is not inconsistent with the provisions re-enacted, continue in force, and be deemed to have been made or issued under the provisions so re-enacted, unless and until it is superseded, by any appointment, notification, order, scheme, rule, bye-law or form made or issued under the provisions so re-enacted."

By virtue of the operation of s. 20 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, the Ordinance of 1947 has to be treated as an enactment within the meaning of s. 25 of the Bombay General Clauses Act. Mr. Bhabha says that s. 25 of the Bombay General Clauses Act would apply only if it could be said that the Ordinance had been re-enacted by the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, with or without modification. He strongly urges that the Act does not re-enact the Ordinance with or without modification. He says that there is such a change in some of the provisions of the Act that it cannot properly be said that the Act is a re-enactment of the Ordinance. He drew my attention to the provisions of s. 4 of the Ordinance and s. 6 of the Act. He says, and rightly, that there is a difference between the provisions contained in s. 4 of the Ordinance and s. 6 of the Act. Section 6 of the Act applies in a case where a vacancy occurs by reason of the landlord, tenant or the sub-tenant ceasing to occupy the premises. Section 4 of the Ordinance applied when a vacancy occurred by reason of the landlord ceasing to occupy the premises or by the termination of a tenancy or by the eviction of a tenant. Section 6 of the Act provides for a vacancy arising by reason of the premises being newly erected or re-constructed. That provision does not find a place in s. 4 of the Ordinance. Sub-section (3) of s. 6 of the Act provides that a landlord shall not, without the permission of the State Government let, occupy or permit to be occupied such premises before giving the intimation and for a period of one month from the date on which the intimation is received. Sub-section (3) of s. 4 of the Ordinance only provides that a landlord shall not, without the permission of the Provincial Government, let the premises before giving such intimation and for a period of one month from the date on which such intimation is given. It is further pointed out that under sub-s. 4(a) of s. 6 of the Act, premises could be requisitioned "for the purpose of the State or any other public purpose". Under sub-s. (4) of s. 4 of the Ordinance, no purpose has been specified. Sub-section (5) of s. 6 of the Act runs as under:—

"6. (5) Any landlord who fails to give such intimation within the period specified in sub-section (3) shall, on conviction, be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months or with fine or with both and any landlord who lets, occupies or permits to be occupied the premises in contravention of the provisions of sub-section (3), shall, on conviction, be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year and shall also be punished with fine..."

Sub-section (5) of s. 4 of the Ordinance ran as follows:—

"4. (5) Any landlord who fails to give such intimation within the period specified in sub-section (3), shall on conviction, be punishable with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees and any landlord who lets the premises in contravention of the provisions of sub-section (3), shall on conviction, be punishable with imprisonment which may extend to three months or with fine or with both."

Mr. Bhabha strongly contends that under sub-s. (5) of s. 6 of the Act, an offence is made punishable with imprisonment whereas there is no such provision for imprisonment under the Ordinance. He further says that new offences have been created by the Act, which did not exist under the Ordinance. He says that it is an offence under the Act for a landlord to himself occupy or permit to be occupied the premises before giving the intimation and that such offence is punishable with imprisonment and fine whereas under the Ordinance there is no such provision. He further says that an explanation has been added to sub-s. (5) of s. 6 of the Act setting out a variety of circumstances under which premises are deemed to be or become vacant. He urges that all these changes cannot properly be said to amount to mere modification. Mr. Bhabha urges that the word "modification", as used in s. 25 of the Bombay General Clauses Act, refers to a partial alteration, where the alteration tones down what is contained earlier or it makes a thing which existed earlier less severe or makes partial changes and he relies upon the dictionary meaning of the word modification as given in the Concise Oxford Dictionary.

As the points raised in this case have arisen for decision in numerous other cases and as this case is being fought out as a test case, I have permitted counsel in other cases to address me on the points of law which have arisen for determination in the present case. Mr. Sorabjee, who appears for one of the parties in another matter, very fairly drew my attention to the dictionary meaning of the word "modify" appearing in Murray's Dictionary. There the word "modify" has been stated to mean "to make partial changes in; to change in respect of some of its qualities, to alter or vary without radical transformation." The question that I have to consider is whether it could be said that in enacting the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, the Legislature has effected a radical transformation in the provisions of the Ordinance. The subject dealt with by the provisions of the Bombay Land Requisition Ordinance and by the Bombay Land Requisition Act is the same. The changes that have been made in the Act have been made with a view to carry out more effectively the object of the Legislature in enacting the Ordinance. It cannot be said that there has been a radical transformation effected by the Act. New offences have no doubt been created. Punishment of imprisonment is also sought to be imposed. But all that has been done with a view to carry out the purposes of the Act so that the provisions of the Act may not be violated and the policy underlying the Act may not be frustrated. The changes made in the Act requiring a landlord not to occupy or permit to be occupied any premises without giving the requisite intimation are made in order that no loophole may be left in the Act and the object of the Act may be fully carried out.

In Stroud's Judicial Dictionary, Vol. III, at page 1810, it is stated that 'modification' may be by extension as well as by narrowing of the provisions of an Act. In support the case of *Stevens v. The General Steam Navigation Company*² has been cited. In that case the Master of the Rolls was concerned with the provisions of the Interpretation Act, 1889. Sub-section (1) of s. 38 of that Act ran as under:—

"38. (1) Where this Act or any Act passed after the commencement of this Act repeals and re-enacts, with or without modification, any provisions of a former Act, references in any other Act to the provisions so repealed, shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as references to the provisions so re-enacted."

Collins M. R. in that case observes as follows (p. 893).—

"...This intention the Interpretation Act, 1889, enabled the Legislature to carry out in the way in which it has been carried out, for in my opinion, there is no reason to limit the word 'modification', which is equally applicable whether the effect of the alteration is to be narrow or to enlarge the provisions of the former Act."

This decision is an authority for the proposition that it is not necessary that there should be a narrowing of the provisions of the earlier enactment in order that it could be said that there has been a modification. There might equally be a modification where the provisions of the earlier enactment have been enlarged. I respectfully agree with the remarks of the Master of Rolls on the subject.

My attention has been drawn to an unreported judgment of Mr. Justice Coyajee in *Shri Ali Akbar Ahmed v. The State of Bombay*³. In that case it was urged that s. 25 of the Bombay General Clauses Act had no application, on the ground that there was no re-enactment of the Ordinance. That contention was negatived by the learned Judge. Dealing with the words "with or without modification" appearing in s. 25 of the Bombay General Clauses Act, the learned Judge, in the course of his judgment, observed as follows:—

"There is no authority cited before me or any principle enunciated from Maxwell or other similar work of interpretation of statute to show that this modification must be modification of an uneffectual character and not of material type or material kind."

The learned Judge has further observed that the Ordinance had been in substance revived and resuscitated in the Act with certain modifications. In my view, there has been a re-enactment with modification of the provisions of the Ordinance within the meaning of s. 25 of the Bombay General Clauses Act when the Bombay Land Requisition Act of 1948 was enacted.

It is then urged by Mr. Bhabha that on a true construction of s. 25 of the Bombay General Clauses Act the modification made must not be inconsistent with the provisions of the previous enactment. This argument proceeds upon an erroneous reading of the provisions of s. 25. The words "so far as it is not inconsistent with the provisions re-enacted" in the said s. 25 refer to "any appointment, notification, order, scheme, rule, bye-law or form made or issued under the repealed enactment" and not to any modification. The provisions of the notification issued under the Ordinance must not be inconsistent with the provisions re-enacted in order that such notification may continue in force and may be deemed to have been issued under the subsequent enactment. In my view, the notification dated December 4, 1947, issued under the Ordinance is in no way inconsistent with the provisions of the Act. All that has been done by the notification could equally have been done by a notification issued under the Act and the applicability of s. 25 of the Bombay General Clauses Act cannot be excluded. In my view, s. 25 of the Bombay General Clauses Act is made expressly applicable by s. 20 of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, as if the Ordinance were an enactment. Having regard to the provisions contained in s. 25 of the Bombay General Clauses Act, the notification dated December 4, 1947, continues to be in force and must be deemed to have been issued under the provisions of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, and the provisions of s. 6 of the Act have been made applicable to premises situate within the city of Bombay.

The next point urged by Mr. Bhabha is that the declaration made by the order, dated October 10, 1957, is ex facie bad. The declaration as made is to the effect that the premises had become vacant after December 4, 1947. He says that the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, came into force on April 11, 1948, and that the vacancy, which is to be declared under s. 6(4)(a) of the Act must be a vacancy which occurred after the Act came into force. This argument does not take into account the provisions of s. 20 of the Act read with s. 25 of the Bombay General Clauses Act, 1904. As already stated by me, the provisions of the notification dated December 4, 1947, have been continued and have to be given effect to as if the notification had been issued under the provisions of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948. It is, however, urged that even though the notification could be deemed to have been issued under the provisions of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, it could be so deemed to have been issued only on the date on which the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, came into force viz. April 11, 1948, and that the declaration must be a declaration about the premises having become vacant after the Act came into force and not before that. The declaration has been made under the proviso to s. 6(4) (a) of the Act. That proviso requires that where an order is to be made under cl. (a) of s. 6(4) requisitioning the premises in respect of which no intimation is given by the landlord, the State Government shall make such inquiry as it deems fit and make a declaration in the order that the premises were vacant or had become vacant "on or after the date referred to in sub-section (1)" of s. 6 and that such a declaration shall be conclusive evidence that the premises were or had so become vacant. It is not disputed that no intimation of the kind referred to in the proviso had been given. The declaration that is required to be made is a declaration about the premises being vacant or having become vacant on or after the date referred to in sub-s. (1) of s. 6. The date referred to in sub-s. (1) is the date of the notification in the Official Gazette issued by the Government in exercise of the powers conferred under s. 6. The date that is to be given is not the date when the notification became effective under the Act, but the date of the notification itself. The date of the notification in this case is December 4, 1947, though it became effective under the Act on April 11, 1948. In the order the date mentioned is "after 4th December 1947". Even though the expression "after 4th December 1947" could be said to include December 5, 1947, and the dates subsequent thereto before the coming into force of the Act, the declaration cannot be said to be a declaration made otherwise than in accordance with the provisions contained in the proviso to sub-s. (4) of s. 6 of the Act and cannot be said to be a declaration not contemplated by the proviso. In this case, however, the order contains a recital that on inquiry it was found that the premises had become vacant in the month of March 1957. Following upon that recital appear the words "the said premises had become vacant after the 4th December 1947". Reading the order as a whole it cannot be said that the vacancy referred to in the order is a vacancy which occurred prior to the coming into force of the Act. Even if the contention of Mr. Bhabha was right that the declaration should state the date of vacancy after the coming into force of the Act, on the facts of the present case there does not appear to be any merit in the objection.

No. 332 of 1955, decided by Coyajee J.,

It was next urged that the order itself shows that the authority had not applied its mind to the matter in making the order inasmuch as the declaration that has been made states that the premises had become vacant after December 4, 1947. It is urged that the authority concerned has merely reproduced what was considered to be the requirement of law without applying its mind to the matter. I do not think there is any substance in this contention. The authority making the declaration having applied its mind to the matter has stated that on inquiry it was found that the premises had become vacant in the month of March 1957. Thereafter the authority proceeds to make the declaration that the premises had become vacant after December 4, 1947. It cannot possibly be said that no mind was applied when it was stated that the premises had become so vacant.

Mr. Bhabha then urged that, on the facts of the present case, the premises which had been requisitioned were not in fact 'premises' within the meaning of s. 4(3) of the Act. "Premises" have been defined in that section as under:—
 "Premises" means any building or part of a building let or intended to be let separately... but does not include a room or other accommodation in a hotel or lodging house."

It was urged by the learned counsel for the petitioner that the premises in this case had not been let and were not in fact intended to be let at any time after the coming into force either of the Ordinance or of the Act and were not "pre-misses" within the meaning of the Act. In the case of *State of Bombay v. Virendra Motabhai*⁴ relied upon by the respondent, it has been laid down by the learned Chief Justice of this Court as follows (p. 635):—

"...The word 'intended' must import a volition; a volition on the part of the landlord. But, in my opinion, that volition cannot be a fluctuating or an ambulatory volition. If a volition is once expressed by the owner or the landlord quae a building, then that volition becomes an incident of the building itself, and it is not open then to the landlord by changing his intention from time to time to say that the particular building was not intended to be let. It should be noted that the Legislature has not used the expression 'building or part of building let or which the landlord intends to let.' The Legislature has deliberately used the expression 'intended to be let' as an expression qualifying building. Therefore the expression 'intended to be let' is a characteristic or an incident of the building. It is perfectly true that that characteristic or incident is to be determined by the volition of the landlord, but it is not to be determined from time to time."

It is submitted on behalf of the petitioner that the letting, if any, of the rooms prior to December 4, 1947, was entirely irrelevant if the intention to let had ceased when the Ordinance came into force. The petitioner was given an opportunity to make an affidavit, if she so desired, to set out whether the petitioner had at any time prior to December 4, 1947, not let out the premises. The petitioner did not avail herself of that opportunity. The learned counsel for the petitioner stated that whilst he was not admitting that the premises had in fact been let by the petitioner at any time prior to January 1947, he was prepared to proceed with the case on the footing that the premises had been let by the petitioner prior to January 1947 and that I may act on that footing. The definition of the word "premises" excludes from its operation a room or other accommodation in a hotel or lodging house. It is clear on the facts of the present case that the premises in question viz. the three rooms referred to in the petition formed part of a lodging house from January 1947 until November 1955. Thereafter the said rooms have been used under the terms of the agreements referred to by me earlier. It is clear from these facts that from and after the coming into force of the Ordinance upto the month of November 1955, the said rooms were used for the purpose of a lodging house and did not constitute "premises" within the meaning of s. 4(3) of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948. It has been strongly urged on behalf of the respondent that the user of the premises subsequent to November 1955 was a user referable to letting and that the agreements under which the premises were allowed to be occupied since November 1955 show that the premises had been let out. In order to consider whether under the said agreements or any of them the premises were in fact let to the person or persons allowed to occupy the same under the terms of the agreements, it would be necessary to examine the said agreements. The first agreement is dated December 1, 1955. Under that agreement Hamid Sayani was permitted to occupy the said three rooms. In the recitals it has been stated that the said Hamid Sayani had requested the petitioner to grant him "leave and licence to allow him to continue occupation of the said rooms as her licensee" and that the petitioner had consented to allow the said Hamid Sayani to occupy the said room "as her licensee". It is further expressly stated in the recitals that the petitioner had no intention to give the said room to Hamid Sayani as a monthly tenant and that she did not want to create any tenancy in favour of the said Hamid Sayani and that she made it absolutely clear that the said Hamid Sayani was only allowed "use and occupation" of the said rooms as merely a bare licensee. The consideration for the said licence stated in the said agreement is "a monthly fee amounting to Rs. 300." That fee was for the use of the said three rooms and for the furniture lying in the said three rooms. It is stated in the said agreement that the particulars of the furniture were mentioned in the Schedule to the said agreement. The Schedule, however, does not contain any list of any furniture.

The Schedule annexed is blank. In the operative part of the said agreement, it has been stated as under:—

"The said Shri Hamid Sayani the party hereto of the second part is granted leave and licence to occupy rooms Nos. F-1-3, 5th fl. in Chhotu Terrace at Colaba Causeway, Bombay 5, as from 1-12-1955 by Mrs. Kulsumbai the party hereto of the first part." Clauses 3, 5 and 6 of the said agreement run as under:—

"3. The party hereto of the second part shall pay to Mrs. Kulsumbai the sum of Rs. 300 which will be the licence fee for the occupation of rooms Nos. F-1-3, fifth floor. The said amount shall be payable every month in advance on or before 10th of each and every succeeding month to Mrs. Kulsumbai the party hereto of the first part.

5. It is clearly understood between the parties hereto that the said Hamid Sayani granted bare licence and leave to occupy the said rooms Nos. F-1-3 of Chhotu Terrace as mere licensee and that he is not accepted by Mrs. Kulsumbai as a tenant in respect of the said rooms Nos. F-1-3. That no monthly tenancy is created in respect of the said rooms Nos. F-1-3 in favour of the said Shri Hamid Sayani. It is not the intention of the parties that the monthly tenancy is to be created.

6. The said Shri Hamid Sayani shall take all care of all pieces of furniture as also shall keep the premises in good state of repair and shall make good the damages that may have been caused either to the said rooms or to the said pieces of furniture."

It is urged by the learned counsel for the respondent that even though this agreement speaks of leave and licence being granted and even though the agreement states that no tenancy was created thereby, the agreement on its true construction has in fact created a tenancy and that the premises must be considered to have been let within the meaning of the Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948.

The question whether an agreement amounts to a lease or licence has been considered in numerous cases and it is not necessary for the purpose of this case to cite all those cases. The matter has been succinctly stated in Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd edn., Vol. XX, at pages 8 and 9. In para. 5 at page 8 it has been stated as under:—

"It is essential to the creation of a tenancy of a corporeal hereditament that the tenant should have the right to the exclusive possession of the premises. A grant under which the grantee takes only the right to use the premises without exclusive possession operates as a licence and not as a lease. In deciding whether a grant amounts to a lease, or is only a licence, regard must be had to the substance of the agreement. If the effect of the instrument is to give the holder the exclusive right of occupation of the land, though subject to certain reservations, or to a restriction of the purposes for which it may be used, it is a lease; if the contract is merely for the use of the property in a certain way and on certain terms, while it remains in the possession and control of the owner, it is a licence. To give exclusive possession there need not be express words to that effect; it is sufficient if the nature of the acts to be done by the grantee require that he should have exclusive possession. On the other hand, the employment of words appropriate to a lease will not prevent the grant being a licence merely, if from the whole document it appears that the possession of the property is to remain with the grantor. In order that a licence may give an exclusive right to the benefit conferred by it, it must either be expressed to be exclusive in the grant, or it must be possible to infer from the language of the grant a clear intention to that effect."

In the case of Addiscombe Garden Estates Ltd. v. Crabbe,⁵ it has been observed that the relationship was to be determined by the law and not by the label which the parties chose to put on an agreement. In that case the trustees of a members' lawn tennis club entered into an agreement with the owners of tennis courts and clubhouse, whereby the owners purported to license and authorize the trustees to use and enjoy the premises for two years from May 1, 1954, in consideration of monthly payments of "courts fees". In that case on a true construction of the said agreement the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that a tenancy had in fact been created in spite of the label of a licence being put on the agreement and in spite of the fact that the amount payable was termed as "fee" instead of "rent". The licence in that case was for a fixed period of two years. The grantees were authorised and licensed, inter alia, to enter upon and enjoy the club house with the dressing rooms and other appurtenances enjoyed therewith. The grantees agreed with the grantors to repair and maintain the said club house with the dressing rooms in good tenantable repair and condition and to render the same up upon the expiration or sooner determination of the licence in such good tenantable repair and condition. The grantees further agreed not to erect any building or other structures upon the said property except such as would be approved by the grantors. The grantees further agreed to permit the grantors and their agents at all reasonable times to enter upon the said premises to inspect the condition thereof and for all other reasonable purposes. The grantees further agreed during the continuance of the said licence to insure against loss or damage by fire in the joint names of the grantors and the grantees, the said club house. The grantors agreed with the grantees that the grantees making the said payment of courts fees and observing the stipulations on their part to be observed should during the licence "quietly enjoy the said premises without interruption by the grantors or any person claiming under or in trust for them". Jenkins L.J. in the course of his judgment in that case observes as follows (p. 985):—

"...as to the first question—whether the so-called licence of April 12, 1954, in fact amounted to a tenancy agreement under which the premises were let to the trustees—the principles applicable in resolving a question of this sort are, I apprehend, these. It does not necessarily follow that a document described as a licence is, merely on that account, to be regarded as amounting only to a licence in law. The whole of the document must be looked at; and if, after it has been examined, the right conclusion appears to be that, whatever label may have been attached to it, it in fact conferred and imposed on the grantee in substance the rights and obligations of a tenant, and on the grantor in substance the rights and obligations of a landlord, then it must be given the appropriate effect, that is to say, it must be treated as a tenancy agreement as distinct from a mere licence."

After dealing with the various clauses of the said agreement, the learned Judge further observes as under (p. 988):—

"The next provision of importance is the agreement to permit the grantors and their agents at all reasonable times to enter 'the said premises to inspect the condition thereof and for all 'other reasonable purposes.' The importance of that is that it shows that the right to occupy the premises conferred on the grantees was intended as an exclusive right of occupation, in that it was thought necessary to give a special and express power to the grantor to enter. The exclusive character of the occupation granted by a document such as this has always been regarded, if not as a decisive indication, at all events as a very important indication to the effect that a tenancy, as distinct from a licence, is the real subject-matter of a document such as this."

The learned Judge further observed that the provision as to insurance and the covenant for quiet enjoyment pointed in the direction of a tenancy being created, and that the reference to re-entry was really inappropriate to the case of a licence. The learned Judge stated that the conception of re-entry was the resumption of possession by the landlord and the determination of the interest of the tenant. Dealing with the observations made by Denning L.J. in Errington v. Errington and Woods,⁶ that the test of exclusive possession was by no means decisive, the learned Judge observed that that wide statement must be treated as qualified by the observations of the same learned Judge in Facchini v. Bryson,⁷ and it seemed to the learned Judge that save in exceptional cases of the kind mentioned by Denning L.J. the law remained that the fact of exclusive possession, if not decisive against the view that there was a mere licence, as distinct from a tenancy, was at all events a consideration of the first importance. On the facts of the case, the learned Judge observed that there was not only the indication afforded by the provisions which showed that exclusive occupation was intended, but there were all the various other matters which appeared to him to show that the actual interest taken by the grantees under the document was the interest of tenants, and not the interest of mere licensees.

So far as this Court is concerned, there is a decision of a Division Bench of this Court in Ramjibhai Virpal v. Gordhandas.⁸ Mr. Justice Gajendragadkar in the course of his judgment in that case observes as under (p. 369):—

"...Where the agreement is reduced to writing, it is but trite to say that the relationship brought into existence by the writing must always be determined in the light of the words used by the parties in executing the document. The substance of the transaction has no doubt to be determined and if in substance the transaction appears to be one of lease, the fact that an effort is made to clothe the transaction with an appearance of licence by the use of ingenious and clever words would not alter the essential character of the transaction. In that sense the use of words such as 'meane profits' or 'compensation' can have no material effect. But this is a statement of one aspect of the matter. In determining the nature of the transaction itself Courts have inevitably to take into account the words used by the parties, and in that sense it would be wrong to suggest that the words used in the document, such as 'compensation' or 'meane profits' are of no consequence whatever. In deciding the question as to what was the intention of the parties in executing the document Courts would have to look at the document as a whole, give the words used in the document their plain, grammatical meaning and determine the intention of the parties in that manner. If the intention of the parties clearly appears to be not to create the relationship of landlord and tenant between them, then in construing the words used in the document the Courts would have to bear that fact in mind. In such a case if the words used in the document are consistent both with a lease and a licence, Courts would naturally prefer to treat the document as a licence rather than as a lease in view of the intention of the parties which is otherwise clear beyond a doubt. Even so, the intention can be given effect to in construing the words of the document only where the words are capable of two constructions, one of which is consistent with the said intention. If the words used in the document are unambiguous and lead only to the inference that the relationship of landlord and tenant is thereby intended to be created, the doctrine of intention cannot materially affect the construction of the document."

After dealing with the various authorities cited at the bar, the learned Judge observes as under (p. 372):—

"...It would, however, be necessary to add that I feel some hesitation in holding that these decisions lay down the categorical proposition that a licence of any kind can never import the notion of exclusive possession by agreement between the parties. That may probably be the consequence of the definition of a licence contained in s. 52 of the Indian Easements Act; but this aspect of the matter does not appear to have been considered and decided in these decisions."

The learned Judge further proceeds to say that it must be conceded that the right to exclusive possession and enjoyment of the property let out to him is an important feature of the rights of a lessee. It must, however, be borne in mind that for the creation of a valid lease it is necessary to prove the presence of some other equally important ingredients as laid down in s. 105 of the Transfer of Property Act, so that it cannot be said that merely because a person is given the right to exclusive possession he becomes a tenant even if he does not satisfy the other requirements of the definition of "lease" contained in s. 105. At page 373 the learned Judge further observes as follows:—

"...the statement that a licence is always ruled out as soon as the right to exclusive possession is granted to a party may not be regarded as a correct statement of the law without some qualification. The question as to whether a licensee can be given an indefeasible right to remain in possession for a stated period by an agreement between the parties has been considered by English Courts on several occasions in recent years, and it may be stated, with respect, that the tendency of recent decisions appears to be to widen the scope of the licensee's rights and to hold that if a licensee is also given the right to exclusive occupation for a stated period, this right does not convert the licence into a lease but merely adds certain contractual rights to the licence."

Reading the document as a whole, I have to find out the intention of the parties as expressed in the instrument. To my mind, the parties have done their level best to express their intention in as clear terms as possible. They have clearly stated in the agreement that the intention was not to create a tenancy but that only a licence was intended to be granted. The mere fact that the moneys liable to be paid for the use of the property referred to therein were payable in advance and the fact that the grantee was under an obligation to keep the premises granted in a good state of repair are not sufficient for the purpose of negating the intention of the parties as expressly stated in the agreement to grant a licence and not to create a tenancy.

After the said agreement was entered into, the parties thereto have chosen again to enter into another agreement on November 1, 1956. That agreement begins by saying that it was an agreement of leave and licence. The period of the agreement of leave and licence is stated to be 11 months. The licence fee is fixed at Rs. 300 both for the said rooms and the hire of the furniture. Here again, the particulars of the furniture are stated to be set out in the Schedule, but in the Schedule no articles are mentioned, the said schedule being left blank. This agreement also sets out in clear terms that only leave and licence was being granted and that no tenancy was to be created thereby. Clause 11 of the said agreement provides as under:—

"The said Shri Hamid Sayani shall not permit anybody else except the members of his family only to stay with him in the said room given to him as licensee by the said Mrs. Kulsambal J. G. Padamsee."

Clause 13 of the said agreement is as under:—

"The control on the said room shall be with Mrs. Kulsambal J. G. Padamsee and for the sake of convenience the duplicate key is given to the said Shri Hamid Sayani by Mrs. Kulsambal J. G. Padamsee."

It seems that the draftsman of the agreement was at pains to set out that only a licence was to be granted and that a tenancy was not to be created. In order to safeguard against the argument that exclusive possession was intended to be granted, it has been expressly provided that the control of the premises was to be with the grantor and that for the sake of convenience a duplicate key was being given by the grantor to the grantee.

Mr. Baptista, the learned counsel for the respondent, strongly relies upon two clauses contained in the said agreement viz. cls. 7 and 10. Clause 7 of the said agreement runs as under:—

"Mrs. Kulsambal J. G. Padamsee shall not be bound to take back the pieces of furniture given on hire until the possession of the room given for use as licensee is returned back to her and whether the said Shri Hamid Sayani uses the furniture or not he shall be bound to pay hire charges for the said furniture as agreed hereto."

Mr. Baptista emphasises the fact that this clause indicates that the possession of the room was given to the grantee. In the document the said statement however is qualified by the words "for use as licensee". The mere use of the word "possession" in that context is not sufficient to negative the intention of the parties as expressly stated in the instrument in clear language. Clause 10 of the said agreement provides as under:—

"On the expiry of the period hereby demised the said Shri Hamid Sayani shall vacate and hand over the possession of the said room No. F-1-3 as also shall hand over the pieces of furniture stated in the schedule herebelow in a good state of repair."

Mr. Baptista states that the word "demised" indicates that only a tenancy was sought to be created. The word "demised" no doubt has been used, but it has been used not in connection with the tenancy, but in connection with the period of the grant viz. 11 months. The use of the word "demised" in this context is not apt. The use of that word in the manner in which it has been done and in the context in which it has been done is not such as would lead to the inference that a licence was not intended to be given, but a tenancy was intended to be created, in the face of the express words to the contrary that only a licence was being granted and that a tenancy was not being created. In my view, this agreement does not create a tenancy and the rooms cannot be said to be let thereby.

The last agreement is couched in terms similar to some of the terms contained in the earlier agreements. It starts by saying that it was agreement of leave and licence. It is made in favour of M. R. Shetty and B. T. Shenova. A sum of Rs. 275 is payable under that agreement per month by way of licence fee, both for the rooms as well as the furniture. The furniture is stated to have been specified in the Schedule. But here again, the schedule is completely blank. Mr. Baptista has strongly urged that as the Schedule in all these documents is blank, in fact no furniture had been given. In my view, the fact whether furniture had been given or not is not material for the purpose of determining whether there has been a lease of the rooms or merely a licence to use the said rooms. In this document also, it has been clearly stated that possession of the rooms had been given for use as a licensee. The same reasoning which applies to the agreement dated November 1, 1956, equally applies to the agreement of March 5, 1957. In my view, reading this document as a whole, on a true construction thereof it appears to me that the clear intention of the parties was only to grant a licence and not to create a tenancy. The rooms in question cannot be said to have been let by reason of anything contained in these three documents.

My attention has been drawn to the statements contained in para. 14 of the affidavit in reply of P. M. Kulkarni, dated December 9, 1957. In that paragraph it is stated as follows:—

"I say that from the enquiries caused to be made by Government the business of the Lodging House came to an end in November 1953. Thereafter the petitioner let out different rooms separately to different persons. Certain amounts were taken by the petitioner from the alleged occupants of the said separate rooms. The alleged occupants of those separate rooms were put in exclusive and independent occupation and possession of the rooms. The petitioner herself is not residing in the premises or even in the said building. On a consideration of all the facts, Government came to the conclusion that the premises were let out by the petitioner and the alleged occupants are really tenants and that the premises were let by the petitioner in contravention of the provisions of the said Act. I submit that the alleged leave and licence agreements do come within the ambit of the word 'let' used in the said Act."

As I have already held, it cannot be said that under the said agreements the rooms in question have been let to any person. It is no doubt stated in the aforesaid affidavit that the occupants were put in exclusive and independent occupation and possession of the said rooms. That statement has been based on the inquiries caused to be made by Government. It is not stated that apart from the said three agreements, there was any other arrangement under which the said rooms were occupied. It is not even stated that the documents were executed merely as a cloak to hide the real transaction between the parties. There is no transaction apart from the transaction as represented by each of the aforesaid three documents. In my view, it cannot be said that the rooms in question constituted "premises" by reason of the use thereof and the agreements entered into in connection therewith since the coming into force of the Ordinance or the Act.

It is next urged by the learned counsel for the respondent that these rooms had been let prior to the coming into force of the Ordinance, and that once these rooms have been so let, then the letting would become a characteristic of these rooms and that the intention to let them would be fastened upon the landlord and that it is not open to the landlord thereafter to contend that the rooms were not intended to be let. Very strong reliance was placed upon the decision in the State of Bombay v. Virendra Motabbhoy,⁹ already referred to by me. From the facts in that case it appears that the flat in that case had in fact been let by the owners and the contractual tenancy continued upto December 31, 1947, i.e. after the coming into force of the Ordinance. The premises having in fact been so let, the intention to let them had become a characteristic of that flat. The learned Chief Justice at p. 635 in that case observes as follows:—

"Now, in this case it is perfectly clear that this particular flat not only was intended to be let but was actually let to a tenant, and therefore, when the vacancy occurred it could be postulated of this flat that it was a flat which was intended to be let."

That decision is not an authority for the proposition that if the flat had at any time been let prior to the coming into force of the Ordinance, the intention to let it must fasten upon the property, even though that intention had ceased long before the coming into force of the Ordinance. I will assume for the purpose of this case that the rooms in question had in fact been let before the coming into force of the Ordinance i.e. prior to January 1947. From and after January 1947 till November 1955 the rooms had been used for the purpose of a lodging house and were not "premises" within the meaning of the Ordinance or the Act. It cannot be said that at the time when the Ordinance came into force the rooms were intended to be let within the ordinary meaning of those words. In fact they were not intended to be let, but were intended to be used for the purpose of a lodging house. Not merely these 3 rooms but the whole building in which these rooms are situate was being used and was intended to be used for the purpose of a lodging house. The question that arises for consideration is whether it can be said that the rooms were intended to be let within the meaning of the words used in s. 2(3) of the Ordinance or s. 4(3) of the Act. It cannot be said that the Legislature intended to fasten upon the property the characteristic of being intended to be let, even though at the time when the Ordinance or the Act came into force the landlord did not in fact intend to let the same and continued not to intend to let the same. Mr. Baptista on behalf of the respondent has asked me to extend the meaning of the words "intended to be let" as construed by the learned Chief Justice in the decision referred to above also to cases where the premises had at any time been let after they were constructed even though the owner thereafter had ceased to have any intention to let them prior to the coming into force of the Ordinance or the Act. If the argument of Mr. Baptista is accepted, it would mean that in a case where premises had been constructed 60 years back and had been let out for a year immediately after construction and had thereafter been purchased by a person for his personal use and had used them for the remaining 59 years for his own residence without ever intending to let the same, the premises must be considered as premises intended to be let. In my view, in order that the intention to let may fasten upon the property and may be regarded as a characteristic of the property, such intention must exist at some point of time on or after the date when the Ordinance or the Act came into force. Such a characteristic cannot be deemed to have been acquired by something done prior to the coming into force of the Ordinance if the owner of the property had thereafter ceased to have that intention and had no intention to let the property on or after the date when the Ordinance came into force. If any property which had at one time been let had been purchased long prior to the coming into force of the Ordinance and the purchaser had immediately thereafter settled the same on trust and provided that the premises shall not be let by the trustees at any time but that the same shall be used for the purpose of the trust, it cannot be said that the property was intended to be let. It is too much to say that as soon as the Ordinance or the Act came into force, the property was intended to be let. The Bombay Land Requisition Ordinance was a piece of temporary legislation. So is the Act. In considering the words "intended to be let" used in s. 4(3) of the Act, the appeal Court laid down that the volition cannot be fluctuating or ambulatory. That decision, in my view, does not refer to any change of intention which might have taken place prior to the coming into force of the Ordinance. In my view, the characteristic of being intended to be let did not attach to the said three rooms at the time when the Ordinance came into force and has not attached thereto by anything done thereafter and the said rooms cannot be said to be rooms "let or intended to be let" within the meaning of s. 4(3) of the Act and do not constitute "premises" within the meaning of that section.

I may state that it was urged by the learned counsel for the respondent that if it is held that the rooms in question had been let or were intended to be let then the words of exclusion viz. "but does not include a room or other accommodation in a hotel or a lodging house" would not apply to the rooms in question which were used for the purpose of a lodging house. He relies upon the decision in *Jhamandas Ramchand v. State of Bombay*¹⁰, where it has been laid down that an entire hotel or lodging house is within the definition of "premises" in s. 4(3) of the Act. The rooms which are sought to be requisitioned in the present case only formed part of a lodging house. There were numerous other rooms used for the purpose of the same lodging house. The whole place used for the purpose of the lodging house is not sought to be requisitioned, but only three rooms thereout. Such rooms have been expressly excluded from the definition of the word "premises" and it cannot be said that these rooms constituted premises within the meaning of the Act.

I may also state that placing reliance upon the decision in *State of Bombay v. Bhanji Munji*¹¹ it was urged that the onus was on the petitioner to establish that the rooms that were requisitioned were not "premises" within the meaning of the Act. In my view, the petitioner has discharged such onus.

As the rooms that have been requisitioned were not "premises" within the meaning of s. 4(3) of the Act, the State Government was not entitled to requisition the same and the order of requisition is bad in law. I direct that a writ of mandamus do issue in terms of prayer (a) of the petition. The respondent to pay to the petitioner the costs of the petition fixed at Rs. 375, including the costs of the notice.

The State of Bombay appealed.

CHAGLA C.J. Various interesting and ingenious points arise in this appeal. That is to be expected because this is an appeal from a petition challenging a requisition order, and so long as the Requisition Act is on the statute book and so long as requisition orders are made, novel and ingenious arguments will always be advanced before the Court.

The facts that give rise to this appeal are that the impugned requisition order was passed on October 10, 1957, under s. 6(4)(a) of the Requisition Act. The order stated that the vacancy had occurred in the month of March 1957, there was a declaration by the Government that the premises had become vacant after December 4, 1947, and the premises were being requisitioned for a public purpose, viz., for housing a Bombay State Government servant. The premises concerned are three rooms Nos. F1, F2 and F3 on the 5th floor of a building known as Chhotu Terrace situated at 105, Colaba Road, Bombay 5. The facts with regard to these premises are that from January 1, 1947, to November 1955 these three rooms were used as a lodging house. After November 1955 they were occupied by certain persons, and it is a matter in dispute between the parties whether the occupation by these persons was as tenants or as licensees. In view of the decision we have come to on the main question argued in this appeal, it is unnecessary to resolve that dispute. It is also admitted for the purposes of this appeal that these three rooms were in fact let out before January 1, 1947, and the order was challenged by the petitioner on the ground that these three rooms did not constitute premises within the meaning of the Act. What was urged was that these premises were in fact not let out at the date of the requisition order because the contention was that they were in possession of a licensee, and it was further urged that these premises were not intended to be let because they had never been in fact let after the Ordinance came into force on December 4, 1947, or the Act came into force on April 11, 1948.

In order to determine whether these premises were liable to be requisitioned and in order to determine whether the Government could exercise the power to requisition it conferred upon it under s. 6, it is necessary to determine that the premises were situated in the area to which the Act applies and also that the premises sought to be requisitioned were premises as defined by the Act. Under this head of the argument we are only considering the question as to whether the three rooms were premises within the meaning of the Act. It is undoubtedly true that the relevant point of time to be taken into consideration is the date when the power to requisition is exercised. At that date not only must there be a vacancy as required by the Act, but the vacancy must be with reference to the premises as defined by the Act. The declaration of vacancy is conclusive, but whether the premises are premises within the meaning of the Act is a justiciable issue, and what is urged by the petitioner is that at the date when the power was exercised the three rooms did not fall within the ambit of the definition given by s. 4(3). Now, "premises", to the extent relevant, is defined as any building or part of a building let or intended to be let, and it is clear that on October 10, 1957, assuming for the purpose of this argument that the premises were given to licensees, the premises were in fact not let. So the narrow question that we have to consider is whether it could be said of these premises that they were intended to be let, and what calls for our decision is the meaning to be attached to the expression "intended to be let."

Now, this is not a matter of first impression. The matter is concluded by the decision of the Court of Appeal in State of Bombay v. Virendra Motabhoj.¹ It is necessary carefully to consider that judgment. In that case one Mrs. Coultrup was a tenant of a flat on the first floor of a building. Her contractual tenancy was terminated on December 31, 1947, but Mrs. Coultrup continued to occupy the flat as a statutory tenant right upto January 1949. In the second week of January 1949 she left the premises and someone else went into possession, and Government then requisitioned the premises. The petitioners challenged the requisition order and Mr. Justice Bhagwati held that the order was bad because at the date when the order was passed the premises were not let and the landlord had clearly indicated that he did not intend to let the flat, and therefore the premises did not fall under one or the other head of the definition. The matter came in appeal and the Court of appeal held that the word "intended" imported a volition on the part of the landlord, but that volition was not a fluctuating or an ambulatory volition and if the volition was once expressed by the owner or the landlord quae the building, then that volition becomes an incident of the building itself, and it was not open then to the landlord by changing his intention from time to time to say that the particular building was not intended to be let. Applying this test we hold that inasmuch as the landlord had clearly expressed his volition by letting out these premises to Mrs. Coultrup who was at one time a contractual tenant, it was not open to the landlord subsequently to turn round and say that he had altered his intention and he no longer intended to let out the premises. One distinguishing feature on which great emphasis has been laid by Mr. Bhabha, and rightly so, and which has also been emphasised by the learned Judge below, is that in the case of Virendra Motabhoj there was in fact a letting after the Act came into force because, as pointed out, Mrs. Coultrup was a contractual tenant upto December 31, 1947. What is urged before us, as it was urged before the Court below, is that it is necessary that there must be a volition expressed by the landlord after the Act comes into force, and that the fact that a volition has been expressed before the coming into force of the Act is irrelevant for the purpose of determining whether the premises were intended to be let. It is, therefore, pointed out that in this case the premises were used as a lodging house from January 1, 1947, whereas the Ordinance came into force on December 4, 1947, and the Act came into force on April 11, 1948, and for the purpose of this argument there has been no letting after the rent law came into force and even if the landlord had let the premises before January 1, 1947, that letting cannot be taken into consideration for determining the volition referred to in Motabhoy's case.

Turning to s. 4(3) it is clear that the premises which were sought to be brought within the purview of the Government's requisitioning power were the premises as defined by the Act. Whatever buildings were there which satisfied the definition of premises when the Act came into force became liable to be requisitioned. Therefore, every building at the date when the Act came into force which was actually let undoubtedly came within the purview of Government's power. That is conceded by Mr. Bhabha. It is difficult to understand why, if a building which was actually let, came within the purview of the Government's power, a building which at that date was intended to be let did not equally come within the purview of the Government's power. It should be made clear that the interpretation which we are putting upon the expression "intended to be let" is not intended to give any retrospective effect to the Act at all. What we are trying to construe is the definition given in a statute which applies to certain buildings from the date when it comes into force. If any building had been let by the landlord before the Act came into force, could it possibly be said that that was not a building intended to be let, as the expression has been understood and defined in Motabhoy's case? The simple question that the Court has to ask is—here is a building which was not always occupied by the landlord but which the landlord himself had let out and, to use a rather popular expression, which he had by his own action made lettable. If there was such a building at the date when the Act came into force, even though at that date it was not actually let, could it possibly be suggested that that was a building which the landlord had never intended to let? Could it be said of that building that that volition which is described in Motabhoy's case had never been exercised by the landlord quas this building? In our opinion, the contention advanced by Mr. Bhabha is as untenable as the argument that only those premises come within the purview of the Act as were constructed after the Act came into force, because if the Act applies to buildings which were already in existence, then the particular incident which is the result of the volition of the landlord having attached to the building, the building that existed at the date when the Act came into force was a building with a certain incident attached to it and it is that incident which made the building liable to be requisitioned and which made it possible for the State Government to exercise its power.

The learned Judge has drawn attention to a possible hardship that may result by our giving this interpretation to the expression "intended to be let", and the hardship suggested is that you may have a building which for 60 years has been occupied by the landlord himself and which before 60 years might have been let out for a short time to a tenant, and the learned Judge says that it would indeed be hard and unfair to compel the landlord in the case of such a building to the overriding powers of the State. With respect to the learned Judge, we do not see any hardship even in the extreme case taken by him. It is not as if the Bombay Land Requisition Act of 1948 can drive a landlord out of his home and hearth and occupy his residence when he is occupying it. The whole object of the Land Requisition Act is to bring about equitable distribution of premises. What is the hardship if the landlord, after occupying the property for 60 years, leaves it or thinks of letting it out to a tenant? In such a case there is a vacancy and instead of the landlord regulating the vacancy the State steps in and says—"I will regulate it because I know what the public interest demands." Apart from that, the Requisition Act is a piece of social legislation and we must construe its various provisions in a manner which would help the achievement of the object which the Legislature had in mind rather than retard it.

Now, the reason for passing this Act was that it was felt in 1948 that there was a shortage of housing and that it would be contrary to public interest to allow vacancies to be filled up in any manner that the landlord thought proper, and therefore the State acquired to itself the undoubtedly drastic powers which it has under the Land Requisition Act, 1948. But the object was to regulate all vacancies which occurred after the Act came into force, and if we were to accept Mr. Bhabha's contention, a large number of vacancies would be ruled out from the operation of the Act, because according to him the only buildings which could be requisitioned were the buildings which were actually let at the date when the Ordinance or the Act came into force. Even if there were a large number of vacancies at that date, the State could not requisition those buildings if the landlord subsequent to the relevant date did not actually let the building or, Mr. Bhabha concedes, showed an intention to let the building. It is difficult to understand what social purpose was sought to be served by excluding from the category of buildings which could be requisitioned, buildings which in fact fell vacant and buildings which in fact were let out in the past. Nor is it possible to understand what hardship or anomaly could be caused by including these buildings within the purview of the State's requisitioning power. Undoubtedly, if the language of the section is clear, the Court cannot be influenced by social purpose or the object which the Legislature had in mind. But when the expression "intended to be let" is capable of being construed in a wider manner and that wider manner helps us to bring about the result which the Legislature had in mind, then surely we should accept the wider meaning rather than the narrower meaning which we are asked to place upon this expression.

It is then said that on the facts of this case the three rooms were in the exempted class, because s. 4(J) exempts from the definition of "premises" a room or other accommodation in a hotel or lodging house, and it is said that from January 1, 1947, to November 1955 these rooms were in a lodging house and therefore they fell within the exempted category, and Mr. Bhabha does not understand how they could come back within the category of premises which could be requisitioned without some provision in the law. It seems to us that the explanation is very simple. It is quite clear that these premises could not be requisitioned from January 1, 1947, to November 1955, because they were exempted by a specific provision of the Land Requisition Act. But when they ceased to be rooms in a lodging house and if the interpretation that we are placing upon the expression "intended to be let" is correct, then they fell within the category of "premises" and not within the exempted class, and at the relevant date when the order of requisition was passed they were admittedly not rooms in a lodging house; they were premises within the meaning of the definition because they were a part of the building which, although not let, were intended to be let.

We are, therefore, of the opinion, with respect to the learned Judge, that although on the facts Motabkoy's case may not apply to the question that we have to decide in this appeal, the ratio decidendi of that case applies to the different facts which we have to consider, and on that ratio we must hold that the premises in question were premises intended to be let because they had in fact been let before January 1, 1947.

The second contention urged by Mr. Bhabha is that the declaration made on the face of the order that they became vacant after December 4, 1947, is not a proper declaration required by law, and the contention is that the Bombay Land Requisition Act came into force on April 11, 1948, and the date of vacancy under s. 6(4)(a) must be a date after April 11, 1948. It may be pointed out that the date December 4, 1947, is mentioned in the order with reference to the Ordinance which came into force on that date, and it is urged that the date with reference to the Ordinance is not the relevant date as required by an order issued under s. 6 of the Requisition Act. It is unnecessary to consider this question because it is covered by a judgment recently delivered by my brother Mr. Justice S. T. Desai and Mr. Justice Miabhoy in Shri Jagir Singh v. The State of Bombay.²

The third point urged is that on a true construction of s. 6, it applies only to areas which have not been notified under s. 2(2) and not to areas specified in the Schedule under s. 2(1) of the said Act. Turning to the scheme of the Act, s. 2(1) extends the whole of the Act to the areas specified in the Schedule, and the city of Bombay is one of the areas mentioned in the Schedule. Section 2(2) empowers the State Government, by notification in the Official Gazette, to extend any or all of the provisions of this Act to any other area and on such date as may be specified in the notification. Therefore, going by this section alone, it is clear that the scheme of the Act was to have certain, what might be called, scheduled areas to which the Act applied and to leave it to the State Government by notification to apply the whole Act or certain provisions of it to what might be described as the non-scheduled areas. Turning to s. 6(1), it provides:

"If any premises situate in an area specified by the State Government by notification in the Official Gazette, are vacant on the date of such notification..." and then follow the words with which we are not concerned, and ultimately power is given to the State Government to requisition premises. A notification under what is in substance this section was issued on December 4, 1947, by which the city of Bombay was described as a specified area for the purpose of the section. In fact, the notification was issued under the Ordinance, but it is not disputed that s. 4(1) of the Ordinance corresponds to s. 6(1) of the Act and the notification issued under the Ordinance was continued under the Act which took the place of the Ordinance. Therefore, what this section did was to provide that even in the scheduled areas the provisions of s. 6 were not automatically to apply. A notification by Government was necessary before the provisions of s. 6(1) could apply to a scheduled area as a whole or any part of it, and therefore but for this notification s. 6 could not have been made applicable to the city of Bombay. Although the Act applied to the city of Bombay, as far as s. 6 was concerned, a special notification was necessary to make its provisions applicable to the city of Bombay.

Now, what is urged is that the notification referred to in s. 6 is the same as the notification referred to in s. 2(2), and therefore a curious argument is advanced that s. 6 can only apply to the non-scheduled area mentioned in s. 2(2) when a notification is issued extending certain provisions of the Act to that area, but s. 6 cannot apply to the scheduled areas mentioned in s. 2(1). The fallacy underlying this argument is to equate the notification referred to in s. 2(2) with the notification referred to in s. 6(1). The notification referred to in s. 6(1) is an entirely different notification to the notification mentioned in s. 2(2). Mr. Bhabha says that there is a drafting error in this section and that error is brought about by the provisions of the earlier Ordinance which replaced this Act and the draftsman did not realise or understand the different scheme adopted in the Ordinance and the scheme adopted in the Act. We do not agree. Turning to the Ordinance, the scheme adopted in the Ordinance, which is Ordinance V of 1947, was that the Ordinance extended to the whole of the Province of Bombay, and by s. 4, which corresponded to s. 6 of the Act, that section was only made applicable provided a notification was issued to

decided by S. T. Desai and Miabhoy JJ., on that effect by the State Government. Therefore, the scheme of the Ordinance was to make the Ordinance applicable to the whole Province of Bombay, but with regard to s. 4 to make it applicable only to such areas as may be specified in the notification. As pointed out, the scheme of the Act undoubtedly is different. The scheme is not to make the Act applicable to the whole State of Bombay, but to make the Act applicable only to scheduled areas, to make the Act applicable to non-scheduled areas by notification, and even with regard to the scheduled areas to make the provisions of s. 6 applicable only to such portion of the scheduled areas as may be specified in a notification to be issued under s. 6 of the Act or which has been issued under s. 4 of Ordinance V of 1947.

Now, some support is lent to Mr. Bhabha's contention by certain observations made in the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and I must take the whole blame for it myself, because in delivering the judgment I was considering the scheme of the Act and I did say that there was a drafting error in s. 6(1) because it refers to premises situated in the areas specified by the Provincial Government by a notification in the Official Gazette, and it does not refer to areas specified by the Act itself under s. 2(1); but it is clear that the object of the Act was to apply to s. 6 both the areas covered by s. 2(1) and the areas covered by s. 2(2). Therefore, I cannot blame Mr. Bhabha for putting forward this argument relying on the observation in the judgment delivered by me in Motabhai's case. But it is clear from the judgment that this particular point was never argued, and what the judgment was doing was taking a bird's eye view of the various provisions of the Ordinance and the Act in order to construe the particular section which called for construction. Now that the point has been directly raised, we have looked more carefully into it and we are of the opinion that the particular observation is not justified by the language used in the Act.

The result is that all the three contentions raised by Mr. Bhabha fail.

In fairness to Mr. Bhabha we must point out, in case the matter goes higher, that the question as to whether there was leave and license granted to the persons who occupied these rooms after November 1955 or there was a tenancy, has not been considered by us. The Advocate General wanted to satisfy us that the judgment of the learned Judge also on this aspect was erroneous. But in view of our decision that a letting of these rooms prior to January 1, 1947, is sufficient to permit the State Government to exercise its power under s. 6, it is unnecessary to decide that particular question.

The result is that the appeal succeeds and must be allowed with costs. The order of the trial Court will be set aside. The learned Judge directed that the State should pay to the petitioner costs which he quantified at Rs. 375. Inasmuch as the State has won, the order for costs of the trial of the petition in the lower Court will be that the respondent should pay to the appellant costs of the petition fixed at Rs. 375, and the respondent will also pay to the appellant costs of this appeal.

The Advocate General agrees not to enforce the requisition order for three weeks in order to enable the appellant to file a petition to appeal to the Supreme Court, if so advised.

Liberty to the appellant's solicitors to withdraw the sum of Rs. 500 deposited in Court.

In Appeals Nos. 34 and 36 of 1958 we make the same order, except that the figure of costs will be Rs. 325 instead of Rs. 375.

Appeal allowed.

THE URAN ISLAMPUR MUNICIPALITY v. SHANKARRAO
AMBITRAO JADHAV.*

Bombay District Municipal Act (Bom. III of 1901), Secs. 76-79, 164, 82(1)(a)—Article on which octroi duty leviable brought by person within octroi limits of municipal district—Refusal by such person to pay octroi duty—Suit filed by municipality against person to recover amount of octroi duty whether maintainable—Expression “distress and sale” in s. 164 whether relates to distress and sale dealt with in Chapter VII of Act.

If a person brings into the octroi limits of a municipality, governed by the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, an article, on which octroi is payable, and refuses to pay the octroi leviable upon it, he is not under the Act civilly liable for the recovery of the amount of the octroi duty, and, therefore, a suit to recover the amount is not tenable against him.

The words “distress and sale” which occur in the expression “in lieu of proceeding by distress and sale” in s. 164 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, relate to distress and sale under Chapter VIII of the Act; they have no relation to distress and sale dealt with under Chapter VII of the Act.

VYAS J. : These revisional applications raise a common question of law and therefore we have decided to dispose of them by a common judgment. The point of law which is raised in all these applications is this: If a person, who brings or introduces an article, on which octroi is payable, into the octroi limits of a municipal district, refuses to pay the octroi leviable upon the article, is a suit tenable against him under the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901 (Bom. Act III of 1901)? There has been no decision of this High Court, and we have not been referred to any decision of any other High Court, upon this point. It is for this reason that these revisional applications raise a point of some importance.

For the purpose of delivering judgment, it will be convenient to set out the facts which have given rise to Civil Revisional Application No. 1454 of 1956. This revisional application has arisen out of a judgment and decree passed by the learned Civil Judge, Junior Division, at Islampur in Small Cause Civil Suit No. 33 of 1953. The plaintiff of that suit is the applicant in Civil Revisional Application No. 1454 of 1956. The said plaintiff is the Uran Islampur Municipality. This Municipality filed Small Cause Civil Suit No. 33 of 1953 to recover from the defendants the amount of Rs. 156-4-0 as octroi duty. It may be noted that the defendants are traders residing within the limits of the Uran Islampur Municipality. The plaintiff's allegation is that in June 1948

*Decided, June 24, 1958. Civil Revision Application No. 1454 of 1956 (with Civil Revision Applications Nos. 1455 and 1457 of 1956), from the order passed by S. M. Patna; the defendants imported a goods truck bearing No. 6140 within the municipal area and therefore they were bound to pay the octroi duty upon the truck. It is further the contention of the plaintiff that the defendants ran the truck within the municipal limits without paying the octroi duty. Repeated demands were made upon the defendants to pay the octroi, but, says the plaintiff, the defendants did not comply with those demands. As the result of the above mentioned circumstances, a small cause suit being Suit No. 33 of 1953 was filed in the Islampur Court by the plaintiff against the defendants for recovering octroi duty to the tune of Rs. 156-4-0.

The suit was resisted by the defendants, and one of the contentions which the defendants took was that the suit was not maintainable under the provisions of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, and the by-laws made by the plaintiff municipality under the said Act. The defendants contended that under the Bombay District Municipal Act the liability to pay octroi upon the goods was cast upon the goods themselves and, therefore, no suit could be filed against the defendants to recover the octroi from them. The learned trial Judge accepted the contention of the defendants and held that no suit was maintainable against the defendants for the recovery of octroi from them under the Bombay District Municipal Act and the by-laws made by the plaintiff municipality under the said Act.

Under sub-s. (1) of s. 48 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, which I shall hereafter refer to as "the said Act" in the course of this judgment, every municipality may from time to time with the previous sanction, in the case of city municipalities, of the State Government or, in other cases, of the Commissioner, make, alter or rescind by-laws, but not so as to render them inconsistent with the Act. Under cl. (j) of sub-s. (1) of s. 48 the municipality may make, alter or rescind by-laws fixing octroi limits and stations; providing for the exhibition of tables of octroi; regulating, subject to any general or special orders which the State Government may make in this behalf, the system under which refunds are to be made when the animals or goods on which the octroi has been paid, or articles manufactured wholly or in part from such animals or goods, are again exported, etc., etc. The Uran Islampur Municipality, purporting to act under s. 48, sub-s. (1), cl. (j), of the Act, framed octroi rules and by-laws. Amongst these rules we find an important rule which is rule No. 6. Rule No. 6, sub-r. (1), provides, amongst other things, that every Import Naka Karkun shall, whenever goods are brought to his Naka, prepare an import bill by ascertaining and noting certain particulars. Amongst the particulars to be so noted are the rate at which the tax is calculated, the amount of the tax, if any, leviable on the goods, the name of the owner or person in charge of the goods, etc., etc. Sub-rule (2) of r. 6 provides that the Import Naka Karkun shall prepare so many separate import bills for each of such different portions of the goods taxable with not less than eight annas as the owner or person in charge of the goods desires. Then there is sub-r. (3) of r. 6 and this lays down that on payment of the amount, if any leviable, the Karkun shall sign the foil, detach it and deliver it to the person making the payment and shall retain the counterfoil undetached in his import bill book. Then there is an important sub-rule, viz. sub-r. (5) of r. 6, and it will be convenient to set out the text of this sub-rule. Sub-rule (5) provides:

"Every Import Naka Karkun is hereby authorised under section 76 of the Bombay District Municipal Act III of 1901 to require a person to comply with the provisions of that section, and in case of refusal on demand to permit an inspection of the goods or to pay the amount leviable thereon shall, unless there is any special reason to the contrary, exercise the powers conferred on him by sections 76 and 79 of the said Act as set forth in Schedule E hereto annexed."

This would take us to ss. 76 to 79 of the Act. It is important to bear in mind that part (5) of Chapter VII of the Act is the only part of the Act dealing with the levy and recovery of octroi and tolls. Sections 76 to 79 occur in part 5 of Chapter VII. Section 76, sub-s. (1), provides that every person bringing into, or receiving from beyond, the octroi limits of a municipal district any article on which octroi is payable shall, when required by an officer authorized in this behalf by the municipality, and so far as may be necessary for ascertaining the amount of tax chargeable, permit that officer to inspect, examine and weigh, and otherwise deal with, the article, and communicate to that officer any information and exhibit to him any bill, invoice or document of a like nature, which he may possess relating to the article. It is thus clear that under sub-s. (1) of s. 76 an obligation is cast upon a person, who introduces, from beyond the octroi limits of a municipal district, an article, on which octroi is payable, into the octroi limits of a municipal district, to permit an officer authorized in this particular behalf by the municipality to inspect, examine and weigh the article concerned. It also casts an obligation upon the person concerned to communicate to the above officer any information which he may possess relating to the article. Then there is sub-s. (2) of s. 76 and this sub-section says that if a person, who introduces an article on which octroi is leviable into the limits of a municipal district from beyond those limits, refuses to permit the officer concerned to inspect the contents of the goods so introduced in order to ascertain whether the goods contain an article in respect of which octroi is leviable, the said officer may cause the goods to be taken without unnecessary delay before a Magistrate or such officer of the municipality as the State Government appoints in this behalf. Then there is s. 77 which says that every officer demanding octroi shall tender to every person introducing any article, on which tax is claimed, into the limits of a municipal district, a bill specifying the article taxable, the amount claimed and the rate at which the tax is calculated. Then there is sub-s. (2) of s. 77 and this sub-section is an important sub-section since it provides for penalty for evasion of octroi. We next proceed to s. 79 and sub-s. (1) of s. 79 says that in the case of non-payment on demand of any octroi or of any toll leviable by a municipality, the person appointed to collect such octroi or toll may seize any article on which the octroi is chargeable, or any vehicle or animal on which the toll is chargeable, or any part of its burden, which is of sufficient value to satisfy the demand, and may detain the same. Then there is sub-s. (2) of s. 79 and this sub-section provides that when any article seized is subject to speedy and natural decay, or when the expense of keeping it together with the amount of the octroi or toll chargeable is likely to exceed its value, the person seizing such article may inform the person in whose possession it was that it will be sold at once, and shall sell it or cause it to be sold accordingly, unless the amount of octroi or toll demanded be forthwith paid. Then there is sub-s. (5) of s. 79 and it deals with the surplus of the sale-proceeds of the article which is sold under sub-s. (2). It is thus clear that under part (5) of Chap. VII, which, as I have said, is the only part of the Act which deals with octroi and tolls, certain obligations are cast upon a person introducing from beyond the limits of a municipal district an article, upon which octroi is leviable, into the octroi limits of the municipal district and amongst those obligations is an obligation to permit a certain officer to inspect, examine and weigh the article, to communicate to that officer any information and exhibit to him any bill, invoice or document of a like nature, which he may possess, etc., etc. There is no provision under part (5) of Chap. VII casting a civil liability upon a person introducing the goods into the octroi limits of a municipal district. In other words, there is no charging section under part (5) of Chap. VII under which it would be competent to a municipality to proceed by way of a civil action against a person who refuses to pay octroi or toll. In case a person, who introduces an article, upon which octroi is leviable, into the octroi limits of a municipal district, refuses to pay octroi, then under part (5) of Chap. VII the municipality has only one remedy to which it can have recourse and that remedy is that a person, whom the municipality may appoint in this behalf, may seize the article concerned and may, after seizure, detain the article and, where the article is subject to speedy and natural decay, may sell the article or cause it to be sold. While we are on this point it is important to bear in mind that under sub-s. (2) of s. 77 a criminal liability is cast upon a person who refuses to pay octroi. He is made liable to prosecution and he can be fined up to the limit of ten times the value of the octroi or up to fifty rupees, whichever may be greater. It is thus clear that while enacting the various sections which are to be found in part (5) of Chap. VII, the Legislature had in its mind the question of the procedure to be adopted in case the person concerned refuses to pay octroi, and even so, under Chap. VII we do not find any section casting a civil liability upon the defaulter, i.e., the person who refuses to pay octroi.

The learned advocate Mr. Albal appearing for the plaintiff municipality invited our attention to the provisions of s. 164 of the Act. Section 164 provides:

"In lieu of proceeding by distress and sale, or in case of failure to realise by so proceeding the whole or any part of any amount recoverable under the provisions of Chapter VIII, or of any compensation, expenses, charges or damages awarded under this Act, it shall be lawful for the Municipality to sue in any Court of competent jurisdiction the person liable to pay the same, as also any other person who may have in any other way caused, or may appear likely to cause, any injury to any property, rights or privileges of the Municipality."

Mr. Albal contends that the words 'distress and sale' in the expression "in lieu of proceeding by distress and sale" which occurs in s. 164 refer to distress and sale wherever distress and sale are dealt with in the body of the Act. Now, there is no doubt that there are provisions about distress and sale in Chap. VII of the Act, as also in Chap. VIII of the Act, and Mr. Albal says that the expression "distress and sale" which occurs in s. 164 would extend to the provisions of distress and sale both in Chap. VII and Chap. VIII. As I have said above, part (5) of Chap. VII relates to the levy of octroi and tolls. Therefore, says Mr. Albal, if any person refuses to pay the octroi, he would be liable to be proceeded with under s. 164 of the Act. We have considered this contention of Mr. Albal, but we find it difficult to accept the contention. For the purpose of an argument, let it be assumed that Mr. Albal's contention is correct and let us examine the result which would arise out of it. Let us assume that when the Legislature used the words "distress and sale" in s. 164 of the Act, they intended these words to extend to distress and sale of an article under Chap. VII and also under Chap. VIII of the Act. Then, in that event, the Legislature would have made a provision as to what would happen in case of failure to realise the amount of the octroi by such distress and sale, that is to say, by distress and sale under Chap. VII and under Chap. VIII. If we turn to s. 164, however, the Legislature, while providing for a remedy in case of failure to realise the amount of the octroi by distress and sale under the provisions of Chap. VIII, has made no provision to meet the case of failure to realise the amount of the octroi under the provisions of Chap. VII. The material words in s. 164 are the words "so proceeding" which occur in the expression "in case of failure to realize by so proceeding the whole or any part of any amount recoverable under the provisions of Chap. VIII," and there is no doubt that these words "so proceeding" relate to a proceeding by distress and sale under Chap. VIII. They have no relation to distress and sale under Chap. VII. As the language of s. 164 reads, it is clear that the words "so proceeding" have a relation to the words "distress and sale" occurring in the expression "in lieu of proceeding by distress and sale". In other words, the clause "in lieu of proceeding by distress and sale" and the clause "or in case of failure to realise by so proceeding the whole or any part of any amount recoverable under the provisions of Chapter VIII" are not to be read disjunctively as Mr. Albal says. They are to be read in a connected way. That being so, upon a proper construction of s. 164, we are of the view that the words "distress and sale" which occur in the expression "in lieu of proceeding by distress and sale" in s. 164 relate to distress and sale under Chap. VIII of the Act. They have no relation to distress and sale dealt with under Chap. VII of the Act.

On this point Mr. Albal invited our attention to a decision of this Court in the case of *Bhusawal Municipality v. Hindustan Construction Company, Bombay*¹. It was held by Mr. Justice Wassoodew in that case that s. 203 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, provided an alternative remedy to make recovery of municipal dues by a suit. Mr. Justice Wassoodew stated that according to the first part of s. 203 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, the said alternative remedy, viz. the remedy by way of suit, could be adopted 'in lieu of any process of recovery allowed by or under the Act,' provided the person sued 'was liable to pay'. There are more reasons than one why this decision would not avail the plaintiff municipality. In the first place, as I have said, there is no provision in part (5) of Chap. VII of the Act, which is the only part relating to octroi and tolls, which makes a person, who introduces an article into the octroi limits of a municipal district, liable to pay. Therefore, unless there is a provision in the Act which makes a person sued liable to pay, that person cannot be sued. Then, again, and this is important, Bhusawal Municipality v. Hindustan Construction Company, Bombay, was not a case under the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, but it was a case under the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925. Now, if we turn to s. 203 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, and compare the language of that section with the language of s. 164 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, we would find a substantial and fundamental difference between the language of the two sections. Section 203 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, provides:

"In lieu of any process of recovery allowed by or under this Act or in case of failure to realise by such process the whole or any part of any amount recoverable under the provisions of Chapter VIII, or of any compensation, expenses, charges or damages payable under this Act, it shall be lawful for a municipality to sue in any Court of competent jurisdiction the person liable to pay the same."

Now, if we turn to s. 164 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, the section provides:

"In lieu of proceeding by distress and sale, or in case of failure to realise by so proceeding the whole or any part of any amount recoverable under the provisions of Chapter VIII, etc., etc."

The important words which find place in s. 203 of the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, and which are significantly absent in s. 164 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, are "by or under this Act". If, for instance, s. 164 had read as follows: "In lieu of proceeding by distress and sale allowed by or under this Act, etc., etc.," then Mr. Albal would have been right in his contention, and he would also have been right in relying upon the above mentioned case in support of his contention, that the words "distress and sale" would relate not merely to distress and sale provided under Chap. VIII, but also to distress and sale provided under Chap. VII of the Act. But the Legislature while enacting s. 164 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, did not use the significant words "by or under this Act" after the words "distress and sale". Instead, while dealing with a case of failure to realise the whole or any part of the amount of octroi, they dealt with a case of failure under Chap. VIII of the Act, clearly indicating thereby that when they used the words "distress and sale" in the opening part of s. 164, they intended to refer to distress and sale under Chap. VIII of the Act. Then, again, if we turn to s. 82, sub-s. (1), cl. (a) of the Act, it provides "When any amount, which, by or under any provisions of this Act, is declared to be recoverable in the manner provided by this Chapter, etc., etc." Here again, the important words "by or under any provisions of this Act" are to be found. I have already stated above that such words, namely the words "by or under any provisions of this Act", are not to be found after the words "distress and sale" in s. 164 of the Act. Clearly, therefore, when the Legislature used the words "distress and sale" while enacting s. 164, they did not intend to refer to "distress and sale" under Chap. VII of the Act.

For the aforesaid reasons, we are of the view that the learned Judge was right in coming to the conclusion that if a person who introduces an article, upon which octroi is leviable, into the octroi limits of a municipal district, from beyond those limits, refuses to pay the octroi, there is no provision in the Act which would make him civilly liable for the recovery of the amount from him. In these circumstances, the learned Judge was also right in dismissing the suit.

Civil Revisional Application No. 1454 of 1956 accordingly fails and is rejected without any order as to costs.

For the reasons stated above, Civil Revisional Applications Nos. 1455 and 1457 of 1956 are also rejected. Civil Revisional Application No. 1455 of 1956 is rejected without any order as to costs, while Civil Revisional Application No. 1457 of 1956 is rejected with costs.

Applications rejected.

Before Mr. Justice Vyas and Mr. Justice Tambe.

SHAM KEKHUSHRU v. N. P. SHAH.*

Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act (Bom. LXVII of 1948); Secs. 10, 25(1), 70(f) and (h)—Tenant tendering amount under s. 25(1) to obtain relief against forfeiture—Application made by tenant under s. 10 to Mamlatdar for refund of excess amount tendered under s. 25(1)—Whether Mamlatdar has jurisdiction to decide such application.

The Mamlatdar has no jurisdiction under s. 10 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, to decide a tenant's application for the refund of a portion of the amount tendered by him to the landlord under s. 25(1) of the Act for obtaining relief against forfeiture.

The facts appear in the judgment.

K. H. Buck, A. A. Rizvi and E. A. Sethna, for the petitioner.

O. J. Jathar for H. R. Gokhale, for respondent No. 2.
